TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE FATHER OF ARTS AND ARMES, CHARLES LORD HOVVARD, BARON OF EFFINGHAM, EARLE OF NOTTINGHAM, High Conſtable of the Caſtle and Forreſt of Windſor, Lord Chiefe Iuſtice in Eyre of England, Gouernour and Captaine generall of all her Maieſties maritime Forts and Caſtles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Suſſex and Surrey, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, and one of her Maieſties moſt honourable priuie Councell.

RIght Honourable, there is a ſaying in Zenophon moſt worthy the citing and inſight, that matters of worth and conſequence are both to be committed and commended to their truſt and protection, who know the waight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the ſame by Authoritie and Reaſon. For this cauſe and vpon this ground, I haue choſen your Honour out for a moſt noble Patron of this moſt famous and accompliſhed Hiſtorie of the Iewes: which (for dignity and antiquitie of the ſubiect, the elegancie and puritie of the ſtile, the choiſe proprietie and copie of words, the grauitie and varietie of ſentences, the alterations and memorable euents; and laſtly, for the birth and dignitie of the Author) requireth a ſpirit of no leſſe wiſedome, courage, and nobilitie then your ſelfe, who haue power to defend, and knowledge to diſcerne the worth thereof. Vouchſafe therefore to leuell the eye of your eſteeme vpon the Center of this happy Hiſtorie: and as Themiſtocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophees; and Alexander in ſeeing Achilles tombe, did grieuouſly ſigh with an honourable emulation: ſo let the zeale, magnanimity, and admirable conſtancie which euery where affronteth you in this Booke (and rauiſheth the beſt mindes from the boundleſſe troubles of this world, and draweth them into the contemplation of true perfection) ſo ſettle your honourable loue and affection to emulate the ſame, that as for glory in Armes; ſo for preſeruing and protecting Artes, you may outſtrip your competitors, and amaſe too curious expectation. And in mine opinion the time chalengeth no leſſe at your hands: for as your tranſcendent dignitie and courage hath returned vs a happy harueſt in our expected and long poſſeſſed peace, as by your ſecond care and diligence next vnder her ſacred Maieſtie we all reape the fruit and felicitie of bleſſed abundance: ſo by your example in reading and reſpecting both learning and the learned, you ſhall pull downe that Babel, which confuſed ignorance hath raiſed to ouer-reach induſtrie; yea you ſhall ſtrengthen the weakened abilitie of learning, which (alas the while) is now-adaies like a commoditie without requeſt ſcarce ſalcable by the hands of a cunning broker. Nothing is more worth money, and leſſe in requeſt: onely the worlds blinde creatures as S. Hierom tearmeth them) the vnlettered, take delight in their errors, whoſe writings (as Plutarch ſpeaketh of Ariſtophanes poeme) are written for no modcrate mans pleaſure. Let therefore your vpright eſtimation of this worke (moſt noble Earle) awaken the dead deuotion of ſuch as contemne Artes; and let no ſuch corrupt drones (as make ſale of ſinfull thoughts for good marchandiſe) buz about the hiue of true ſcience: But as Emperors, Kings, and Princes haue euer in their Greeke, Italian and French, with a reſpectiue acceptance, and bountifull hand, entertained this Hiſtorie; ſo let this tranſlation of Ioſephus which courteth you now in Engliſh, bee accepted at your hands, and countenanced by your Honour: for whoſe vnconfined felicitie both I and other of my name haue euer prayed, and will neuer ceaſe to ſtudy.

Your Honors vnfainedly deuoted,

THOMAS LODGE,

TO THE COVRTEOVS Reader, as touching the vſe and abuſe of Hiſtorie.

IF Hiſtorie were as eaſily conceited and made vſe of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the gouernment of mans life; I ſhould hold it no ſinne, ſo preciſely to preſcribe a limitation and bound, to ſuch as ſhould enter the Liſt, and conſult with example: for what more pleaſing to our ſelues, or profitable for ſocieties could euer befall vs, then in this Theater of mans life, (wherein Hiſtorie affoordeth all ſorts of Actors) to ſit and learne preuention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wiſe by forraine wreckes? All which being traduced to our priuate vſe, wee may either as partners in what we haue paſt, or obſeruers of future caſualties, by precedent euents, tye ages to our memories; and preuenting our eſcapes, by ſuruey of other mens repentance, briefely beget experience by ſight, or foreſight of worldly caſualties, and forme a mirror of fore-paſſed errors, to fore-iudge our future calamities. But for that it behooueth vs to enter this worldly Academy, the more prepared, the more that Hiſtorie is fraught and fulfilled with plentifull fruite: and whereas the difficulty and difference is alike, to yeelde an vpright verdict both of a mans owne, and other mens life; neither may any man rightly examine an other (how wiſe ſoeuer he bee) except in equall ballance hee weigh his owne imperfections; it muſt neceſſarily follow on both ſides, that with the more wiſedome, and the greater obſeruation wee ought to entertaine Hiſtorie, leaſt our minde like the winde ſhould wander vncertainly, and our deuotion ſhould preuent our reſolution; our eſteeme, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furniſhed and affluent banquet; although ſome things, (and they to fewe men) ſeeme pleaſant, otherſome to other are without taſte and ſeeme tart, and euery one iudgeth his meate not by proofe, but by the palate; yet notwithſtanding there is a certaine meane, which either Natures ordinarie, or the refined kinde of nutriment (beeing ſimple and incorrupt) hath faſhioned and fixed for moſt apteſt for the bodie; from which, whoſoeuer varieth, or either beyond meaſure, or without iudgement, followeth his fooliſh appetite, in glutting himſelfe beyond diſcretion, reapeth more incommoditie then pleaſure by theſe pleaſures: So in the diuerſitie of mans life, although a thouſand formes, a thouſand ſimilitudes bee offered, and that euery man faſhioneth other mens manners to his minde, yet is there but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whoſoeuer tracketh with iudgement, doth truely know the vſe of life; whereas they that ſit in a plentifull banquet, in affecting all things, can make vſe of nothing. Now, how many are there, I pray you, that in reſpect of either of their own, or other mens acts and words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choiſe in iudging minds, than meates, and that in this matter ſeemeth not ſufficiently inſtructed? Wherein I wonder that men eſpie not their errors, whereas they imagine that Hiſtory is the inſtructor of ſuch as read the ſame; whereas it onely yeeldeth matter of inſtruction, euen as the banquet miniſtreth meat according to euery mans affection. Some therefore are ſeduced with the ſweetnes of the Stile, and in ſeeking their pleaſure, loſe their profit; who reape no other fruit of Hiſtory, then to beguile time, and beget officious idlenes, laughing away houres, and nouriſh repent: others in reading glory, hunt it in a ſhadow, where if they could make vſe of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aſpire to true glory without true vertue, neither no wiſe man will hope further: yet ſee we many men, that becauſe they haue read many excellent workes, will be Capricious and pretend wiſedome; reſembling thoſe tragedians, who will, after they haue diſcharged themſelues of their parts and apparrell

wherein they counterfaited the Emperour, yet retaine his Royall and princely manners: Some triuiall and light witted, that make an Eclipſe of a ſhadow, make more of the embleme, then the worke; the habite then the Doctor: So admirable effects worketh Hiſtorie in mens mindes. Now whereas it is the moſt exact and chiefeſt intent of Hiſtory to awaken mens idleneſſe, and arme them againſt caſualties, and the whole bent of example hath no other iſſue; it falleth out thorow mens ſecuritie (who ſuppoſe that their neighbours perils concerne them not) that whatſoeuer is of note, is ouerſlipt with a deafe and ſleeping iudgement, and things that memorie ſhould beſt loue, are loſt in her. To conclude, there are ſome that will haue euery mans ſhooe fitted on their owne Laſt, and tye all mens pennes to their owne pleaſures: For which cauſe, partly by reaſon of this ſecret, partly through this ill ordered, confuſed and raſh method of reading, as of corrupt humours, ſo is there growne a certaine κακεξία of iudgement and reſolution: and as in intemperate bodies, meate yeeldeth very little profit; ſo reape they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maiſt eaſily conceiue, how a hiſtory ought to bee read: how mens liues ought in themſelues be examined: finally how equall a proportion is required in both. And truely in my opinion, the chiefeſt ground of this difficulty, is the peruerſenes of our iudgements: which is the cauſe, we the rather reſpect our owne inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no leſſe miſery then the former, that ſuch as write, ſet downe ſuch things as are acted, not onely for our profit ſake, but to feede their owne humours: and like to certen Architects (by interpoſing their iudgements) doe vainly praiſe ſome things, ſuppoſing that our imitation ſhould be tied to their pleaſure; where if they performed what they ought to doe, the Reader ſhould encounter with no ſuch diſtractions: but now, in like manner as Cookes, who rather reſpect their maſters pleaſurable taſte, then his profit; would God the Hiſtoriographer did not affect flattery. It therefore appeareth, that in two ſorts (firſt in our owne iudgement; and next to the preiudice of thoſe that write) we are circumuented; in that they ſet not downe ſuch euents as paſſe, in their owne nature and as they are. For he that writeth an Hiſtory, is the interpretour of thoſe things that are paſt: whoſe iudgement being depraued, it fareth with him as with the pureſt and moſt richeſt wine, which waxeth muſtie by reaſon of that veſſell wherein it is incloſed, or is by ſophiſtication corrupted: which is the greateſt folly, and moſt intolerable deceit that may befall men. They therefore, who negligently vndertake a Hiſtory, (or ſuppoſe that life were to be paſt raſhly, and without an exact obſeruance of all offices) are no leſſe deceiued then certaine countrey peſants in the laſt troubles of France (of whoſe folly I drew ſome example) who attempting and entring vpon a city not farre off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries ſhop furniſhed with all kind of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleaſure, odours and delight of the confections they taſted; and ſuppoſing all to be of the ſame kind, deuoured, taſted, and ſwallowed downe euery thing: whereupon ſome fell ſicke of feauers, ſome grew phrenſie, and many loſt their liues to pleaſe their appetites; at leaſtwiſe, he that ſcaped beſt, gaue occaſion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, ſo Hiſtory (the image of life) is fraught with pleaſure, and diſpleaſure; and onely in the vſe of life, the wiſedome of life conſiſteth. Farewell: vſe this, and my ſelfe, as two twinnes borne for thy profit.

For the better vnderſtanding of the Coines and Meaſures, whereof there is ſome mention made in this Hiſtory; obſerue I pray you that which followeth.

SAth was a meaſure containing about ſome ſeuen pintes French.
The Epha contained three Saths.
The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to ſay thirty Saths, and was the ſame meaſure both in drie and liquid things.
The Log contained a French meaſure.
The Hin contained twelue Logs.
The Bath contained as much as the Epha.
The Cad was a kinde of pitcher containing ſuch a quantity as a young maiden might well carrie.
The common Sicle contained the waight of foure ounces, whether it were of golde, ſiluer, or of any other mettall.
The ſacred or holy Sicle waighed halfe an ounce of any mettall whatſoeuer.
The common Sicle of ſiluer was valued at about ſome ſhilling of our money.
The holy Sicle of ſiluer was valued at about ſome two ſhillings.
The common Drachme was the eight part of an ounce.
The ſacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.
The pound waighed twelue ounces.
The ordinary Talent contained fiftie foure pounds, eight ounces, and a quarter of Troy waight in any metall: yet was it not currant money, but a maſſe made vp after the manner of an ingot.
The ſacred Talents contained one hundreth pounds.
Furthermore note this for your better knowledge, that when as Ioſephus quoteth the Olympiades without any ſpecification of the yeeres therein contained, hee ordinarily comprehendeth the ſpace of foure yeeres compleat.
Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath diuers ſignifications amongſt both Greekes and Latins (as the controuerſie betweene Plinie and Diodorus Siculus may well teſtifie) and for that diuers of our Engliſh tranſlators haue ſometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong; I pray you in reading this Hiſtory, whereas any of theſe words occurre, ſuppoſe them for one and the ſame meaſure of ground, and according to the Greekes account, (which I ſuppoſe Ioſephus moſt reſpected in this Hiſtory) conclude it to be either of 600. foote as the Olympique, that is of 120 paſes, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foote, that is 200. paſes. As for the Furlong, either multiply him 8. times to make him a Stade, or as an ouerſight in the printing, let it paſſe with the Errata.

B # FIRST BOOKE OF
THE MOST ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE IEWES: WRITTEN BY IOSEPH THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS.

C ## A moſt excellent Preface, containing the cauſes which induced the Author to write this Hiſtorie, together with the contents and intents of the ſame.

CHAP. I.

D THEY that indeauour themſelues to write Hiſtories, ſeeme not (in my opinion) to haue one and the ſame intent and motiue, but diuers and very different cauſes of their labours: for ſome of them are addicted to this ſtudie, vnder pretence to exemplifie their eloquence, and vnder hope to purchaſe glory thereby; otherſome to the end to giue them content, whoſe worthy actions they couch and commend in their writings, haue intermitted no time nor (to their power) ſpared no labour. Some there are that hauing beene preſent in perſon, and eye-witneſſes in the execution of great affaires, haue neceſſarily been inforced to reduce and digeſt the ſame in writing: neither wanted there ſome who ſeeing occurrences of high & neceſſary conſequence (which otherwiſe had bin buried in ignorance) haue bin incited (in reſpect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publiſhing thereof: now of theſe forenamed cauſes, the two laſt are they that incited me to the like. For the warre which we had with E the Romans, and the accidents and iſſues on both parts, (all which in perſon I beheld, and to my perill I haue learned) doe compell me to declare the ſame; and the rather for that there are ſome, who in their writings, haue depraued, and peruerted the truth. I haue therefore taken this worke in hand, for that in my opinion the knowledge therof, will be both pleaſing and profitable to the Græcians: for it ſhall containe the antiquity of our whole nation, their forme of common-weale, both tranſlated and gathered out of the Antiquities and Chronicles of the Hebrews. Truth it is, that heretofore, and at ſuch time alſo as I compoſed the Hiſtory of the foreſaid warre, I had proiected and purpoſed with my ſelfe, to lay open to the world, how & whence the Iewes had their firſt originall, what alterations in fortune they had falne into, by what law-maker they had beene
F inſtructed in pietie, and incited to the exerciſe of vertue: how many warres haue they ſuſtained by long and diuers times, and finally how againſt their will they haue beene intangled in this laſt warre, which they waged againſt the Romans. But for that the content of this matter, was too ample and copious, I haue ſeparated it apart, aſſigning thereunto this treatiſe accompliſhed from the beginning euen vnto the end: afterwards in proceſſe of time (as it vſually hapneth to thoſe that attempt matters of mighty conſequence) I was ſurprized with a certaine delay, and ſlothfulneſſe that withdrew me from the tranſlation of ſo waightie a matter, in an vnfamiliar and forrain language. Yet ſome there were, who inflamed with a deſire of knowledge, animated me in this action; and especially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured of all learning, and who in especiall, tooke G it for a pleasure, to take knowledge of the diuers occurrences of common weales: as he that had beene agent, in diuers affayres of importance, and sundry accidents, in all which hee hath shewed a maruellous magnanimitie of courage, with an vnmooueable resolution to follow vertue. Being thus perswaded by him, who is accustomed to incourage those vnto good actions, whom hee perceiueth to be apt and prepared to performe things profitable and honest: and (that which is more) being ashamed in my selfe, that I should rather take delight to follow idlenesse, than addict my selfe to any laudable exercise; I inforced my selfe more couragiously then before time; and (besides all that which hath bin spoken) I haue effectually considered with my selfe, that our ancestors haue thought good to communicate and publish the knowledge of our Histories to the Grecians, if so be that any of them were curious to vnderstand the same. I haue found there- H fore that Ptolemey King of Ægypt the second of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and desirous to store and gather bookes) was earnestly desirous, that our lawe and the rules thereof, and the prescript forme of our liuing should bee translated into the Greeke tongue.

And as touching the hie Priest Eleazar (who hath not beene second in vertue to any other whatsoeuer) he refused not to make the said King partaker of the effect of his desire: to which he had wholly contradicted, had it not beene the ordinarie course of our ancestors, not to conceale from other men, what thing soeuer was honest. For which cause I haue helde it a matter no waies vndecent for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that same great sacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (onely in as much as concerned learning) I supposed many also to bee no lesse affected to good letters then the King: for hee vndertooke not to haue all the writings I which wee had, but those translators who were sent vnto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that vnto him which was in our lawe. But those things that are found written in the sacred bookes of holy Scripture are infinite, beeing such as containe in them, the Historie of fiue thousand yeeres: in which diuers vnexpected chances, sundry fortunes of warre, and many changes of politike estates are discouered. In summe, if any one haue a desire to read this Histo-rie, hee shall principally learne and apprehend, that all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation to those men, who obserue the will of God, and are afraide to transgresse the lawes of his commandements; and that God hath prepared for such the crowne and reward of felicitie. Contrariwise, if they shall depart from the diligent obseruance thereof, that which is easie shall bee made impossible, and their endeuours in their opinion good, shall end in incu- K rable calamities. For which cause I exhort all those that shall reade these bookes, to fixe their minde vpon God, and that they approoue our law-maker, if (as it worthily deserued) hee hath considered the diuine Nature; and attributed to the same such actions as are alwaies agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanitie of fables, wherewith others are poisoned: although in respect of the length of time, and the antiquitie of things, he might without controule faine and imagine whatsoeuer vanities: for hee was borne more then two thousand yeeres ago, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durst referre the originall of their Gods; neither the deeds or lawes of men, whereof they make mention. But in pursuit of our Historie, the sequel of our discourse, shall declare all things exactly, and in conuenient order. For in compiling this worke, I haue promised to adde nothing, nei- L ther to pretermit any thing: and for that all whatsoeuer we shall declare, doth almost wholly depend, on the wisedome of our law-maker Moses; it is necessarie before all other things, that I speake somewhat of himselfe, least perhaps any man should wonder how this labour hauing beene enterprised, to discouer the words and workes of certaine persons, is also imployed for the greatest part in describing and discouering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moses thought it most especially necessarie, either for him that will rightly dispose his life, or impose lawes to other men, that first and in especiall he haue the knowledge of the nature of God; to the end that conceiuing in his minde the greatnesse of his workes; hee might as much as in him lyeth, imitate his most vnequall example; and follow him with M all diligence. For it is impossible, that a law-maker being voide of this contemplation, should haue good sense; or that his writings should be of any moment to induce them vnto vertue, who should receiue those lawes, except before all things they should learne, that God who is the father and Lord of all, and that seeth all, giueth happie life vnto those that follow him; and contrariwise inuironeth them with great calamities, who forsake the way of vertue and righte-ousnesse. Moses therefore intending to instruct his Citizens in this doctrine, began not his ordinances with the treatise of contracts, and couenants, which we practise one with another, as other

A other law-makers were accuſtomed to do: but he hath lifted their ſpirits on high to the end they might thinke on God, and on the ornament of this world made by him, perſwading that the moſt accompliſhed worke among al thoſe things which God had made in the world, was the creation of vs men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety; then might he more eaſily perſwade them in the reſt: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themſelues vnto fables, haue in their diſcourſe impoſed on their gods the infamy of ſins committed by men, and by that meanes haue brought to paſſe, that the wicked ſort are yet more wicked and addicted to euill doing. But as touching our law-maker, after he had declared that God had in himſelf all vertue pure and vnſpotted, hee hath thought good that men alſo ſhould endeuour themſelues to be partakers of the ſame, and on thoſe that neither conceiue nor beleeue thoſe things, hee inflicteth a grieuous
B and inexorable puniſhment: I exhort the reader therefore to examine our writings according to this Maxime: for to thoſe that conſider after this manner, nothing ſhall ſeeme either abſurd, or vnworthy the magnificence of God; by reaſon that all things haue their diſpoſition conformable to the vniuerſall nature, which our law-maker hath declared ſometimes obſcurely, ſometimes in conuenient allegories grauely; and otherwiſe expreſſing that manifeſtly, and publiſhing that in plaine words, which he ought openly to make knowne. The cauſes whereof if any man would ſearch, he might find a moſt deepe and very Philoſophicall contemplation; which I ouerſlip at this preſent, without longer ſtaying thereon: but if God ſhall giue me time I will inforce my ſelfe to compoſe it in a volume as ſoone as I ſhall haue finiſhed this worke. For this preſent then I will apply my ſelfe, to expoſe thoſe things which haue beene done, beginning at the creation of the C world, according as Moſes hath ſpoken, and I haue found it written in the holy Scriptures, which teſtifie and intreat to this effect as followeth.

CHAP. II.

The Creation of the world.

IN the beginning God created heauen and earth. Now the earth, not beeing ſubiect to ſight, but couered with thicke darkeneſſe, and trauerſed with an ayre comming from high: God commaunded that there ſhould bee light; and after the light was made hauing conſidered
D the vniuerſall matter, he ſeparated the light from the darkeneſſe, and named the darkneſſe Night, and the light Day; calling the Morning the beginning of the day, and the Euening the time wherin we ceaſe from trauell, and this was the firſt day which Moſes in his language called a day, wherof at this preſent I could giue a ſufficiēt reaſon: but for that in a particular diſcourſe I haue promiſed to write the generall cauſes of all; I will refer the declaration therof, to his conuenient time & place. After this, the ſecond day, he placed the heauen aboue all the world, and hauing ſeparated it from other things, he thought good to giue it a place apart; and making it firme by the means of a Chryſtalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moiſt & rainy, and did harmonioufly accord the earth with it, to the end the increaſe thereof ſhould be watered by deawes. The third day, he firmely eſtabliſhed the earth, ſpreading the ſea round about the ſame; and the ſame day, he with E a word cauſed all plants and ſeeds to ſpring vpon the face of the earth. The fourth day, he embelliſhed the heauens with the Sunne, the Moone and the Starres, ordaining them their motions and courſes by which the ſeaſons orderly enſuing, might bee diſtinguiſht. In the fift dav, hee made all kinde of liuing creatures which dwell vpon the face of the earth, as well they that ſwimme in the deepeſt waters, as thoſe that flie in the ayre; vniting them together by couples and paires, to the end that each in their kinde, might increaſe and multiply. The ſixt day, he made all foure-footed beaſts, and diſtinguiſht them into male and female: and in the ſame day, hee formed man. So that Moſes ſaith, that the world and all that is therin was made in ſixe whole dayes, and that on the 7. day, God tooke reſt and ceaſed from his labours. By reaſon wherof we likewiſe deſiſt from trauell on that day, which we call Sabbath, which is to ſay, Repoſe.

F After the ſeauenth day, Moſes beganne to deſcribe the originall of man and the manner of his Creation in theſe tearmes: God framed man of the duſt of the earth, and powred into him a ſpirit and ſoule, which man was called Adam, an Hebrew word ſignifying ruddy, becauſe hee was made of earth, tempered with red or yellow: for the earth which is rightly called a virgin, that is to ſay, earth not remoued but elementary, is of that colour. Then brought God all kinde of liuing creatures before Adam, ſhewing him as well the male as the female: on whom Adam beſtowed thoſe names, which to this preſent time they retaine. And ſeeing that Adam had no female female to accompany and liue with him (for as yet there was no woman) and for that he thought G it ſtrange that all other liuing creatures had their companions: God tooke one of his ribs from him at ſuch time as he ſlept, and of the ſame he formed a woman; who beeing brought before Adam, he did acknowledge that ſhe was made for him. Now in Hebrew a woman is called Iſha, but this was called Eua, which is as much to ſay, as the mother of all liuing creatures. Hee decla-reth alſo, that God planted in the Eaſt a garden, flouriſhing and adorned with all ſorts of plants, amongſt which was the tree of life, and an other the tree of intelligence, by which was knowne both good and euill. And after hee had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, hee commanded them to keepe and cheriſh the plants. Now this garden is watred by a riuer that inuironeth the whole earth, which diuideth it ſelfe into 4. chanels or riuers. That which is called Phiſon (which name ſignifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the land of India, and entreth into the great ſea, and is by the Greekes called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tigris, they flow H into the red ſea. Euphrates is called Phorá (that is to ſay diſperſion or flower.) Tigris is called Diglat (which ſignifieth ſtreight and ſwift.) Gehon runneth by the countrey of Ægypt, and ſignifieth as much as comming from the Eaſt: the Greekes call it Nilus. Now God commanded A- dam and his wife to eate of the fruites of all other plants, and that they ſhould abſtaine from that of ſcience; telling them, that at what time ſoeuer they ſhould taſt of the ſame, they ſhould die the death. Whereas then at that time, all liuing creatures were at accord one with another; the Serpent conuerſing with Adam and his wife, was inflamed with enuie, for that hee ſaw they ſhould be happy if they continued in the obſeruation of Gods commandements: and that con-trariwiſe, they ſhould caſt themſelues headlong into ruine and deſtruction, if they ſhould diſobey I the ſame. Hee therefore maliciouſly perſwaded the woman, to taſte the fruit of the tree of intelligence, giuing her to vnderſtand, that the knowledge of good and euill was in the ſame; and that as ſoone as they had taſted thereof, they ſhould lead a life no leſſe happy then Gods: and by this meanes he cauſed the woman to fall, which tooke no regard of the ordinance of God. For hauing her ſelfe taſted of this fruit, and finding it pleaſant and delicious in taſte, ſhee perſwaded her husband alſo to taſte the ſame: at which time they vnderſtood that they were naked and ſought meanes to couer themſelues: (for this fruit had in it ſelfe, the vertue to giue vnderſtanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then couered they themſelues with fig leaues; which they put before their priuities, eſteeming themſelues more happy then they were before, in that they had found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who before time was accuſtomed familiarly to talke with him) finding himſelfe guilty of ſinne, hid K himſelfe from his preſence: but God wondring hereat, asked him for what cauſe hee fled and ſhunned him at that time, whereas before time hee had taken pleaſure to talke familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had tranſgreſſed the ordinances and commandements of God, anſwered him not a word, but God ſpake vnto him after this manner: I had prouided for you the meanes whereby you might haue led your life without ſufferance of any euill, or ſenſe of any miſery: ſo that all whatſoeuer was requiſite for neceſſitie or pleaſure, might happen of it ſelfe vnto you, by my onely prouidence, without any trauell or care on your parts; which if you had well vſed, age had not ſo ſoone ouertaken you, but that you might haue liued many yeares: but thou haſt ſcorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandement. For in L that thou art ſilent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of euill; of which thou findeſt thy ſelfe culpable: wherefore both olde age ſhall quicklier come vpon thee, and the daies of thy life ſhall bee ſhortned. Adam excuſed his ſinne, and required at Gods hands, that hee would not bee incenſed againſt him, laying the fault of that which had happened, on his wife, allead-ging that hee had offended by reaſon hee was ſuborned by her: and the woman accuſed the Serpent. But at that time God puniſhed him, becauſe hee had ſuffered himſelfe to bee ouercome by the counſaile of a woman; that the earth thence forward neuer more of her owne accord ſhould bring foorth fruite: but that when they had trauailed and almoſt deuoured themſelues in labour, it ſhould ſometimes giue them foode, and at other times refuſe to ſuſtaine them.

And as touching Eue, hee chaſtiſed her with child-bearing, and throes in trauell; for that be- M ing her ſelfe deceiued by the Serpent, ſhee had drawne her husband by the ſame meanes into extreame miſerie. Hee tooke alſo from the Serpent his voice, and was diſpleaſed againſt him,
* by reaſon of the malice hee had conceiued againſt Adam, and hee put venome on his tongue, declaring him an enemie both to man and woman; whom hee commanded to bruiſe the head of the Serpent, as well for that the euill which chanced vnto men conſiſted in the head, as alſo in that beeing aſſaulted in that part he is moſt eaſily done to death. Moreouer hauing depriued

CHAP. III.

Of the Poſteritie of Adam: and of the ten ages euen vnto the Deluge.

BVT Adam and Eue had two male children, the firſt whereof was called Cain (which ſignifieth acquiſition) and the ſecond was called Abel (which is as much to ſay as mourning) they had alſo daughters. Theſe brothers addicted themſelues each one of them to their particular exerciſes. Abel the younger honoured iuſtice, and (ſuppoſing that God B was preſent in all his actions) hee alwayes and wholly fixed his thoughts on vertue: and his exerciſe was keeping of ſheepe. But Cain (being the wickedeſt man amongſt men, and addicted to vnſatiable deſire of profite) was hee that firſt found out the vſe of the Plough, and who killed his brother for the cauſe which inſueth. Hauing concluded among themſelues to ſacrifice vnto God, Cain offered the fruites of his labour, and planting; Abel preſented milke, and the firſtlings of his folde: which ſacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather conſiſted of things produced of themſelues by the order of Nature, then that which a couetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from Nature. Hereupon Cain (beeing wroth becauſe his brother Abel was more honoured by God then himſelfe) ſlew his brother; and hauing hidden his body out of ſight, hee thought that ſuch a murther ſhould be concealed. But God knowing well this C fact) appeared to Cain, and queſtioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many daies ſince he had not ſeene him; when as heretofore he had alwaies ſeene him conuerſant before him. Cain (beeing troubled, and ignorant what anſwere hee ſhould make vnto God) ſaid firſt that hee wondred what was the cauſe his brother was ſo long time abſent: and finally, aggrieued in that God continued the queſt, and did more exactly ſeeke after him; hee ſaid hee was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affaires. Then God reproued and conuicted Cain of murthering his brother, and ſpake vnto him after this manner, ſaying, that he wondred he ſhould denie the knowledge of his brothers death, whereas hee himſelfe had ſlaine him: notwithſtanding he acquitted him of the puniſhment deſerued for this murther, by reaſon that Cain had done ſacrifice, and made requeſt vnto God, that it might pleaſe D him to remit ſomewhat of the ſeueritie of his iuſtice againſt him: yet did God curſe him, and threaten to puniſh his ſucceſſors to the ſeuenth generation. Then did he driue him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for feare hee ſhould bee encountred and taken by ſome ſauage beaſts, and that he ſhould periſh after that ſort) God commanded him to ſuſpect no dangerous euent for that cauſe, aſſuring him that hee might ſafely trauaile thorow all regions, without being either aſſaulted or feaſed by ſauage beaſts: and hauing ſet his marke vpon him, by which hee might be knowne; he commanded him to depart the countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had trauailed thorow diuers regions, hee builded Nais (it was a place ſo named) and made his aboad therein, and in that place had children. But he receiued not this chaſtiſement for his better amendment; but rather became worſe and worſe: for hee abando- E ned himſelfe to all pleaſures of the bodie, making it his ſport to outrage thoſe with whom hee conuerſed, filling his houſe with riches gotten by rapine and violence; and inciting other men to follow his pleaſures and thefts, hee became their Lord and maſter of all miſchieuous exerciſes: hee ouerthrew that ſimplicitie which men before that time had vſed in their mutuall ſocieties, by the inuentions of meaſures and waights; the ignorance thereof was the cauſe that the life of man was eſtranged from deceite: but in ſteede and place of free and ancient courage hee introduced fraude and decit. Hee it was that firſt bounded the fieldes, and builded the firſt Citie, and made wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell therein. This Citie was named Enoſa, by the name of Enos his firſt begotten ſonne. But Iared was the ſonne of Enos, of Iared iſſued Malehel, whoſe ſonne was Mathuſala, who begotte Lamech, who had 77. children F by his two wiues Sella and Ada: amongſt whom Iobel the ſonne of Ada was the firſt that made Tents, and tooke delight to leade a paſtorall life; contenting himſelfe with the ſame. Iubal his brother germaine exerciſed muſicke, and inuented the Pſalterie, and the Harpe. And as touching Thobel one of his ſonnes, by his other wife, hee ſurpaſſed all other his brethren in force, & brauely managed the affaires of warre, by which wayes hee got more ample riches, and meanes to maintaine his life with more pleaſure. Hee it was that firſt inuented the Art of forging, and the ſhop alſo: and was father to a daughter named Naama. But Lamech being well exerciſed in Gods

So it was that during the life of Adam himselfe,the successors of Cain were most wicked,teaching and imitating one anothers wickednes, the last of them prooving alwaies the worst:so that they were strangely inflamed to follow warre and theft:and if perhaps some of them were more remisse then the other in murthers, and committing outrages; yet notwithstanding were they bolde enough to spoile and possesse the goods and heritage of other men.

Cain the father of hypocrites and euil men.

But Adam the first man made of earth (for the Historie requireth that I should returne to speake of him)after the death of Abel,and the flight of Cain,betooke himselfe to beget children, highly affecting succession and posteritie,being about the age of two hundreth and thirty yeeres: besides which,after hee had liued some seuen hundreth more, at last hee died : amongst whose children(which were many)hee had Seth.And for that it were too long to speake of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nourished and trained vp by his father H to the yeeres of discretion; studied vertue, and left his succession heires, and followers, of his sanctitie:who being all of them well borne, remained in the world free from all contention, and liued happily : so that it neuer happened that any of them in any sort did iniurie to any man. These inuented the science of the celestiall bodies, and all that which concerneth the beauty and order of the same. And to the end that their inuentions should not bee defaced out of the memories of men, neither should perish before they were perfectly knowne : (insomuch as Adam had foretold them of the generall destruction of all things after two sorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of waters)they made two pillars; the one of bricke, and the other of stone; and ingraued in each of them such things as they had inuented, to the end if that of bricke should bee abolished by the ouerflowes and rage of waters, that other of stone should remaine,and expresse vnto men that which was imprinted therein for their instructions.That of bricke then was consecrated by them, and is in the countrey of Lycia euen at this present day.

CHAP. IIII.

The Deluge from which NOE and his family escaped,and dwelt in the field of Senaar.

IN this manner perseuered they during the course of seauen ages, honouring one God the Lord of all things, hauing alwayes a respect of vertue. But afterwards in processe of time, K they degenerated from the ancient institutions of their forefathers, neyther obseruing humane lawes, neither continuing their accustomed seruice of God; and they that before time industriously exercised themselues in vertue, afterward with twise as zealous studie followed wickednesse; and grewe at last to that height of impietie, that they prouoked Gods heauie displeasure against them. For diuers Angels of God accompanying themselues with women ingendred outragious infants, and contemners of all good, by reason of that trust they had in their forces, whose hainous actions were not much vnlike those which the Greekes haue in their fables fained of the Giants. But Noah perplexed and extreamely displeased with such their misdemeanors, exhorted them to change their thoughts,and amend their misdeedes:and (seeing them mollified by no admonitions; but that they were wholly possessed with the plea- L sure which they tooke in vices) hee fearing least they should kill him and his familie, left them to their loosenes,and with his wife,children,and all his family departed into an other countrey. Then God (delighting in the iustice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreame malice, but also concluded to destroy all whatsoeuer creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, deuoid, and repurged from all impietie : hee abridged also the life of them,so that they liued not any more so long time as they were wont, but onely attained the terme of sixe score yeeres : and hee couered the land with waters, and by this meanes all of them were destroyed. Onely Noah escaped by the meanes and way which God had taught him in such manner as followeth: Hee builded an Arke of foure stages; in length three hundreth cubites: in breadth fiftie: and in the height thirty: into this he entred with his mother,his wife and M his children and their wiues, purueying himselfe of all things requisite both for their sustenance and vse : hee closed also therein all sorts of liuing creatures, two and two, Male and Female, for the conseruation of euery kinde, and of some of them seauen couples. The sides of this Arke were strong, and the couer also; so that no water could pearce the same, and whatsoeuer storme might come it was able to resist it. Thus was Noe(by succession of nature,the tenth from Adam)saued with all his household;for he was the son of Lamech whose father was Methusala

The Deluge.

A ſala the ſonne of Enos, the ſonne of Iared, the ſonne of Maleel, who with diuers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the ſon of Seth, the ſonne of Adam. This deſtruction hapned, the ſixe hundreth yeere of Noahs age (and the ſecond moneth, which was called Dius by the Macedons, and by the Hebrewes Marſomane) for ſo haue the Ægyptians diſtinguiſht the yeere (but Moſes ſet downe Niſan for the firſt moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Iſraelites out of the thraldome of the Ægyptians.) He made this law therefore, that all things which appertaine to diuine ſeruice, ſhould take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in reſpect of the times and termes of buying and ſelling, and all other trafficke, he obſerued the firſt policie of the yeere, beginning in December: Moſes wrote that the Deluge began the ſeuen and twentieth day of the a-
B boue named moneth which was the yeere two thouſand ſixe hundreth fifty and ſixe, after the creation of the firſt man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth and death of great perſonages of that time are moſt exactly ſet downe.) At ſuch time then as Adam (was 230. yeeres old, his ſonne SETH was borne vnto him, and the ſaid ADAM liued 930. yeeres; SETH about the age of 250. yeeres, begat ENOS, who after he had liued 905. yeeres, left the gouernment of his affaires to his ſonne Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190. yeere of his age. After that Cainan had liued 910. yeeres, he had his ſonne Maleel, begotten by him the 170. yeere of his age. The ſaid Maleel hauing liued 195. yeeres died, leauing his ſonne Iared: who about the age of 162. yeeres, engendered Enoch, who liued 962. yeeres. After Enoch, ſucceeded his ſonne Mathuſala, begotten about the age of 162. yeeres, at ſuch time as the ſaid
C Enochs father was yet aliue: and after that Enoch had liued 365. yeers, he was taken vp vnto God (whence it commeth to paſſe that his deceaſe hath not beene exemplified in writing.) Mathuſala the ſonne of Enoch, in the yeere of his age 187. yeeres, had Lamech for his ſonne, who liued 782. yeeres, to whom he left the ſoueraignty, hauing held the ſame 969. yeeres. And Lamech after he had gouerned 707. yeeres, declared his ſonne Noe for gouernour, at ſuch time as the ſaid Lamech had liued 182. yeeres, which Noe gouerned for the ſpace of 900. yeeres.

All theſe yeeres calculated into one ſumme, accompliſh the time aboue written. Yet to perfect this accompt, we ought not to ſeeke out the deceaſe of theſe perſonages (for they liued in the ſame time that their children and ſucceſſours did:) but the onely thing we are to obſerue, is their births. As ſoone then as God had giuen the ſigne, and that it began to raine for the ſpace
D of whole fortie daies, the water fell and ouerflowed the whole earth fourteene cubites high (which was the cauſe that diuers could not eſcape, becauſe there was no means of flight, or place of refuge.) But as ſoone as the raine was ceaſed, the water began to decreaſe by little and little for the ſpace of one hundreth and fiftie daies, about the 27. day of the ſeauenth moneth. Noe perceiuing then that the Arke was on ground vpon the top of a certaine mountaine of the countrey of Armenia; he opened the ſame, and ſeeing the earth did a little diſcouer it ſelfe round about the ſame, he conceiued ſome better hope and held himſelfe ſatisfied: Some few daies after, when the water was ebbed ſomewhat more; he ſent out a Crow (deſiring to know if the reſt of the earth were deliuered from the waters, and whether without danger he might iſſue out of the Arke:) but the Crow finding the earth bebayned in water, returned vnto Noe: who the E ſeuenth day after ſent out a Pigeon to finde out the eſtate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in his nebbe an Oliue braunch: whereby Noe perceiued that the earth was deliuered from the Deluge; and hauing as yet expected ſeuen daies more, he ſet at libertie all liuing creatures that were in the Arke. But as ſoone as himſelfe, his wife, and his family, forſooke it, he offered ſacrifice vnto God, and feaſted and reioyced both he and all his houſhold. The Armenians in their language haue called the place where Noe deſcended, by a name Aprobaerion (which ſignifieth as much as deſcent) and in that place euen at this preſent the inhabitants of that countrey ſhew ſome remnants and memories of the ſame. All thoſe that haue written ſtrange Hiſtories, haue made mention of this Deluge, and of the Arke: among the number of whom is Beroſus the Chaldean, who ſetting downe occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after F this manner: Some ſay likewiſe that a certaine part of this Arke is in Armenia, neere to the mountaine of the Cordæans, and that ſome men haue brought from thence ſome part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of that place are wont to vſe in ſteed of a preſeruatiue againſt inchantment. Hierome the Ægyptian alſo (who hath written the Antiquitie of the Phœnicians) hath made mention of this matter: as alſo Mnaſeus with diuers other: Nicholas of Damas likewiſe in his nintie ſixt Booke ſpeaketh heereof after this manner. Aboue the Region of Mineans there is a great mountaine in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported that diuers retyred themselues for safetie during the time of the Deluge, and there escaped they: and that a certaine man borne on an Arke arriued vpon the highest top of that mountaine, and that certaine timbers of that bottome had beene kept a long while: and it may be that this is that whereof Moses the law-maker of the Iewes maketh mention. But Noe fearing least God (hauing condemned all men to a generall perdition) should euery yeare ouerflow the earth after this manner; offered burnt sacrifice vnto God: beseeching him, that hereafter hee would entertaine the ancient order, and that no so great calamitie might succeede, by which all liuing creatures should come in danger to bee vtterly extinct and exterminated: but that inflicting deserued punishment on the reprobate, hee would spare the innocent, whom in his mercie hee had preserued from danger; otherwise they should bee more miserable and condemned by a harder censure, if they were not wholly warranted, but should be reserued to be swallowed vp by an other Deluge; and hauing suffered the feare and sight of the first, to perish by the second. Hee praied him therefore that hee would bee pleased to accept of his sacrifice, and in his mercy vouchsafe that he would hereafter conceiue no more any so hainous hate and displeasure against the earth, to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities might possesse the same in peace, wanting none of those commodities which they enioyed before the Deluge: but that they might equall their forefathers in olde yeares, and length o life.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 6. Noe prayeth God that he will drowne the earth no more.

God heareth Noes prayer. Nota. Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 7. Man is the author of his death, not God. Gods couenant with Noe.

Noe hauing in this sort finished his requests, God (who loued nim for the vprightnesse of his heart) granted him his request, denying himselfe to bee the author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themselues by their owne malice had procured those punishments due vnto them. For had hee desired that they should bee extinguished, hee would not haue brought them into the world. For better it is, not to grant life; then to destroy those to whom thou hast giuen it. But (saith God) through their contempt of my seruice and graces, they haue inforced me to humble them vnder the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so exactly pursue and examine their iniquities to the end to chastice them in my displeasure; especially for thy sake: And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, feare not (how huge and hideous soeuer the stormes be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water vpon the earth. In the meane time I command you to keepe your hands innocent from murthers, and all manslaughter, and to punish those that commit wickednesse. I leaue the vse of all other liuing creatures to your sustenance or seruice; in as much as I haue made you Lord ouer all, as well those that breath vpon the face of the earth, as those that swimme in the waters, and such as inhabite and flie amidst the ayre: but you shall not eate any blood, in as much as therein consisteth the soule and life of liuing creatures. And I declare vnto you that I will desist to draw the shafts of my displeasure against men. And I will giue you the rainebow for a signe: for this bow in their opinion is the bow of God. And after that God had pronounced these words and made these promises, he departed.

The Rainbow the signe of attonemẽt betweene God & Noe.

Noe liued after the Deluge three hundreth and fiftie yeares, and hauing spent all this time of his life in happinesse, he died after he had liued in the world nine hundreth and fiftie yeares. Neither is there cause why any man (comparing this our present age, and the shortnesse of the yeeres thereof, with the long life of the ancients) should thinke that false which I haue said: neither followeth it consequently, that because our present life extendeth not to such a terme and continuance of yeeres, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age and long life which wee publish of them. For they beeing beloued of God, and newly created by him, vsing also a kinde of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their yeeres, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their yeeres were of that continuance: Considering that God gaue them long life, to the end they should teach vertue, and should conueniently practise those things which they had inuented in Astronomie, and by Geometry: the demonstrations whereof they neuer had attained, except they had liued at the least sixe hundreth yeeres. For the great yeere is accomplished by that number of yeeres: whereof all they beare mee witnesse, who (either Greekes or Barbarians) haue written ancient histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the historie of Ægypt) and Berosus (who hath registred the actes and affaires of the Chaldeans) together with Mochus Hestiæus, Hierome of Ægypt) who historified the state of the Phœnicians with others accord with me in that which I haue said. Hesiodus also, Heccatæus, Hellanicus, and Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus doe declare, that they of the first world liued one thousand yeeres. Notwithstanding let euery man iudge of these things, as best liketh him.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

NOE had three ſonnes, Sem, Iaphet, and Cham, borne one hundreth yeeres before the Deluge. Theſe firſt deſcended from the mountaines into the plaines, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceiued (who for feare of the Deluge had fled the plaines, and for that cauſe were loth to forſake the mountaines) they gathered courage and perſwaded themſelues to doe the like: and the plaine where they all dwelt was called Senaar. And whereas they were commanded by God that (by reaſon of the increaſe and B multitude of men) they ſhould ſend certaine diſtinct Colonies to inhabite diuers countries of the world (to the end that no ſeditions might grow betwixt the one and the other; but contrariwiſe in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great ſtore of fruite) they were ſo ignorant that they diſobeyed God, and falling into great calamities ſuffered the puniſhment of their offences. For, wheras they flouriſhed in increaſe (by reaſon of the great number of their youth) God counſelled them again that they ſhould diuide themſelues into colonies. But they (thinking that the goods which they poſſeſſed proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but preſuming that their force was the only cauſe of their aboundance) did not obey him, but rather ſuſpected that God ſought to betray them, to the end that being thus diuided he might the better ſubdue them: Nemrod incited them in this ſort to mocke and contemne God. Hee was the nephew of Cham, the ſonne of Noe: a man valiant and apt for armes: he put them in the head that C they ſhould not beleeue that their good hap proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their owne vertue, which furniſhed them with ſo much riches: ſo that in a little ſpace he reduced the eſtate to a tyranny; ſuppoſing by this onely meanes that he might make men reuolt againſt God, if hee might perſwade them to ſubmit themſelues to his gouernment; giuing them to vnderſtand, that if God ſhould once more ſend a Deluge, hee would take reuenge on him in mens behalfe, and that hee would build a tower, to whoſe top the water ſhould not attempt, and reuenge the death of his predeceſſors. The common ſort was ready to follow theſe ordinances of Nemrod, ſuppoſing it to be puſillanimity in themſelues, if they ſhould obey God. For which Gen. 11. cauſe they began to build the tower with their vttermoſt induſtry, neither was there any one D idle in all that worke: yea ſo great a number of labourers were there, that the worke was raiſed to a height beyond all expectation. The thickneſſe thereof was ſo great that it obſcured the height thereof: and it was builded of burnt bricke and cimented and ioyned with a bituminous morter, to the end it ſhould not receiue any cleft in the ſame.

Geneſ. 10. Noes three ſonnes.

God commanded the poſterity of Noe to inhabite the earth.

But God ſeeing their madneſſe, condemned them not to a generall extermination (by reaſon that they had made no profit by their example, who periſhed in the firſt Deluge) but made them mutine the one againſt the other by changing of their tongue; ſo that by reaſon of their diuerſities of language, they could not vnderſtand one another. The place where this tower was builded, is at this preſent called Babylon (by reaſon of the confuſion of tongues that firſt began in that place) for Babell in Hebrewe ſignifieth confuſion. Of this tower and the diuerſitie of E languages Sibylla hath made mention in theſe words. At ſuch time as meh vſed one kinde of language, they builded a moſt high tower, as if they meant by the ſame to mount vp into heauen: but the gods ſent downe winds and ouerthrew the tower, and gaue euery one his diſtinct and ſeuerall language, whence ſprung the cauſe that their Citie was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Senaar in Babylon, Heſtiæus teſtifieth after this manner. It is ſayde of thoſe ſacrificers, that being eſcaped, they tooke the ſacred reliques of Iupiter Enyelius, and came into Senaar in Babylon.

How Noes poſterity diſperſt themſelues thorow the whole world.

FROM that time forward (by reaſon of the diuerſitie of tongues) they diſperſed themſelues into diuers countries, and planted colonies in all places; and occupied thoſe places whither eyther God or their good fortune had conducted them: ſo that both the Sea coaſtes, and the middle-land were repleniſhed with inhabitants. Some there were alſo who paſſing the ſea in ſhips and veſſels, firſt peopled the Iſlands. haue changed them. Others are altered into a more familiar and knowne name, to neighbours, deriuing them from the Greeks the authors of ſuch Titles. For they in theſe latter times hauing growne to great name and power, haue appropriated the ancient glory to themſelues, in giuing names vnto Nations deriued from the Greeks, and policying them, as if they had taken their originall from them. That euery Nation deriued his name from his Author.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11 Gen. 10.

NOVV they in honour of whom the Nations receiued their firſt names, were the children of the ſonnes of Noe. Iaphet the ſon of Noe had ſeuen children who began to make their abode from the mountaines of Taurus and Amanus, and entred Aſia, euen vnto Tana; and Europa, vnto Gades, occupying the countrey which they firſt met with, and was not before time by man inhabited, each one calling his ſeuerall Nation by his owne name: for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians, Magog dwelt amongſt thoſe, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greeks Scithes. Of Madus (the firſt begotten ſonne of Iaphet) iſſued the Madians, whom the Greeks haue named Medes: and of Iauan his other ſon, the Ionians and Greeks took their originall: Thobelus gaue name likewiſe to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meſchus was the author of them that were called Meſchates, who are lately named Capadocians: for they ſhew euen at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the Citie of Maſaca, which teſtifieth to thoſe that conceiue the ſame, that this Nation hath been ſo called. Theres named them Therians, who were vnder his gouernment, whom the Greeks called Thracians: and thus many nations tooke their originall from the ſonnes of Iaphet: but of the three ſonnes which Gomar had Aſchanaxes gaue originall to the Aſchanaxians (at this day tearmed Rhegians by the Greeks) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhiphatæans, called at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrigians. As touching Iauan the ſonne of Iaphet, he had three ſonnes, of whom Abiſus gaue name to the Abiſians, who at this preſent are the Ætolians, ouer whom he commanded: Tharſus ingendred the Tharſians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane Citie Tharſis; whoſe firſt letter is O in ſteed of Th. Chetinus obtained the Iſle of Chetine, called at this day Cipris (whence it happeneth that not onely all the Iſlands, but alſo diuers other places on the ſea coaſt are by the Hebrewes called by this word Cethim) witneſſe one of the Cities of Cipris which hath had the reputation to conſerue her ancient name. For it is called Citium, by thoſe that wreſt the ſame to the Greeke ſenſe, a word not very much varying from Cethim. Theſe Nations were occupied by the ſonnes and yong children of Iaphet. But I will firſt publiſh that which perhaps is vnknowne to the Greekes, and then proſecute my purpoſed narration which I haue omitted, that is, that theſe names are formed after the manner of the Greekes, to the end they ſhould be more ſweet and pleaſant to them that ſhould ouer-read them. For this termination is not proper to our Nation, which hath but one forme, and no variation of termination: for whereas the Greekes pronounce Ἀδάμας we ſay Adam: and where they ſay Noches, the Hebrewes ſay Noe, and keepe this termination in all things. But the ſonnes of Cham poſſeſſed Syria and all the region that abutteth on the mountaines of Amanus and Libanus; extruding their Empyre towards the ſea, and ſignifiſing all whatſoeuer euen vnto the ſea. Whoſe names are partly wholly aboliſhed, and partly changed, and applyed to others; ſo as they are very hard to be vnderſtood: for of the foure ſonnes of Cham, the name of Chus hath not beene changed by time: for the Ægyptians (ouer whome they extended their Dominion) haue beene named Chuſeans by them, and by all, the Aſians: the name of Miſraim hath continued alſo in the memorie of men: for we that bound vpon Ægypt, call that countrey, the countrey of Miſraim, and the Æthiopians, Miſramites. Phut likewiſe firmed the colonies of Libya, and called the inhabitants thereof according to his name Phutians; and there is a riuer in the countrey of Mauritania which hath the ſame name, of which it is moſt manifeſt that diuers Greeke Hiſtories make mention, as alſo of the countrey neere adioyning, which they call the countrey of Phut, but it hath changed his preſent name by the meanes of one Licis one of the ſonnes of Miſraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter ſignifie vnto you.) All the eight ſonnes of Miſraim, occupied all the countrey from Gaza vnto Egypt: Onely the countrey where Philiſtins gouerned, hath conſerued his name: for the Greekes call Paleſtine a part thereof. As touching the reſt, Lom, Enam, and Labim (who onely inhabited Libya and called the countrey by his name) likewiſe as touching Nethom, Phetroſim, Chreſeen and Chepthom, wee B know neither of their countries, nor of their names. For, the Æthiopian war (wherof hereafter we will make mention) hath ouerthrowne their Cities. Chanaan alſo had ſonnes, amongſt whom Sidonius builded and named Sidon (a citie in Phænicia) and Amathus builded Amate, which at this day the inhabitants call Amatha: but the Macedonians haue named it Epiphania (which is as much to ſay as famous) by reaſon of ſome that deſcended from Epiphanes. Arudeus poſſeſſed the Iſles of Aradus, and Araceus builded the Citie of Arce, ſituate in Libanus. And as touching the other ſeuen, the Eueans, Chetteans, Iebuſæans, Eudæans, Semæans, Samarians, and Gergeſæans; there is no memory remaining in ſacred ſcriptures but onely their names: for the Hebrewes raced their Cities vpon theſe occaſions. C After the Deluge, when the earth was eſtabliſhed in his former eſtate, Noe gaue himſelfe to tillage, and planted vineyards, and when the fruit therof was ripe (and hee had preſſed and made wine thereof) he dranke and banqueted after he had done ſacrifice: Being thereby made drunke, and ouerpreſſed with ſleepe, hee lay diſcouered in a moſt vnſeemely and ſhamefull faſhion; which when his younger ſonne behelde, he ſcornefully diſcouered it to his brothers: who being aſhamed, couered their Fathers ſhame with reuerence. Which fact of his, comming at laſt to light, and the knowledge of Noe, hee wiſhed all felicitie to the two other, and as touching Cham (by reaſon he was his ally in bloud) he curſed him not, but his poſteritie after him. But although the others eſcaped this malediction, yet God inflicted it on the ſucceſſours of Chanaan, whereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. But Sem the third ſonne of Noe had fiue ſonnes, who D inhabited the countrey of Aſia, beginning at Euphrates, and extending to the Indi an Ocean ſea. For Elymis left the Elemians or Elamites for his ſucceſſors, whence proceeded the Perſians. Aſſur made his abode in Niniue, and impoſed on his ſubiects the name of Aſſyrians (who were rich amongſt all the reſt.) Arphaxad named thoſe of his command Arphaxadians; who at this day are called Chaldeans. Aram had the Arameans (whom the Greekes called Syrians) and that they are now called Lidi, and in times paſt Ludi tooke their deſcent from Ludas. Of thoſe foure ſonnes which Aram had, Vſes dwelt in Trachonite; and in the countrey of Damaſco (ſituate betweene Paleſtine and Syria, ſirnamed Cælen or hallow.) Otrus obtained Armenia: Gether Bactria. Miſas was father to the Miſureans (who dwelt in a fort which is called at this day Praſine.) Sale, Arphaxads ſonne was Hebers father, by whoſe name in times paſt the Hebrews E were called: Heber begat Loctan and Phaleg, who was ſo called, for that he was borne at ſuch time as the land was parted: for Phaleg in Hebrew ſignifieth partage. They that follow were ſonnes of Loctan: Elmodad, Saleph, Azermoth, Erais, Edoram, Vzalis, Dallis, Ebal, Ebimarl, Saphas, Ophir, Euilus, and Iobel: who occupied ſome parcell of that which was about Cophen a riuer of India, and the hither Siria. Hitherto haue we ſpoken of the progenie of Sem, hereafter will I ſpeake of the Hebrewes; of Phaleg the ſonne of Heber Ragaus, by whom was begot Seruch, whence Nachor is deſcended, and of Nachor, Thares, who was Abrahams father, the tenth in accompt from Noe, and borne in the yeere 292. after the Deluge. For, Thares being ſeuenty yeeres old begat Abraham. Nachor at ſixe ſcore yeeres of his age, begat Thares. Nachor was borne to Seruch, when he was about the yeeres of 132. of his life. And Ragaus begat Seruch F when he was thirty two yeeres old, and about thoſe yeeres Phaleg begat Ragaus. But Heber in the 34. yeere of his age, begat Phaleg: (himſelfe begotten by Sela, when he was one hundreth thirty and fiue yeeres old:) which Sela was begotten by Arphaxad, when he was 135. yeeres of age. And Arphaxad was the ſonne of Sem, whom he begat ſome two yeeres after the Deluge. Abraham had two brothers, Nachor and Aram, of whom Aram left Lot for his ſonne, and Sara and Melcha for his daughters, and afterwards died in the land of Canaan in a Citie called Vr, of the Chaldies, where his ſepulchre is to be ſeene euen at this day. His daughters were married, Melcha

CHAP. VIII.

H

How ABRAHAM the Author of our nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certaine countrey of the Chanaanites, which is now called IVDEA.

ABRAHAM hauing no issue, adopted Lot the sonne of Aram his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: he departed out of the countrey of Chaldeis, when he was 75. yeeres old (hauing had commandement from God to depart thence into Canaan) in which countrey he remained, and left the same to his posteritie after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of vnderstanding, and apt to perswade those that gaue eare vnto him, without any default in his foresight and prouidence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first vndertooke to conuince the receiued and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deitie. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, and prooue, that there was but one God, gouernour and maker of all things, and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicitie, it happened vnto vs not by our owne workings, but his holy will. And this obserued and approoued he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea, as also those things, which he saw daily occurre by the influences of the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres: namely, that there was a certaine power that disposed them, and decently administred all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable vnto vs; whereas nothing of himselfe hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiuing should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and counsels of his (seeing the Chaldeans and Mesapotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that countrey, and following the will and fauour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an altar & sacrificed vnto God. Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our father Abraham, although he nameth him not, when he speaketh after this manner. After the Deluge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most iust, excellent, and vpright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestiall bodies. But Hecatæus made more then a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath written of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, heare what he saith of him in the fourth booke of his Histories. Abraham raigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arriued with his army from a countrey situate aboue Babylon called Chaldæa, who a little while after) departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a countrey at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Iudæa, and his posteritie multiplyed therein. In an other treatise I will recite that which is reported of him. The name of Abraham euen at this day, is honourable in the countrey of Damasco, and there is a village to be seene which beareth his name, and is called Abrahams house.

AFTER this (when famine had inuaded the land of Chanaan, Abraham had intelligence that the Ægyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himselfe to retire himselfe towards them: as well to conferre with their Priests (and discourse with them of diuine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in vnderstanding, or reconcile them, if his iudgement were more assured then theirs. A men (to the ende the king ſhould not put him to death, of purpoſe that hee might enioy his wife Sara, who was very beautifull) he deuiſed this excuſe to ſay that ſhee was his ſiſter, charging her that if the matter came in queſtion, ſhee ſhould not faile but confirme the like. But no ſooner came he into Ægypt, but the like fortune encountred them, as Abraham had before time ſuſpected: for the beautie of his wife was ſodainly publiſhed in euery place. For which cauſe Pharao the King of that Nation (deſirous to ſee that with his eies, the which he had heard with his eares) he ſought for, ſent, and luſted after her: but God withſtood this his vnbridled luſt by afflicting the Kings ſubiects with a plague, and his affaires by ſedition. Whereupon taking counſell of the Prieſts what remedy might be vſed, and meanes might be ſought to appeaſe the diuine maieſty, they anſwered him, that this was the cauſe of their afflictions, for that hee thought to haue done
B violence to the ſtrangers wife: whereat being much affrighted, the King firſt queſtioneth with the woman what ſhee was, and who her companion ſhould be: and at laſt reſolued of the truth, hee ſatisfied Abraham, ſaying, hee ſuppoſed her to be his ſiſter, not his wife, and that his purpoſe was not to offer iniurie but ſeeke alliance: ſo giuing him a great ſumme of money, he gaue him leaue to conferre with the moſt excellenteſt & learnedeſt Prieſts among the Egyptians. Whence it came to paſſe, that he grew into great eſtimation in regard of his vertues: for wheras that Nation was diuided into different ſects and opinions, and through mutuall contempt & diuiſion were incenſed the one againſt the other; hee declared that their opinions (different and confuted by themſelues) in reſpect of religion, were moſt vaine and deuoide of all truth. For theſe his diſputations he was held in great regard among them, and eſteemed for a man moſt wiſe, and a per-
C ſonage moſt excellent; not onely in well conceiuing, but alſo in expreſſing and perſwading that which he vndertooke to teach: to theſe moſt gratiouſly imparted he the ſcience of Arithmeticke, and the obſeruation of the celeſtial bodies. For before that Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of thoſe ſciences: but hee tranſported them from Chaldæa into Ægypt, and from thence are they deriued to the Greeks. As ſoone as he returned into Chanaan, he diuided the countrey with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their ſhepherds (as touching the bounding of thoſe paſtures where they fed their cattell) he gaue Lot the choice and election of that countrey which beſt pleaſed him, retaining vnto himſelfe that which was left. Thus pitching his tents neere the mountaine in a Citie called Hebron (which is by ſeauen yeeres more ancient then Tanis in Ægypt) he dwelled there. But Lot choſe the Plaine neere to D the flood of Iordane, not farre from Sodome; which in thoſe daies was a goodly Citie, but at this preſent by the diuine iuſtice and wrath of God is vtterly defaced; ſo that no memorie remaineth thereof. The cauſes of which iudgement ſhall be expreſſed hereafter.

The ouerthrow of the Sodomites by the Syrians.

E AT that time when the Aſſyrians were Lords ouer all Aſia, the eſtate of Sodome flouriſhed in all affluence, increaſed in great riches, and multitude of gallant youthes, and the countrey was gouerned by fiue Kings: theſe were Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus and Balin (each one particularly ſeiſed of his prouince and kingdome.) Againſt theſe the Aſſyrians incamped themſelues, and hauing diuided their armie into foure parts (vnder the conduct of foure gouernours) they waged battell with them; in which the Aſſyrians attaining the day, they impoſed a tribute on the Kings of Sodome; who (after they had for twelue yeeres ſpace performed their dutie and paid their tribute) in the thirteenth yeere reuolted from them. Whereby it came to paſſe that the Aſſyrians leuied a new armie againſt them, vnder the conduct and command of Marphad, Arioch, Chodollogomar, and Thargal, who ſacked all Syria, and extin-
F guiſhed the poſteritie of the Giants. And drawing neere to Sodome, they incamped neere to the bituminous pits (for at that time there were pits in that place) but as ſoone as Sodome was deſtroyed, there aroſe a lake in that place, which (by reaſon of the bituminous matter that flowed in the ſame) was called Aſphaltites, that is to ſay, bituminous: of this lake hereafter wee will ſpeake ſomewhat. But the Sodomites encountring with the Aſſyrians, there was a dangerous skirmiſh fought, wherein many periſhed on both ſides; and the reſt were either ſlaine or taken, amongſt whom was Lot led away captiue, who came thither to aſſiſt the Sodomites.

The yeare of the world, 2031 before Chriſts birth, 1932.

ABRAHAM hearing of theſe things, and mooued, (both with the ſurpriſall of his coſen Lot, as alſo with the ſlaughter of his friends and neighbours) preſently addreſſed himſelfe with all his followers to giue them ſuccours: and ſuch diligence ſhewed he in purſuite of them, that the fift night after hee encountred the Aſſyrians neere to Dan, which is one of the ſources of Iordaine.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. 18. Gen. 14. 15.

Where ſurpriſing them on the ſodaine (vnſuſpicious and diſarmed) hee killed thoſe that were aſleepe without ſuſpicion of his comming, and they that were not yet aſleepe, and lay wallowing in their drunkenneſſe he eaſily defeated and put to flight, purſuing them in ſuch ſort, that the ſecond day after he draue them all into Soba a Citie of Damaſco: declaring hereby, that victory conſiſteth not in the multitude of thoſe that manage their armes, but rather in the courage of thoſe that fight, and that a fewe generous hearts are more worth alwaies, then a faint-hearted multitude. For hee had not with him aboue three hundreth and eighteene of his houſhold ſeruants, and three of his friends, to defeat this huge armie; ſo that whatſoeuer they were that eſcaped out of this ſlaughter by flight, returned vnto their houſes with ignominie.

On what victorie dependeth.

As ſoone as Abraham had reſcued thoſe priſoners of Sodome which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot; he returned into his countrey, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in a place called the Kings field) where alſo he was entertained by the King of Solyma called Melchiſedech (which is as much to ſay as the iuſt King:) for in truth he was no leſſe; but was held worthy by reaſon of his iuſtice in all mens opinion to ſacrifice as the high Prieſt of Almightie God. This Solyma in proceſſe of time was called Ieruſalem. This Melchiſedech did friendly entertaine all the followers of Abraham, not ſuffering them to want any thing that was fit for their ſuſtenance, but entertaining him alſo at his owne table he highly praiſed him, and ſung due hymnes of praiſe to the great God, for that by his fauor he had vouchſafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other ſide preſented him with the tenths of his ſpoiles: but the King of Sodome remitted all the pray that was taken, and onely required to be poſſeſſed of thoſe Captiues which were of the countrey: which condition hee accepted not, anſwering that hee would receiue no profit of that pray, but that which hee muſt needly haue for the entertainment of his ſeruants. Yet gaue hee a portion vnto his friends who had ſuccoured him, the firſt whereof was called Eſchol, and the two other Ennerus aud Mambres. For this cauſe God praiſed Abraham ſaying; thou ſhalt not want the reward which is due vnto thee for thy valiant actes. To which he replied, and what good ſhall I reape of this recompence, if I haue not an heire to poſſeſſe it after my deceaſe? for as yet hee had no iſſue. Then did God promiſe him a ſonne, whoſe poſterity ſhould be ſo multiplyed, that they might in number equall the ſtarres of heauen; which when he vnderſtood, hee offered ſacrifice vnto God, following that commandement which hee had receiued: hee tooke therefore a Heifer of three yeeres old, a Goate of three yeeres, and a Ramme of three yeeres, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon: all which he diuided in twaine as he was commanded, the birds onely excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at ſuch time as the fowles houered about to haue part of the blood of thoſe beaſts which were ſacrificed) hee receiued an Oracle, that tolde him that his progenie ſhould haue euill neighbours in Ægypt for the ſpace of foure hundreth yeeres, and that after they had ſuffered an inſupportable ſeruitude, they ſhould at laſt obtaine the victorie ouer their enemies. And after that they had by ſtrong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they ſhould be Lords and poſſeſſors of their countries and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt neere to the Oake that was called Ogis, in the countrey of Chanaan neere to the Citie of Hebron. There being much grieued that his wife conceiued not, hee beſought God to giue him an iſſue male: God commanded him to bee of good cheere in all things, and that beeing come from Meſopotamia vpon good occaſions, hee alſo ſhould haue children. At that time Sara by the commandement of God cauſed one of her handmaides which was an Ægyptian borne to enter in vnto her husband, to the end he might haue iſſue by her; now Agar as ſoone as ſhe perceiued that ſhee had conceiued, began to contemne Sara, aſpiring to principalitie, and ſuppoſing that her iſſue ſhould ſucceed in the kingdom. For which cauſe Abraham deliuered her vnto his wife, to the end ſhe ſhould puniſh her: which ſhe perceiuing, ſhe decreed to flie, in that ſhe was afraid of puniſhment; beſeeching God to haue mercy on her: and as ſhee trauailed on her way thorow the deſart, the Angel of God appeared vnto her, cõmanding her that ſhe ſhould returne

To this commandement of God Agar ſubmitted her ſelfe with all obedience, and returning backe againe to her Maſter and Miſtris, ſhee obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Iſmael, which is as much to ſay as, Heard of God, becauſe God had heard the mothers prayers. Iſmael was borne to Abraham when he was foureſcore and ſix yeares old : but in the foureſcore and nineteenth yeare of his age God appeared vnto him, and tolde him that hee
B ſhould haue a ſonne by Sara, charging him to call him Iſaac ; giuing him to vnderſtand, that great nations and kings ſhould iſſue from his loines, who by force of armes ſhould conquer all the countrey of Chanaan, from Sidon euen vnto Ægypt. Commanding him, that his poſteritie ſhould bee circumciſed in their priuities, and that this circumciſion ſhould bee done the viii. day after their birth, by reaſon that hee would not that Abrahams poſteritie ſhould be intermedled with other nations. But hereafter will I declare the cauſe of our circumciſion. Abraham alſo asked counſell of God as touching Iſmael, whether he ſhould liue or no : who tolde him that he ſhould flouriſh many yeares, and that he ſhould become a father of many worthy nations. Then gaue Abraham thanks vnto God, and preſently circumciſed himſelfe, his ſonne Iſmael, with all his family : and Iſmael at that time was thirteene yeeres olde, but Abraham about foureſcore and

CHAP. XII.

The puniſhment of Sodome.

ABOVT that time the inhabitants of Sodome became immeſurably proude, by reaſon of their affluence, proſperitie, and great riches ; and committed outrages againſt men, and impieties againſt God : in ſuch manner as they had forgotten the benefites which they had receiued at his handes, hating ſtrangers, and diſdaining to conuerſe the one
D with the other, but in diſordinate and abhominable inceſts. Whereat God beeing diſpleaſed, hee decreed to puniſh their intolerable pride, to ruinate their Citie from the toppe to the bottome, and in ſuch ſort to make deſolate their countrey, that from thence forward it ſhould neither nouriſh plant, nor bring forth fruite. After that God had pronounced this ſentence againſt the Sodomites ; Abraham (as he ſat vnder the Oake at Mambres before the doore of his tent) behelde three Angels, and ſuppoſing them to bee men and ſtrangers, hee aroſe and ſaluted them ; and approching neere vnto them, hee deſired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condiſcended, hee commaunded his ſeruants to bake them bread of the fineſt flower, and hauing killed and roſted a calfe, hee ſet it before them (as they ſate vnder the Oake) ſuppoſing they would eate : but they inquired of him
E where Sara his wife was : to whom he anſwered that ſhe was within in the tent. They tolde him then that they would returne againe ; and that they ſhould find her a mother. But when his wife ſmiled thereat, and ſaid that it was impoſſible for her to beare children ; eſpecially in that her ſelfe was at that time 90. yeares olde, and her husband 100. they diſcouered themſelues, and ſaid they were angels of God, and that they were ſent one of them to aſſure him that he ſhould haue a ſonne ; the other two to deſtroy the Sodomites. Which when Abraham heard, hee was ſorrie for the Sodomites, and ariſing, beſought God that hee would not deſtroy both the iuſt and the vniuſt together. To whom God gaue this anſwere, that there was not one iuſt man among the Sodomites, and that if hee might but find tenne, hee would ſpare the city from puniſhment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entred into Sodome : where no ſooner
F were they arriued, but Lot inuited them to take their lodging in his houſe (for hee was a man much giuen to hoſpitalitie, and ſuch a one as for bounty had beene Abrahams ſcholler.) But the Sodomites perceiuing that thoſe young men which were entred Lots houſe, were of excellent beautie, began to offer outrage and villany to their perſons : notwithſtanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themſelues, and not to offer villanie to his gueſts, but in ſome ſort to haue a reſpect to his houſe : telling them, that rather then they ſhould continue in that intemperance, hee would giue them his daughters to vſe at their pleaſure. But hee preuailed nothing with them: whereupon God was in such wise prouoked by their iniquitie, that hee blinded their eyes in such sort, as they could not finde the gate to enter into Lots house, and condemned the Sodomites to a generall perdition. But Lot foremonished by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and tooke with him his wife and his two daughters as yet vnmarried (for their betrothed husbands, although they were forewarned by him, conteńed and held him for a dotard.) Then did God shoote his arrow vpon the Citie, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and desolating by the same fire all the countries round about; in such sort as it hath already beene declared by me in the History I wrote of the warres of the Iewes. But Lots wife, as they retired thence; looking backe towards the City, and more curiously beholding the destruction thereof, contrary to the commandement of God, was transformed into a pillar of salt, which I haue seene: for it remaineth euen vntill this day. As touching Lot, hee and his daughters fledde and dwelt in a little countrey farre from the fire, which was called Zoar (which in hebrew signifieth little:) In this place) which was voyd of men, and scant of victuals) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a solitary and poore life: and his daughters supposing that all mankind was extinguished vpon the earth, subtilly circumuenting their father, they lay with him when he least suspected it: and the reasons that drew them thereunto was, for that they feared least mankind should be vtterly exterminated. By this their approachment, they bare him two sonnes: the elder Moab (which is as much to say as of my father) and this is hee that was the father of the Moabites, which euen at this day are yet a great nation: and of the yonger sister, came Ammon (which signifieth the sonne of Race or kind) and both these two nations inhabite the countrey of Cœlosyria. In this sort departed Lot from the Sodomites.

The interpretation of the names of Moab and Ammon. Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 20. Genes. 19.

As touching Abraham, hee went and dwelt in Gerar, in the countrey of Palestine; leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his sister; vsing the same subtiltie which before time hee had practised for feare of the Ægyptians:) for hee feared Abimelech the King of that countrey, who surprised with the loue of Sara, would haue rauished her, had he not bin hindred by a most grieuous sickenesse, which God inflicted vpon him: so that beeing out of all hope of recouerie, at such time as he slept, there appeared vnto him a vision, which told him that he should take heede lest he offered any outrage to the strangers wife, who was come into his countrey: and after he was somewhat recouered, hee tolde his friends how God had sent him that sickenesse to warrantize the right of the stranger, and to preserue his wife from violence; for that she was not his sister but his lawfull wife; willing Abraham thenceforward to bee of good cheere, promising him that the honour of his wife was inuiolate. This said, hee dismissed Abraham by the counsaile of his friends; and tolde him that he needed not to suspect his wife, by reason shee had suffered no villany. Assuring him that God had care of her, and that he deliuered her in safetie to him (beeing to that end protected by his mighty power) and in confirmation thereof hee called God to record, and the womans conscience, vowing that hee would not haue required her, if hee had knowne shee had beene married: moreouer he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appease Gods wrath, which was kindled against him. And that if thence forward hee would stay with him, he should want nothing: or if he lifted to depart, he promised him guides, and all other things, for which he came vnto him. Abraham answered him, that he had in no sort dissembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife; but that she was his brothers daughter, and that he thought he might not safely trauell thorough his countrey, except hee had vsed that subtiltie; auowing moreouer that he had not beene the cause of that sickenesse which had befalne him: but that he singularly affected his good, and was readie to abide with him.

Abimelech surprized with the loue of Sara.

Whereupon Abimelech imparted vnto him both lands and money, and accorded to conuerse with him in all vprightnesse, and without offer of offence, and made a couenant and sware vnto him by a certaine pit which was called Bersabe (that is to say, the pit of swearing or couenant) which name that place retaineth vntill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a sonne by Sara his wife according as God had promised him, and hee called his name Isaac (which in the Hebrew tongue signifieth laughter) because Sara laughed at such time as God sayd vnto her shee should beare a sonne, hauing in her selfe no likelihood of conceiuing, by reason shee was striken in yeeres. For at that time she was ninetie yeeres old, and Abraham one hundreth when the child was borne, and incontinently the eight day after was he circumcised; which custome is yet continued amongst the Iewes, who circumcise on the eight day.

BVT the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth yeere. For Iſmael the author thereof, and Abrahams ſonne by the concubine, was circumciſed in the thirteenth yeere after he was borne. Of which Iſmael it behoueth we ſpeake more exactly in this place. Sara loued Iſmael (begotten on her ſeruant Agar) from the beginning, with no leſſe affection then as if he had beene her owne ſonne, for he was brought vp as Abrahams heire. But after ſhe had brought forth Iſaac, ſhe thought it no more requiſite that Iſmael ſhould be brought vp with her ſonne, in that he was elder, and for feare leaſt after his fathers deceaſe, he ſhould offer his yonger brother iniurie. She incited Abraham therefore to ſend both him and his mother to ſome other place: but at the firſt he gaue no eare to Saraes requeſt, thinking it to be more then barbarous crueltie, to driue away a tender childe and his mother, deſtitute of all neceſſaries. At length by the commandement of God he liſtned to his wiues counſell, and committed the childe vnto his mother (being of himſelfe as yet vnapt to trauell) and giuing them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to goe thither, whither their neceſſitie ſhould driue them. And when their victuals failed them, and their water was conſumed, ſhee laid the childe being faint and weake vnder an Oake; and to the end that in her preſence he ſhould not breath his laſt, ſhe went far away from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared vnto her, ſhewing her a fountaine hard by that place, and charging her to looke to the carefull education of her childe: becauſe that by the conſeruation of Iſmael, ſhe was to expect great happineſſe. Of ISAAC ABRAHAMS legitimate ſonne.

AS touching Iſaac, Abraham loued him with an intire and fatherly affection; as his onely begotten ſonne engendered in his age by the bountie of God. The childe alſo addicting himſelfe vnto all vertue, carefull to honour his father and mother, and ſtudious of the ſeruice of God, inuited both his parents the rather to affect and loue him. So that Abraham was very deſirous to forſake this preſent life: prouided, that he might leaue behind him all the goods which he had, vnto his ſonne; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (vnder triall and conformitie of his faith) God appeared vnto him, and reckoned vp all the benefits which he had beſtowed on him, how he had granted him victorie ouer his enemies and how (he had eſtabliſht and bleſt him with preſent felicitie by his fauour) for which cauſe he required him to ſacrifice and make an oblation vnto him of his ſonne Iſaac, commanding him that he ſhould conduct him to the mountaine of Morea, and there to ſacrifice him. In doing whereof, he ſhould manifeſt the deſire he had to ſerue him (in preferring that which was agreeable to God before the life of his ſonne.) Abraham ſuppoſing that it was no waies lawfull to diſobey God, but that he ought to ſubmit himſelfe to his will, as to him by whoſe prouidence all things had their being) ſaid nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his ſonne.

taine (vpon which afterward king Dauid appointed that the Temple ſhould be builded.) They carried with them alſo the reſt of thoſe things which were requiſite for ſacrifice (ſaue onely the beaſt that was to be offered) now about this time, Iſaac was fiue and twentie yeeres old, and did himſelf prepare the Altar, and inquired of his father what he ſhould offer, conſidering that as yet they had no ſheepe for ſacrifice. Abraham anſwered him, that God would furniſh them, who was of power ſufficient, to giue men that in abundance whereof they had need, and to depriue them of that they had, and whereof they held themſelues throughly poſſeſſed: and that it was he would giue them wherewith to ſacrifice (if it ſhould pleaſe him to ſhew himſelfe fauourable, and propitious to that ſacrifice of his) now as ſoone as the Altar was made readie, and the wood prepared and laid vpon the ſame, and all things were in readineſſe, he addreſſed his ſpeech vnto his ſonne and ſaid thus.

Abrahams oration at ſuch time as his ſonne ſhould haue beene ſacrificed.

My ſonne, I haue oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that he ſhould giue thee life, by my infinite interceſſions and prayers, and euer ſince thou wert borne into this world, I haue intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither haue I thought that in any thing I might be made more happy, then that departing out of this world, I might ſee thee at mans eſtate, and leaue thee the heire and Lord of all my ſubſtance: but ſince it hath pleaſed God, that I ſhould be thy father, and that the ſame God likewiſe now thinketh good that I ſhould forſake thee, put vpon thee a conſtant minde, and take in good part that thus thou muſt be ſacrificed; for in ſo doing I fulfill the commandements of God: who requireth at our hands that we doe him this honour, for the fauours which he hath beſtowed vpon me, in aſſiſting me, and in familiar manner conuerſing, and aſſociating me both in warre and peace. Since therefore that being borne, thou art to die, (not after the accuſtomed manner of the liuing) but being offered in ſacrifice by thine owne father, to the generall father, God: I deeme it reaſonable, that ſince it ſeemeth good vnto him that thou depart out of this life (not by ſickneſſe, nor by warre, nor by any other inconuenience, that naturally happeneth vnto men) that it is behoufefull alſo that thou render thy ſoule vnto him in the midſt of prayers, and the celebration of this ſacrifice, to the end he may receiue and ſeate thee neere himſelfe: Thou ſhalt be my purueyor and ſtay of mine age (which is the cauſe for which I haue nouriſhed thee, if thou leaue mee God for my purueyor and comfort in thy place. Then Iſaac with a noble heart (like the gracious ſonne of ſo godly a father) heard all that which his father ſaid with great contentment, and aſſured that he would rather neuer haue beene borne, then he ſhould once neglect the ordinance of God and of his father: or ſhew himſelfe negligent to ſubmit his will to both their pleaſures, conſidering that if his father onely ſhould command the ſame, he ſhould doe very euill if he diſobeyed him: which ſaid, he marched towards the Altar, and offered himſelfe to the ſlaughter: which had ſurely happened at that inſtant, if God had not regarded him: for with a loud voice he called Abraham by his name, commanding him that he ſhould not kill his ſonne, auerring that he had not giuen him that commandement, becauſe he tooke pleaſure in humane bloud, neither for that by ſuch impietie he would depriue them of that ſonne, of whom it was his pleaſure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to proue his affection, to ſee whether being commanded ſuch a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made triall of his faith and readineſſe, and his vnſpeakable pietie, he did not repent him of that good he had done vnto him: that the time ſhould neuer be wherein he would forget to haue care of him, and his race, whenſoeuer he ſhould pray vnto him, and that when the courſe of his yeeres were happily ouerpaſt, he ſhould leaue a great ſigniory to thoſe of his children, which ſhould be good and legitimate. He tolde him moreouer, that he would multiply the race in diuers Nations, and that he would beſtow great benefits vpon them, and that the memorie of the chiefe of his of-ſpring ſhould be enuied by all men for their greatneſſe. After that God had ſpoken after this manner, it pleaſed him on the ſodaine (no man knoweth how) to cauſe a Ramme to be ſeene, and found thereabouts for the ſacrifice. And thus (being deliuered from all euils and inconueniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard ſo many promiſes of ſo many bleſſings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the ſacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in ſafety, and paſt the remnant of their liues in happineſſe, God giuing them his bleſſing in whatſoeuer they vndertooke.

Genes. 7. 25 1.

AFter this, Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had sixe children, strong in trauel, and excellent in wisedome: namely Zembranes, Iazar, Madar, Madian, Lousoubac, Suus, who likewise had sonnes; Suus had Sabacan and Dadanes. Of Dadanes issued Latusimus, Assurus, Luures. The children of Madian were Epha, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldas. Of all these children and their successours Abraham gathered and established the Colonies which possessed the country of the Troglodytes, & all the country of Arabia the happy, whose confines extend euen vnto the red sea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libya and possessed the same: & that his successours (making their abode in that country) called it by the name of A rica.

Libya called A rica.

C And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhistor who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the Prophet who is also called Malchus, and hath written the acts of the Iewes (according as Moses their law-maker hath compiled the same in writing) saith, that of Chetura there were diuers children borne vnto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit Apher, Surim and Iapher; and that of Surem the Assyrians tooke their name: of the two others Apher and Iapher, the Citie of Affricke and the countrey of Africa take their names. That they warred with Hercules against Libya and Antæus, and how Hercules hauing taken Ophra his daughter to his wife, had begotten of her Dedor who was father to Sophon, from whom those Barbarians that are called Sophaces haue taken their name.

D yeares old, sent the oldest seruant of his family to betrothe and intreat for Rebecca the daughter of the sonne of Nachor his brother for Isaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with great oathes (celebrated according to these Ceremonies, which were that laying their two hands one ore anothers thighes, they should call God to witnesse of their intent) hee sent also strange presents vnto them, such as were seldome seene in those parts: hee then departing from him was long time vpon the way (because that in winter time it is troublesome to trauel through Mesopotamia, by reason of the deep bogs, and in sommer for want of water) besides the robberies of the country, which strãgers & trauellers could not possibly escape, except they stood vpõ their guard, and had conuoy. Hereupon at length he arriued and entred a City called Carras, & being in the suburbes of the same, hee encountred with diuers damsels that went to fetch water, where-

E upon he inwardly besought God, that if the marriage were pleasing in his sight, he might find Rebecca amongst them, for whose cause Abraham had sent him thither to require her in mariage for his sonne: and that he might know her by this signe, that asking all the rest for water, they should refuse him, and she only should satisfie him. Tormented and tossed with these thoughts, he approched the Wel, & required those virgins that they would giue him drink, which they denied him saying, that they could not get water but with great labour, which they must beare into their houses, and not lauishly bestow one others: whereupon one amongst them reproued the rest for that discourtesie, which they vsed towards the stranger; saying that they had neuer beene conuersant amongst men, that refused to giue him water that requested it, wherupõ she gaue him drink with an amiable countenance: and he conceiuing good hope of all his businesse, yet being further desi-

he had heard, perceiuing manifeſtly how God had proſpered his iourney. Whereupon drawing

Rebecca growes acquainted with Abrahams ſeruant.

To this Rebecca anſwered, that he had reaſon to conceiue a good opinion of her Parents hu-manitie, but yet did in ſome ſort preiudice them in ſuſpecting their liberality, aſſuring him that his entertainement ſhould in no ſort be mercenary but voluntary, and free and according to their affection. Yet firſt (ſaid ſhe) I will certifie my brother Laban hereof, and afterwards guide and entertaine you in our houſe: which done, ſhe conducted him into their tent, commanding her brother Labans ſeruants to take care of his Camels, as for himſelfe ſhe entertained and feaſted him at I her brother Labans table.

When ſupper was paſt, he ſpake both to the brother and mother of the virgin after this manner. Abraham the ſonne of Thares is your couſen. For, Nachor (good miſtris) the grand-father of your children was Abrahams brother of one and the ſame father and mother. He now ſendeth me vnto you, requiring you to giue this Damſell for wife to his legitimate and onely ſonne, educated & brought vp to be heire of all his ſubſtance: whom although he might haue matcht with the richeſt maidens of his countrey, yet hath hee refuſed all of them, deſiring rather to impart this honour to one of his kindred and nation: ſet not light therefore his good affection and de-ſire. For, beſides all other bleſſings and good fortunes, which haue happily befallen mee in this my iourny, I haue by Gods eſpeciall prouidence, found out both the maid, and your houſe. For, K at ſuch time as I drewe neere the City and beholding many virgins that went a watering, I be-ſought God that I might light vpon this maiden, and he vouchſafed me my deſire: Ratifie therefore on your part this mariage contracted by Gods prouidence, and honour Abraham in granting your conſent by this your daughters mariage, whom I am ſent to requeſt at your hands, with moſt intire affection. Now they in that they both allowed a thing ſo behoufefull, and perceiued alſo that it was conformable to the will of God, they ſent their ſiſter vnto him vnder the conditions demanded: and Iſaac then married her at ſuch time as he had the managing of Abrahams affaires, by reaſon that the other ſonnes of Abraham were already departed to take poſſeſſion of their Colonies.

AFTER the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Iſaacs wife) waxed bigge with childe, and the time of her reckoning beeing neere at hand, Iſaac was ſore troubled, and ſought counſell at Gods hands: who anſwered him, that Rebecca ſhould bring forth two twins, and that of thoſe two ſonnes, two nations ſhould be deriued, both which ſhould be called by their names, and that he who ſeemed to be the leaſt of them, ſhould growe to be the greateſt: not long time after

A after (according as God had foretold him) ſhe was brought to bed of two twinnes, the eldeſt of whom was very hairy from the top of the head vnto the ſoale of the foote: and at ſuch time as he iſſued out of his mothers wombe, his younger brother held him by the heele, the Father loued the elder, who was called Eſau, and Seir by reaſon of his haire, (which the Hebrewes call Seir in their language) but the younger who was called Iacob, was deerely beloued by his mother. The yeare of the world, 2124. before Chriſts Nativitie, 1840.

Now for that a great famine raigned in that countrey, Iſaac (hauing reſolued to retyre himſelfe to Egypt, by reaſon of the abundance and plenty of that countrey) hee went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place king Abimelech receiued and entertained him (according to the law of hoſpitalitie, and the league of friendſhip which was betwixt Abraham his father and him.) In the beginning therefore, hee ſhewed vnto him great ſignes of B friendſhip; but afterwards, the enuy he had conceiued, hindred him from perſiſting in the ſame: for perceiuing that God was fauourable vnto Iſaac, and had an eſpeciall care ouer him, hee draue him out of his countrey: but hee perceiuing well that enuy had altered him, and that Abimelech began to be changed, hee retyred himſelfe not farre from Gerar into a place called the Straights; and as hee there digged to finde out a watering, Abimelechs ſhepheards came and ſet vpon him, & hindred him in ſuch ſort as he could not finiſh his purpoſe: and for that hee purpoſely retyred from them, they verily ſuppoſed they had gotten the victorie: Anon after, when hee began to digge in another place, other ſhepheards of Abimelech, outraged him anew, as at the firſt: for which cauſe hee left this fountaine imperfect alſo; expecting with ripe iudgement a more conC uenient opportunitie, which was afterwards offered him by reaſon that the King gaue him leaue to digge, whereupon hee laboured out a fountaine, and called it by the name of Rooboth, which ſignifieth large. And as touching the other two, hee called the firſt of them Eſcon, which is as much to ſay as ſtrife: and the other Sienna, which ſignifieth hoſtilitie.

Thus increaſed he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech ſuppoſing that his affluence would be many waies hurtfull vnto him, and remembring himſelfe that he had not faithfully entertained friendſhip with him, but in ſome ſort giuen occaſion of ſuſpicion, by meanes of ſome hard meaſure: fearing leaſt hereafter the iniuries freſh in memorie, ſhould more diſtract him then their olde and auncient plighted friendſhip; and miſdoubting his reuenge, hee repaired vnto him, and contracted a new league of amitie with him, leading with him one of his D chiefeſt captaines, as an abiter betweene them, by whoſe meanes hee obtained whatſoeuer hee required: ſo courteous was Iſaac, and ſo ready in memorie of his fathers olde couenant to forgiue new iniuries. And ſo Abimelech hauing obtained his purpoſe, returned to his houſe. Eſau one of the two ſonnes of Iſaac (whom the father eſpecially loued aboue all the reſt) hauing attained the age of forty yeares, tooke to wiues Ada the daughter of Edom, and Alibama the daughter of Eſebeon, two princes of the Chanaanites (and that of his owne authoritie; without his fathers aduiſe or priuitie; who would not haue conſented, had the matter beene remitted vnto him, becauſe he held it inconuenient to mixe and ioyne him, or his, in affinitie with any dwellers or inhabitants of the countrey.) This notwithſtanding, hee would not diſpleaſe his ſonne by commanding him to giue ouer his wiues: but determined with himſelfe to conceale and keepe E the matter ſilent.

When Iſaac was waxen olde and wholly depriued of his ſight, he called for Eſau his ſonne and ſaid vnto him: that although he had not any default or blindneſſe in him, yet his age would hinder him to doe that ſeruice, which hee both ought and wiſhed to doe: and therefore hee willed him to goe on hunting, and that hee ſhould make ready ſome meate for him that hee might eate, and after his repaſt, hee might pray vnto God that it would pleaſe him to be aſſiſtant vnto him all his life time, and bee a comforter and aide vnto him: proteſting moreouer, that ſince he was vncertaine of the houre of his death, hee thought good to bleſſe him, and by his prayers to procure Gods mercy towards him, before hee ſlept with the dead. Hereupon Eſau went on hunting: but Rebecca in the meane time (deſirous that Iſaacs bleſſing ſhould light vpon her ſonne Iacob) contraF rie to her husbands intent and minde, commanded him to goe, and kill two kids, and prepare a repaſt for his father. Iacob beeing obſequious and obedient to his mother in all things, fulfilled her command, and as ſoone as the meate was ready, hee wrapped his armes and couered his hands with the Goats skins; hoping by the hairineſſe thereof, to make his father beleeue, that hee was Eſau. For beeing his brother at one and the ſame birth, hee reſembled him in all things except in this thing onely: but fearing leaſt hee ſhould bee ſurpriſed in his ſubtiltie before his father Iſaac had finiſhed his prayers, and in ſtead of his bleſſings he might be loaden with his curſes, hee prepreſented the meat vnto his father. But Iſaac perceiuing ſome alteration in his voyce, called his ſonne, who ſtretching out his hands vnto him couered with the kids skinnes, Thou art (ſaith hee) more like vnto Iacob in thy voice; but by thy hairineſſe, thou ſeemeſt vnto me to be Eſau. Thus ſuſpecting no deceit, and hauing already eaten, hee addreſſed himſelfe to pray, and called vpon God ſaying. O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou haſt promiſed great bleſſings vnto my father, and haſt giuen me many and preſent felicities, and haſt vowed that thou wouldſt be mercifull vnto my poſterity, and plentifully powre vpon them more & more ample benefits: let this thy fauour, I beſeech thee, be continued towards me; neither deſpiſe thou me by reaſon of this my preſent weakeneſſe, which is the cauſe that I haue more neede of thy helpe. Saue and keepe this my ſonne by thy clemency, warrantize him from all euill, giue him a happy life, and poſſeſſion of al bleſſings & benefits which are in thy power to beſtow vpon him: make him fearfull to his enemies, and gracious to his friends. Thus prayed hee vnto God, thinking he had bleſſed Eſau. Scarce had he finiſhed his prayers, but Eſau returned from hunting, which though Iſaac perceiued, he was no waies moued with diſpleaſure, but helde himſelfe ſilent. Eſau beſought him that he might obtaine as much as he had vouchſafed his brother: but Iſaac denied him, in that he had beſtowed all his bleſſings vpon Iacob: for which cauſe Eſau lamented and wept. His father (amated and mooued by his teares) foretold him that he ſhould excell in hunting, in force of body, in armes, and other ſuch exerciſes, whereby he ſhould purchaſe immortall glory both to himſelfe and his poſterity, yet notwithſtanding that he ſhould be his brothers vaſſall. But for that Iacob feared leaſt his brother ſhould ſeek to be reuenged of him for robbing him of his fathers bleſſing, he was by his mothers means deliuered from this perill. For, ſhe perſwaded her husband to take Iacob a wife neere allied vnto her, out of Meſopotamia. Eſau at that time had maried another wife called Baſſemath the daughter of Iſmael: for neither Iſaac nor his were well affectioned towards the Chanaanites: but were offended by reaſon of his former eſpouſals. For which cauſe Eſau to giue them contentment married Baſſemath, whom afterward he loued more entirely then all the reſt.

Eſau required a bleſſing.

CHAP. XIX.

Gen. 28.

BVT Iacob being ſent into Meſopotamia by his mother, vnder hope to marry the daughter of Laban, her brother (whereunto Iſaac conſented through the counſaile of his wife) paſſed through the countrey of Chanaan. And for that there was a conceiued and open hatred betwixt Iſaacs people and the inhabitants of Chanaan, he would not take vp his lodging amongſt any of them, but lay abroad in the fields, reſting his head vpon ſtones, which he had heaped together in ſtead of a pillow: and during the time of his reſt, this viſion following was preſented vnto him. It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a ladder, that extending it ſelf from the earth, reached vp vnto heauen, along the ſteps whereof there deſcended certaine reſemblances more excellent to looke on, then the ordinary port of humane nature could impart; and on the top thereof God manifeſtly appeared, and calling him by his name, ſpake vnto him after this maner. Iacob, ſure thou art the ſon of a good father, and deſcended from a grandfather renowned and famous for his great vertue: thou muſt not be daunted, or appauled by thy preſent trauels; but rather bee confirmed in hope of future good hap. For by mine aſſiſtance thou ſhalt be bleſſed, and endowed with many benefits. For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the countrey of Meſopotamia, at ſuch time as he was purſued by his parents: I haue alſo made thy father happy, and will be no leſſe gracious and fauourable vnto thy ſelfe.

Iacobs ladder

God ſpaketh vnto Iacob.

Be confident therefore, and proſecute thy iourney vnder mine aſſiſtance. The marriage which thou purſueſt ſhall haue a happy iſſue, and thou ſhalt haue good children, who in number ſhall grow infinite, and ſhall likewiſe leaue after them a plentifull and famous poſterity, and I will giue them the ſoueraignty ouer this country, both to them and their ſucceſſors, and they ſhall people and repleniſh both the earth and the Sea, as farre as the Sunne enlightneth the world. Let not therefore any danger diſmay thee, nor trauaile diſcomfort thee: for beſides all this, whatſoeuer thou ſhalt vndertake, I will not ceaſe to aſſiſt thee. Theſe things did God foretell vnto Iacob, who very highly reioicing at that which he had ſeene, and that which had beene denounced vnto him, annointed the ſtones on which the promiſes of ſo many bleſſings had beene made, and vowed to offer ſacrifice vnto God on the ſame, if at ſuch time as hee had attained the good hee ſought, he ſhould grant him the grace to returne in health and ſafety into his countrey: which

A as ſoone as he returned backe he performed, offering vnto God the tenth of all that which he had giuen him. And as touching the place where the viſion appeared vnto him he hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth the houſe of God. Continuing thus his iourney into Meſopotamia he trauelled ſo long, till at laſt he arriued at Charran: and hauing met in the ſuburbes of the Citie with certaine ſhepheards and yong men accompanied with yong maidens, ſitting neere to a certaine fountaine, he drew neere vnto them, deſiring them to giue him drinke: and falling in diſcourſe with them, he asked them whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet aliue. All of them anſwered that they knew him well, and that he was a man of that reputation that his name could not be concealed, that his daughter was accuſtomed to feede her flocke with them, and that they wondered B that ſhe was not yet arriued: of whom (ſaid they) thou maiſt perfectly vnderſtand all that which thou deſireſt to know. Whileſt thus they paſt the time in talke, the Damſell drew neere accompanied with her ſhepheards: whom one of the company informed that Iacob was inquiſitiue after her father; who, reioycing after the manner of yong maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what neceſſitie had driuen him thither? wiſhing ſhee had the meanes to ſupply whatſoeuer his neceſſities required. Iacob being ouercome, not by the force of affinitie, or by her good behauiour and curteſie, but with the loue of the maiden, was inflamed ſeeing her ſo faire and matchleſſe in beautie, and ſaid vnto her. If thou art the daughter of Laban there is a greater and more ancient coniunction betwixt both thy father, thy ſelfe and me, then either thy yeeres, or my birth can attaine vnto. For, Abraham, Aran and Nachor, were Thares ſonnes; C Bathuel thy grand-father was Nachors ſonne, Iſaac my father was the ſon of Abraham, and Sara daughter of Aran: there is yet a neerer and dearer bond of friendſhip wherewith we are linked one vnto another. For, Rebecca my mother is ſiſter vnto Laban thy father, borne of one father and mother; ſo that you and I are cooſens: and therefore now am I come at this preſent to ſalute you, and renue that ancient loue which our alliance requireth at our hands. But ſhee remembring her of all thoſe things which her father was wont to report and diſcourſe of Rebecca, and knowing that her Parents were deſirous to heare ſome news from her, ſhe wept for ioy, remembring her of the loue of her father, and hung about his necke, and embraced the yong man, and after ſhe had ſaluted him ſhe ſaid vnto him: Thou bringeſt a moſt deſired & great pleaſure to my father & all his family, who neuer forgetteth thy mother, but oftentimes maketh mention of her: D and would eſteem it a great felicity to heare tidings from her. Then deſired ſhe him preſently to follow her to her father, leaſt any longer he might be depriued of ſo deſired a pleaſure. This ſaid, ſhe brought him vnto Laban, were being acknowledged by his vncle, he both by that meanes liued ſecurely amongſt his friends, as alſo brought him great contentment, by his vnexpected acceſſe vnto them. Some few daies after, this Laban told him that he tooke ſo much contentment in his preſence, that he could not expreſſe it in words, yet required he him to manifeſt the cauſe that had induced him to leaue his father and mother in that extreame age, at ſuch time as they had moſt neede of him, to find him out: Moreouer he promiſed him all aſſiſtance and fauour in whatſoeuer caſe he had to make vſe of him. Whereupon Iacob diſcourſed vnto him the whole matter, that Iſaac had two ſonnes, himſelfe and Eſau, that his brother) in that by his mothers de- E uiſe and counſell, he had defrauded him of his Fathers bleſſing) ſought and deſired to kill him, as he that was the rauiſher of that principalitie from him that was deſtinated vnto him by God, and the ſurpriſer of all his fathers other intended vowes: that this, as alſo his mothers command was the cauſe why he came thither: by reaſon they are all brothers, and by reaſon that in eſpeciall his mother was their neereſt akinne; telling him that next after God hee hoped to finde his greateſt aſſiſtance and helpe by the meanes of his vncle. Whereupon Laban promiſing vnto him whatſoeuer humanitie he could imagine (as well in reſpect of their common auncestors, as for the loue he bare vnto his mother, towards whom although ſhee were abſent, he would expreſſe his good affection, in ſhewing himſelfe well affected towards him that was there preſent:) he told him then that he would giue him the charge of his flocke, and make him maſter ouer all F his ſhepheards, and that when he ſhould thinke good to returne backe againe to his friends, he ſhould depart with ſuch rewards and honours as might well beſeeme a friend ſo neerely allied vnto him as he was. Which when Iacob vnderſtood, he anſwered that he would willingly indure any ſort of labour in Labans ſeruice, and that his deuoire towards him would be a delight to himſelfe, but that in lieu of his labours he required Rachel to wife, who deſerued to be honoured by him with no leſſe title for many cauſes, but in eſpeciall for that ſhe had brought him thither: auowing that the loue which he bare vnto her was the cauſe why he vſed thoſe ſpeeches. Laban (being

marriage, telling him that he could not haue wisht for a better sonne in law: and that if he would soiourne a while with him, he would make him Lord of all that his heart desired, especially for that he was no waies minded to send his daughter among the Chanaanites; and that it repented him, that (by reason of marriage) his sister had beene drawne thither. Iacob condescended vpon these conditions, and couenanted to abide with him for the space of seuen yeeres (for he determined to serue his father in law during that terme of yeeres, to the end that hauing made proofe of his vertue, it might the better appeare what he was.) Now the time which was couenanted betweene them being expired, and Iacob expecting the contented possession of his loue which was promised him, Laban prepared a nuptiall feast, and when the night drew on and Iacob least suspected, he bringeth his daughter lesse faire in face, and more elder in yeeres, and layeth H her by him, who deceiued with the darkenesse, and for that he had drunke liberally, lay with her: but the day after discouering the deceit, he questioned with Laban and accused him, who asked him pardon, alledging the necessitie which inforced him to doe that which he did. For, he had not brought in Lea vnder intent to deceiue him, but that the custome of the countrey compelled him thereunto, yet that the same should no waies hinder him, but that he should enioy Rachel, and receiue, see, and haue vse of her, after seuen yeeres more were fully expired. Herewith Iacob grew pacified, and suffered himselfe to be perswaded (in that the loue which he bare vnto Rachel suffered him to do no otherwaies) and when the other seuen yeeres were expired, he married Rachel. Now, both of these had two chamber-maids which their father had giuen them. Leas maide was called Zelpha, and Rachels Bala, who were no slaues but onely subiects. I Lea was touched with great griefe in that Iacob bare greater affection to her sister then to her selfe, bethinking her oftentimes, that if shee might haue children, she should be better esteemed and beloued by her husband: for which cause shee continually besought almightie God that it might please him to giue her issue: whereupon it happened that God gaue her a sonne, and Iacobs affection was turned towards her, for which cause shee called him Ruben: that is to say, the sonne of vision, because she had obtained him through the mercie of God.

After him she bare three children, Simeon (whose name signifieth, that God had heard her) Leui, (which is as much to say, as the firmenesse of society) and last of all Iuda, (which signifieth loue, by reason of the fertilitie and fruitfulnesse of her sister, caused her chamber-maide Bala to K lie with him, by whom he had a sonne called Dan, that is to say, the iudgement of God: and after him Nepthalim (which signifieth ingenious; by reason that shee vsed subtiltie to requite her sisters subtiltie.) In like sort of Zelpha he begat Gad (which signifieth aduentrous) and after

tude of her progeny.

Rachel brings in Iacob to Bala.

Lea bringeth in Zelpha.

The yeere of the world, 2206. before Christs Nativitie. 1758.

Gen. 31.

Ruben, the eldest of all the sonnes of Lea, brought his mother apples of Mandragora, which when Rachel had perceiued, she desired her to giue her a part thereof in that shee longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yeeld no consent, replying that she ought to content her selfe, in that she had the prerogatiue in loue in respect of both their beloued, which was Iacob. Rachel mollifying the heart of her sister with kinde words, said vnto her, that shee would be content that L Iacob should lie with her for that night: which Iacob performed for the loue of Rachel, and Lea once more had children, namely, Isachar (which signifieth, Come by hire) & Zabulon, which importeth a pledge of good will; besides whom she had a daughter also called Dina. Not long after this, Rachel lay with Iacob, and brought forth a sonne who was called Ioseph, which name signifi-eth an addition. During all this time (which was for the space of twentie yeeres) Iacob had the gouernment of his father in lawes flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanyed with his wiues) to returne to his owne inheritance; which when his father in law perceiued, he would in no sort giue his consent thereunto, for which cause he couertly determined to forsake him.
To this intent he made triall of his wiues to see how they were affected towards his flight: who hartned him by their consents, insomuch as Rachel hauing surprized the Images of those gods M which were honored in that country, fled away with her sister, who both of them led with them all their childrē on both sides, their handmaids, with the rest of al their substance: Iacob also draue away the moity of the cattell without the witting or will of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the Images of the gods, although she had beene taught by Iacob to contemne them and yeeld them no honour: but shee supposed that if Laban pursued and ouertooke them, in hauing recourse to them shee might obtaine pardon. But Laban a day after the departure of Iacob and his wiues had

Iacob with his wiues, children and flockes flie without his fathers priuitie.

Laban pursueth Iacob, but God deliuereth him from his purpose.

A had notice thereof; and being therewith ſore agrieued, hee purſued after them, intending to aſſaile them by force, and on the ſeuenth day he ouertooke them vpon a certaine hill where they ſat them downe to take their reſt, in that it was euening: but God appearing to him in a dreame gaue him counſell to vſe no violence, neither towards his ſonne in law, nor his daughters; but rather to pacifie his yre towards them, and to liſten to a peaceable accord betwixt himſelfe and Iacob: aſſuring him that if in contempt of Iacobs weakeneſſe he ſhould lift vp his arme to aſſaile him, that he himſelfe would ioyne with Iacob to yeeld him ſuccours. The yeare of the world, 2200, before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1758.

The next day, after that Laban had receiued this Oracle from the mouth of God, as ſoone as it was day he called Iacob vnto him, to the end they might conferre together (hiding nothing from him which the night before he had beheld in his dreame. As ſoone as Iacob was come vn-
B to him vnder ſafe conduct, he began to accuſe him; alledging that he had receiued him into his houſe, at ſuch time as he came vnto him being poore and naked of all meanes: and how he had giuen him great abouncance of goods. I haue (ſaith he) giuen thee my daughters in marriage, hoping by that meanes to increaſe thy loue towards me more and more; but thou haſt had neither reſpect of thy mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and mee, neither of the wiues which thou haſt eſpouſed, neither of thy children whoſe grandfather I am; but haſt dealt with me after an iniurious and hoſtile manner, driuing away that which appertained vnto me, ſeducing my daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carry away my houſhold gods with them, which both I and my predeceſſours, haue ſerued and honoured; and euen as much, as men of warre would not haue done vnto their enemies, that haſt thou done vnto me: Labans accuſation againſt Iacob.
C yea thou that art my kinſman, my ſiſters ſonne, the husband of my daughters, my pledge and my familiar ſeruant, haſt dealt thus with me: On the other ſide Iacob alleadged for himſelfe, that God had not onely made impreſsion in his heart, but that all men alſo are wholly addicted to the loue of their countrey; and that after ſo long ſpace of time, it ſeemed good vnto him to viſit his natiue ſoyle. And as concerning that crime (ſaith he) which thou obiecteſt againſt mee, as touching the prey, if any other but thy ſelf be iudge, thou ſhalt be conuicted to haue dealt iniuſtly with me: for whereas thou oughteſt to haue rewarded me, for the maintenance and increaſe I haue made of thy goods, haſt thou not done vs great wrong to enuie vs a little part and portion thereof? And as concerning thy daughters, know this that they haue not followed me by reaſon they haue been conueyed away by ſubtiltie, but vnder that loue and dutie which married wiues beare Iacobs anſwer to Labans obiection.
D vnto their husbands: they doe not therefore onely follow me, but they come after their children. Theſe things alledged he for himſelfe. Further he replyed and accuſed Laban, becauſe that being his mothers brother, and hauing giuen his daughters to wife, he had notwithſtanding bitterly vexed him by his ſeuere commandements, vnder which he had beene obedient during the ſpace of twentie yeares, that the troubles he had endured vnder colour of marriage with Rachel had beene comberſome vnto him; yet notwithſtanding that it was but a trifle in reſpect of that which he ſuffered afterwards; which, had he borne him an enuious affection or hoſtile hatred, he could very well haue eſcaped. In effect Laban had dealt moſt maliciouſly with Iacob. Iacobs accuſation againſt Laban. Labans ſubtill dealing with Iacob.
E For ſeeing that God aſsiſted him in all that he enterpriſed, Laban promiſed to giue him all the cattell that were borne white, and ſometime that which was brought forth blacke: and when as that which Iacob had named and choſen did increaſe, then did not Laban performe his promiſe vnto him, but deferred him ouer to the next yeeres increaſe, by reaſon he had alwaies a reſpect of the greater flocke, and promiſed that which he hoped would not come to paſſe, and which if it fell contrarie, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the gods, he told him that he might make ſearch for them. Labans couenant with Iacob. Gen. 32.

This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel vnderſtanding thereof, thruſt the ſaid gods into a ſacke, and made them to be carried on a Camels backe, and ſhee ſat vpon them, ſaying, that ſhe was indiſpoſed, by reaſon at that time ſhee had her naturall purgations. And for this cauſe Laban deſiſted from ſearching any further, ſuppoſing his daughter being ſo affected would not conceale or ſet her ſelfe ſo neere things that were ſo ſacred: and he made a couenant with F Iacob, that none of them ſhould call to remembrance the interchangeable vnkindneſſes that had paſt betwixt them, but that he ſhould cheriſh his daughters, all which they bound with an oath. This couenant was made vpon a certaine mountaine, where they reared a pillar in the forme of an Altar: whence it came to paſſe that this pillar was called Galaad, that is to ſay, the hill of witneſſe, from whence the countrey of Galaad hath taken his name euen vntill this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banquetted together, Laban returned backe againe into his owne countrey.

But as Iacob trauailed towards the countrey of Chanaan, he encountred many visions, which G presaged vnto him good hope and fortunes to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, the Field of God. And being desirous to know how his brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to sound and gather the exact truth thereof, by reason he stood in feare least the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signifie vnto Esau, that Iacob (deeming it to be a thing inconuenient to liue with his brother, who was displeased with him) had of his owne freewill forsaken the countrey, and that at this present he was vpon his returne, thinking that the length of time were sufficient to procure a reconciliation betweene them. He therefore led with him his wiues and children, with all those riches which God had giuen him; offering himselfe vnto Esau with all that of most esteeme which he had, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to H him, to impart vnto his brother a part of those commodities, which he had receiued at Gods hands. All which they signified vnto Esau, who reioyced very much thereat, and went foorth to meete his brother, accompanied with foure hundred armed men. But Iacob hearing that he marched forward to meete him, attended by so many men at armes, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he prouided for the time, least any detriment should happen vnto him, studying euery way to defend both him, and his, from inuasion. Whereupon diuiding his troupes, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow speedily after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselues to the troupe that followed.

Iacob sendeth messengers to his brother Esau.

Genesis 38.

After this manner hauing ordered all things about him, he sent certaine with presents to his brother, namely with beasts of charge, and a great number of diuers kinds of foure-footed beasts, I (which for their rarenesse might worke more content and admiration in those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountred thus in rankes, they might seeme to be of greater number then they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might serue to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched formost, that they should vse courteous salutation towards Esau. Hauing thus all the day disposed his troupes, as soone as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the riuer of Iaboch: but Iacob, who was left hindmost, was encountred with a vision, in which he wrastled with an apparition, and he became victor.

Iacob reconcileth his brother with rewards.

Iacob wrastleth with an Angel and is called Israel.

Now this vision spake vnto him, exhorting him to reioyce at that which had hapned vnto him, K assuring him that he had not atchieued an easie matter, but that he had surmounted an Angell of God, which was a signe of great good which should befortune him, and that his posteritie should be inuincible, and that neuer man whatsoeuer he were, should ouercome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say according to the Hebrewes, a resister of an Angell. These things were foretold vnto Iacob vpon his request, who perceiuing also that he was an Angel of God, praied him to informe him of that which should happen vnto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Iacob tooke great pleasure thereat, and called the place Phanuel, that is to say, the face of God: and for that in wraftling he had hurt his broad nerue, he afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our nation doe neuer feede thereon. L

Now when he had intelligence that his brother neerely approched him, he commanded his wiues that they should march forward euery one with their handmaidens, to the end that they might from afarre behold the fight of the men, if so be that his brother should assaile them. But himselfe he humbled in reuerencing his brother, who drew neere vnto him, without intent of circumuention: and Esau saluted him, and enquired of him as touching the companies of women and children; and after he vnderstood how all went, he was desirous to lead them to his father. But Iacob excused himselfe, by reason of the wearinesse of his cattell, and Esau retired to Sair where he made his abode, and had imposed that name on that countrey, by reason of his thicke haire. Iacob also retired himselfe to a place, which at this day also is called the Tents, and from thence into Sichem, a city of the Chanaanites.

The History of Dina, Iacobs daughter.

Now at such time as the Sichemites celebrated their feast, Dina which was Iacobs only daugh- M ter, went into the City to see the brauery of the women of that country. But Sichem the sonne of King Emmor rauished her, and deflowred her: and being surprised with her loue, he besought his father that he might take her to wife: who listning thereunto, went vnto Iacob, praying him to ioyne Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his sonne Sichem, Iacob not daring to contradict him by reason of his authority and qualitie; and on the other side, not thinking it to

A be either a thing lawfull, or conuenient to match his daughter with a ſtranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to conſult thereupon. Hereon the king departed, hoping that Iacob would liſten to the marriage. But Iacob hauing diſcouered vnto his ſonnes the rauiſhment of their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, deſired them to deliberate amongſt themſelues what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon ſome held their peace, not knowing what to ſay; but Simeon and Leui (the brothers of the ſame wombe, with their ſiſter) complotted together this practiſe. In as much as it was a feſtiuall, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleaſure and banquetting, they iſſued by night vpon their firſt guards, and killed them that were a bed; and from thence entring into the Citie, they killed all the males (and with them the king and his ſonne) but to the women they offered no violence. Which being executed
B without the knowledge of their father, they brought their ſiſter backe againe. Iacob was very much aſtoniſhed at this accident ſo ſtrangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared vnto him and comforted him, and commanded him that he ſhould purifie his tents, and accompliſh thoſe ſacrifices which he had vowed to performe, at ſuch time when firſt he went into Meſopotamia, and the viſion appeared vnto him. Whileſt then he cleanſed thoſe which followed him, he found the Gods of Laban, which beſide his knowledge Rachel had ſtolne, and hid them in Sichem in the earth vnder an Oake.

Afterwards departing from thence, he ſacrificed in Bethel, where he had ſeene the viſion, at ſuch time as he firſt of all tooke his iourney into Meſopotamia: and as he trauailed in the land of Ephrata, Rachel died in child-bed, and was buried there: and ſhee only hath not enioyed the

After he had made great lamentation, he named the child which ſhe bare at that time, Beniamin, (by reaſon of the dolours which happened vnto his mother.) Theſe are all the children of Iacob, twelue males and one daughter, of whom eight were begotten on his lawfull wiues, ſixe of Lea, and two of Rachel; and on their chamber-maides, foure; two of each of them, whoſe names I haue heretofore recorded. From thence went Iacob to Hebron a Citie of Chanaan, where Iſaac made his abode, and they liued but a ſmall time together, becauſe Rachel was dead and departed from him.

CHAP. I.

How ESAV and IACOB, ISAACS ſonnes, diuided their inhabitance: and how Idumæa fell to ESAV lot, and Chanaan to IACOBS.

The yeere of the world, 2230. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1734.

BVT when Iſaac was dead, the ſonnes diuided their habitations among themſelues, and were neither of them content with that which they inherited by their father: but Eſau leauing the Citie of Hebron to his brother, went and dwelt in Seir; and was Lord of the countrey of Idumæa, which he named by his name (for it was ſurnamed Edom) for the occaſion which followeth. He being very yong, returned one day ſore wearied, trauailed, and hungry from hunting; and finding his brother dreſſing for himſelfe a meſſe of lentill pottage, which were very red in colour, and further increaſed and incenſed his appetite; he required them at his hands, that he might eate them. But he taking the opportunitie and occaſion of his brother Eſaus hunger, conſtrained him to forſake his birth-right, and to ſell him the ſame, on condition, he ſhould giue him what to eate. Eſau then tranſported with famine ſurrendred vnto him his birth-right, and confirmed it with a ſolemne oath. And thereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockery, called him Edom, by reaſon of his red meat: for Edom in Hebrew, ſignifieth Red. His countrey likewiſe was called Edom: but the Greeks, to the end they might make the name more currant, called it Idumæa. He became the father of fiue children, of whom he had three by his wife Alibamma, whoſe names were Iaus, Iolamus, and Choræus: as touching the other two, Aliphaces was the ſonne of Aza, and Raguel of Moſmetha: theſe children had Eſau. Aliphaces had fiue legetimate children, Theman, Omar, Ophus, Iotham, Ocauaxes (for Amelech was illegitimate, borne by one of his concubines, whoſe name was Themana.) Theſe dwelled in that part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitus; and in that part, which by reaſon of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For, Idumæa being in times paſt a land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorough the whole countrey: and the particular prouinces of the ſame, kept the names of thoſe that firſt inhabited the ſame.

The yeere of the woold, 2206. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 1658.

BVT Iacob attained to that felicitie, that ſcarcely any other had beene ſo happy; for he ſurpaſſed all the inhabitants of that countrey in riches: and by reaſon of the vertues of his children, he was both enuied and regarded. For, they were accompliſhed in all perfections, animated and endowed with ſtout hearts; prepared to execute any worke of the hand, and to indure all ſorts of trauell: finally, all of them were furniſhed with knowledge and prouidence. But God had ſuch care of him, and ſo diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which ſeemed vnto him to be griefefull and contrary, he brought to an iſſue proſperous for him, and increaſefull for his riches: and brought to paſſe, that both he and his children were the firſt motiue to our auncestours to forſake the land of Ægypt, for that cauſe which here inſueth. Iacob hauing begotten Ioſeph of Rachel, loued him entirely, both in reſpect of the beauty of his body, as alſo of the ornaments and vertues of his ſpirit: and beſides both theſe, his prudence, wherein he outſtripped all his other brothers. This cordiall affection of his father, mooued enuie and hatred amongſt his brothers towards him. And beſides theſe, the dreams which he had ſeene, and told both to his father and brethren; which foreprophecied vnto him a ſingular felicitie. For, it is the common cuſtome of men to be iealous of their proſperitie, with whom they are familiar.

Gen. 37. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2.

Iacobs ſons hated their brother Ioſeph.

Now the viſions which Ioſeph ſaw in his dreame, were theſe. Being ſent by his father in the company of his brothers, to reape corne in the time of harueſt, he ſaw a viſion (farre different from thoſe which accuſtomably happen in ſleepe) which (as ſoone as he awoke) he told vnto his brethren, to the end they ſhould interpret it. He tolde them therefore, that he thought in his dreame the night paſt, that his ſheafe of corne was ſetled in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs ranne towards his, and worſhipped the ſame. Which viſion of his ſeemed, to foretell him of his ample fortune; and how he ſhould obtaine the Lordſhip ouer all of them. But they concealed all theſe things from Ioſeph, making ſhew that they could in no ſort interpret the dreame: but being by themſelues apart, they breathed forth contrarie imprecations, wiſhing that

A that nothing of that which they interpreted as touching his dreame, might take effect, but perseuering more and more in enuie and hatred towards him. But God (opposing his power against their enuie) sent Ioseph a second and more strange vision. For he dreamed that the Sun, the Moone, and eleuen of the starres descended downe to the earth, and humbled themselues before him. Which vision he reuealed to his father in the presence of his brethren (without suspition of any hatred in them towards him) and besought him to interpret vnto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Iacob, he greatly reioyced at this dreame, by reason hee conceiued in his mind the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his coniectures not rashly, but with prudence) hee reioyced at those great matters which were signified by that dreame: which foretold, that his sonne Ioseph should be highly fortunate, and happy; and that the time
B should come in which his father, mother and brethren should honour him, and worship before him. For, he compared the Moone (which ripeneth and encreaseth all things that grow) to his mother: and the Sunne which giueth forme and force) to his father. And as touching his brothers, who were eleuen in number, he compared them to the eleuen stars, (which receiued their force both from the Sunne and the Moone.) Neither did Iacob without iudgement and consideration so interpret this vision. But, Iosephs brothers were highly aggrieued at this presage, conceiuing as hainously and hatefully thereof, as if this felicity had beene portended to a stranger, and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatsoeuer, beeing as well allied in felicity vnto him as in consanguinity. Whereupon they resolued on his death and destruction, and hauing complotted these counsailes amongst themselues, and gathered
C in their harueſt, they retired themselues with their flockes towards Sichem (which was a part of that countrey) very fit to nourish and feede their cattell, where they kept their flockes without giuing any notice of their departure to their father. But hee perceiuing that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tydings, beeing sorrowfull and carefull of his sonnes, hee sent Ioseph to the flockes, to vnderstand how they did, and how their affaires prospered.

CHAP. III.

How IOSEPH was sold into Egypt by his brethren, and grew in great credit in that countrey: and how his brethren at length were vnder his subiection.

D BVT so soone as they saw their brother comming towards them, they reioyced, not as at the arriuall of one of their household friends sent vnto them by their father, but as if their enemy had encountred them; who by the will of God was deliuered into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let slip the present opportunitie. But Ruben the eldest amongst them seeing their disposition and conspiracie to kill him, endeuoured to dissuade them; setting before their eyes how hainous and wicked the enterprise was, and what hatred they might incurre thereby. For (said hee) if before God and before men it
E bee a wicked and detestable thing to lay hands on, and to murther a stranger: how much more haynous a crime will it bee helde for vs, to bee conuicted to bee the murtherers of our brother? whose death will heape sorrow on our fathers head: and draw our mother into great griefe and desolation through the losse of her sonne, robbed and bereft from her beyond the ordinary course of men. For which cause he prayed them to be aduised in these things, & that they would consider in their mindes, what thing might happen, if this childe, who was faire, vertuous and yong, should bee done to death: praying them to giue ouer this vnnaturall resolution, and to feare God, who was both the Iudge and Witnesse of their deliberation intended against their brother: and that if they would desist from this hainous act, God would take pleasure in their repentance and reconcilement; but if they proceeded in their enterprise, he assured them that he would punish them like fratricides; since nothing is hidden from his prouidence, whether it bee committed in the desart, or attempted in the City. For, whersoeuer men are, there is it alwaies
F to bee thought, that God likewise is. Further, that when they should haue perpetrated this fact, they should alwaies haue their consciences as an armed aduersarie against them, which neuer would forsake them, whether they were good, or whether such as theirs would bee, if they should fortune to murther their brother. Furthermore he alleadged, that it was an impious fact to kill a mans owne brother, although hee had done him iniurie; and much more meritorious to forgiue a mans friend, that had offended against him. Moreouer hee said, that Ioseph had done them no wrong, whose tender yeeres rather required care and compassion at their hands, then hate and tyranny. Besides that, the cause of his slaughter would aggrauate their offence, G if it should be knowen that for enuy of his future felicity they should take away his life, all which good hap they likewise might participate by reason of consanguinity, and that it was their dutie to think, that whatsoeuer blessing God imparted to Ioseph was theirs; and that for that cause they were to imagine, that God would be more displeased against them, if they should endeauour to depriue him of his life, whom he had esteemed and adiudged worthy of prosperity to come. Ruben alledging these and many other things, besought them and laboured to diuert them from shedding their brothers bloud: but seeing that all these his motiues could in no sort mollifie them, but that they hastened the rather to commit and perpetrate the murther; he counselled them that at least wise they should allot him some milder kinde of death. Telling them that he endeuoured all what in him lay at the first to dissuade them: but since it was throughly resolued H among them that he should not liue, that lesse mischiefe should follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counsell; for by that meanes there will should haue effect, yet, a more milde and lesse hurtfull in comparison of murther: that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keep them immaculate by casting him into the next pit, and there leauing him in the hands of death: to this counsell all of them agreed. So Ruben tooke Ioseph and bound him with cords, and let him downe easily into a pit which was drie, which done he departed to seeke out a more conuenient place for pasture.

Gen. 37. 39.

But when Ruben was gone, Iuda one of Iacobs sonnes (espying certaine merchants of Arabia, of the countrey of the Ismaelites, who from the countrey of Galadena carried Spicery and Syrian merchandise into Ægypt) counselled his brothers to draw vp Ioseph out of the well, and to sell I him to those Arabians, assuring them by that meanes it would come to passe that Ioseph should die, the farther off from them amongst strangers; and as touching themselues, they should be exempt from that pollution: which counsell of his being commended by them all, they drew Ioseph out of the pit, and sold him to the Arabians for the summe of twenty siluerlings, at such time as he was seuenteene yeeres of age. Now had Ruben resolued in himselfe to saue Ioseph without his brothers priuity: for which cause coming by night vnto the pit, he called him with a loud voice and seeing that he gaue him no answer, he began to coniecture with himselfe that his brethren had done him to death, he reprooued them therefore very bitterly; but after they had told him what was become of him, he gaue ouer his mourning. After these things were thus brought to passe, the brethren consulted amongst themselues in what sort they might cleere themselus from K their fathers suspition, and concluded among themselues to teare the coat wherewith Ioseph was attired at such time as he came vnto them, and which they had taken from him, when they cast him into the well, to the end that hauing defiled it in the bloud of a Goat, they might afterwards beare it vnto their father and shew it him, to the end he might suppose that Ioseph was slaine by wild beasts; which done, they came vnto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his sonnes misfortunes) and told him that they had not seene their brother Ioseph, neither could they assure him what mishap had befallen him; but that notwithstanding they had found his Ierkin altogether bebloudied and torne, which made them suspect that he was slaine by some wilde beasts, if so be he were sent vnto them attired in that coate.

But Iacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more successefull tidings, in that he supposed L and hoped that Ioseph had only beene captiue) gaue ouer this opinion, and tooke the coat for a most assured testimony of his sonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith at such time as he sent him to his brothers: for which cause he lamented Ioseph, from that time forward as being dead, and as if he had not any more sonnes. And such was the griefe of his heart, that he conceiued no consolation in the rest; but suffred himselfe to be perswaded by the brothers, that Ioseph had beene slaine by sauage beasts: he therefore sat him downe being clothed in sackcloth, and charged with sorrow; and neither could his sonnes by their counsels mitigate his moanes, nor he himselfe remit the rigor of his lamentation.

Iosephs brothers perswade his father that he is deuoured by wilde beasts.

Now Ioseph was sold by the merchants and bought by Putiphar (an Ægyptian Lord, and a steward of king Pharaohs houshold) who held him in high estimation, and trained him vp in all liberall sciences, suffering him to liue not after a seruile, but liberall manner, and committing vnto M his charge the care of his houshold, all which fauours he made vse of. Yet was he no waies diuerted by these his priuiledges and promotions from his innated vertue; testifying hereby, that prudence doth not submit to aduerse fortune, if a man vse the same orderly, and not at that time onely when fortune fawneth and flattereth.

Ioseph is sold in Egypt to Putiphar.

Putiphars wife soliciteth Ioseph to lie with her.

It fortuned not long after, that his masters wife was enamoured with him, both in respect of

A of his beautie, as alſo of the dexteritie and diligence; ſuppoſing that if ſhee opened her minde vnto him, ſhee might the more eaſily enioy him, and that hee might eſteeme it a part of his felicitie, to bee beloued by his miſtris. All which ſhee ſuppoſed and imagined, hauing onely regard of that ſeruile condition, wherein at that preſent hee was, and not of his manners which continued alwaies entire; notwithſtanding any change that could happen vnto him: for which cauſe ſhee diſcouered vnto him her deſire, and deſired him to grant her an amorous encounter; but hee refuſed her demand, aliedging that it were a moſt wicked requitall of him towards his maſter, if it ſhould come to paſſe that he who had bought him, and ſo greatly honored him, ſhould receiue ſo great an iniurie and outrage: for which cauſe he exhorted her, to conquer her appetite, depriuing her of all hope of euer compaſſing her concupiſcence, alledging vnto her, that deſire is then B leſſe actiue when hope is extinguiſhed; auowing that hee had rather ſuffer all the miſchiefes that might bee imagined, then to conſent or condiſcend vnto her in that wickedneſſe. And although (ſaid hee) it bee vndecent for a ſeruant to contradict the will of his miſtreſſe, yet that the filthineſſe of the fact did diſſwade him from attempting the ſame. But this his repulſe did more and more inflame her, for that ſhee ſuppoſed that Ioſeph ſhould not denie her: and her diſordinate affections increaſing daily, ſhee deuiſed and complotted a new meanes in hope to bring her loue to her deſired iſſue.

Putiphars wife complotteth a ſecond ſubtilty to allure Ioſeph.

Whereas therefore a ſolemne and publike feaſt was at hand, wherein according to cuſtome, the Ladies were wont to dignifie the ſolemnitie by their aſſiſtance: ſhe fained a ſickneſſe, perſwading her husband thereunto, hoping by that meanes ſhee might haue the better opportunitie (in C being ſolitarie and alone) to ſolicite Ioſeph: which falling out accordingly (as ſhe had her ſelfe deſired (ſhe began to court and compaſſe him by theſe flattering and fawning allurements and perſwaſions; Telling him that hee had done well if vpon her firſt requeſt he had obeied her without any contradiction, in reſpect of her dignity who required the ſame, & her incredible paſſiō which had ſo farre commanded her, that notwithſtanding ſhee were his miſtreſſe, ſhee ſhould indignifie and forget herſelfe ſo much as to ſolicite him: that now hee ſhould behaue himſelfe more wiſely and better; if in amends of his forepaſſed obſtinacie hee now at laſt would conſent. For if he reſpected this her ſecond ſummons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (ſaith ſhee) I haue fained ſickneſſe to this ende, to ſolicite and preferre thy company before a publike triumph. Or if at firſt thou didſt miſtruſt mee, thou maiſt hereby conceiue that I D doe not maliciouſly tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the ſame affection. For which cauſe either make choice of this preſent pleaſure, and be obſequious to her that loueth thee, vnder hope of further preferments, or bee aſſured of my hate and reuenge if thou preferreſt thy opinion of chaſtitie before my fauour. For bee aſſured that thy chaſtitie ſhall profit thee nothing, if I ſhall accuſe thee to my husband, and auow that thou haſt ſought to violate me: for although thy allegations bee more true, yet ſhall my words bee of more force, and my accuſations more acceptable in Putiphars eares then thine. But neither by theſe words, nor her teares the witneſſes of her vowes, could Ioſeph bee peruerted, neither could remorſe ouerworke him, nor terrour compell him to forſake his purpoſed chaſtitie, but that hee conſtantly reſiſted againſt thoſe iniuſt afflictions, wherewith ſhee threatned him: chooſing rather to ſuffer any miſery whatſoeuer, then E to be priſoned with the poſſeſſion of her offered adulteries, being well aſſured that he was worthy of extreame puniſhment, if on a womans intreatie hee ſhould condiſcend to any ſuch treachery. Hee likewiſe admoniſhed her of her dutie, alledging the lawes, rights, and cuſtomes of matrimonie, willing her rather to reſpect them, then her momentanie luſt: for that the one was ſpeedily followed with repentance, proceeding ſodainly of griefe, not amendment of ſinne, with a continuall and great feare likewiſe, leaſt the fact ſhould be diſcouered: whereas the company ſhee might haue with her husband, was voide of danger, and attended by a conſcience, as well before God as men. Moreouer, that it was more conuenient for her to gouerne and command him as his Lady and Miſtris, rather then to be ſhamed in making him the ſecretary of their common ſinne: for that it is more conuenient to bee aſſured in the confidence of a good life, F then in ſecret to commit ſinne. In theſe and ſuch words ſought hee to abate the brunt of her furious affection, and to reuoke her from her depraued fancies, to ſubmit to the law of reaſon; but ſhee, the more inſtantly he diſſwaded, the more earneſtly inuaded him; and where by no meanes ſhee could peruert him by words, ſhee laid violent hands vpon him, to conſtraine him perforce: but Ioſeph (vnable to indure any longer the intemperancie of the woman, leauing his garment behind him whereby ſhe held him) brake ſodainly out of the chamber. Shee partly impelled by the griefe of repulſe, partly affrighted with feare leaſt her laſciuiouſnes ſhould be made knowne to her husband, decreed first of all falsely to accuse Ioseph, and by this meanes to take reuenge G vpon him; holding it to be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all to accuse her accuser. She therefore sat her downe sad and perplexed, colouring the griefe of her defrauded lust vnder the cloake of indignation for her attempted honour, and violated chastitie. Now when her husband came home, and (being troubled in minde to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof: Liue thou no longer (said shee) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slaue, who attempted to violate thy bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great beneuolence thou hast entertained him, yea who was to be esteemed more ingrate then ingratitude, except euery way he approoued himselfe faithfull vnto thee: yet hath he not forborne to offer iniurie, no not to thine owne wife, and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence; whereby it manifestly appeareth that the moderati- H on which hitherto he pretended, rather proceeded of seruile feare, then natiue modesty. And that which hath the more emboldened him, is in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast fauoured him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiuing that he was preferred before all thine ancient seruants, he thought it lawfull likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy wife: and to procure more credit to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behind him at such time as he sought to violate her.

But Putiphar intangled by the words and teares of a woman, and attributing too much to his wiues dissembling loue, omitting the further and faithfull inquisition of the truth, after he had first of all praised his wiues faith and loyaltie, he cast Ioseph thus condemned of hainous wickednesse into the prison of malefactors, esteeming his wiues chastitie, and commending it the more, I in that he was now made a witnesse of her approoued honestie.

The adulteresse accusation against Ioseph.

Ioseph is cast into prison.

But Ioseph committing his innocencie vnto God, neither tooke care how to excuse himselfe, neither to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessitie of his bonds, he was onely comforted with this one hope, namely, that God was more powerfull, then they that had imprisoned him: whose prouidence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that wherein he imployed him, as also the dignitie of his forme, loosed him out of bonds, and by that meanes in some sort lessned his misery, gi-uing him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of the prisoners had. Now when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labor) conferred together (as men in misery are wont to doe) and questioned among themselues of the cause of their damnation: K a certaine butler neere about the King (condemned by him in displeasure to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Ioseph; and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and prouident man, he told him his dreame, praying him that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that he would expound it vnto him, lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from heauen by dreames. For he said that in his sleepe he beheld three great clusters of grapes, hanging on three seuerall branches of a vine; which were all ripe and ready to be gathered, and that him thought he pressed them into a cup which the king held, and that afterwards hauing strained the Must, hee offered it to the King, and that he willingly dranke thereof: now when he had shewed him his dreame, he desired him that if he had any knowledge giuen him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his L vision vnto him. Ioseph answered him that he should be of good courage, willing him to expect, that within three daies he should be deliuered from his bonds, and be admitted againe to the kings seruice, and restored to his former credit. For he interpreted that the vine bringeth forth a fruit very good and profitable for mans vse, for that by the mediation thereof faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolued: furthermore that troubles and sorrowes were asswaged by the vse thereof, in stead of which pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest mee that the king receiued being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore that thou hast a good dreame offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliuerance from misery within three daies, according to the number of those clusters which thou gatheredst in thy dreame. Remember me therefore I pray thee, as soone as the euent hath approoued this my prediction to be faithfull and vnfained; and when thou art at liberty, forget vs not that are left here M to lie in miserie, who departest to enioy thy foretold felicitie; for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednes, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modestie, in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I liued, and his credit who committed mee to prison, then mine owne pleasure. And thus the butler as it became him, reioyced at the interpretation of his dreame, and expected the euent. Now a certaine other seruant, who had the

A commaund of the kings bakers, and liuing in the ſame priſon with the butler, conceiuing ſome hope through Ioſephs ſo happy interpretation (for that he likewiſe had ſeene a viſion) deſired him to expound vnto him what interpretation was to bee had of a dreame, which hee had the night paſt, which he expreſſed in theſe words. Me thought (ſaid hee) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which, two were repleniſhed with bread, and the other with fleſh (and diuers other kinds of cates, ſuch as are prepared for kings.) Now when hee could in no ſort be ſatisfied by them, the king was the more and more moued: which when the butler apperceiued, hee remembred him of Ioſeph, and of his wiſedome and prudence in theſe ſorts of coniectures; and repairing vnto the king tolde him of Ioſeph and of his viſion, and the euent thereof, which he had whileſt hee was in priſon, together with Ioſephs interpretation; and how the ſame day, the maſter of the bakers condemned to the gallowes, gaue greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept priſoner as a ſlaue by Putifar the maſter of his houſhold, and that he ſaid how amongſt the Hebrewes he was deſcended of good and honourable parents. Command him therefore (ſaid he) to be ſent for, neither deſpiſe the man for his preſent miſerie,

Whereupon the king ſent for him preſently, and friendly taking him by the hand, hee ſpake vnto him after this manner: Good young man, in that I vnderſtand by the report of my ſeruant, that thou art prudent; ſhew me the interpretation of my dreames in ſuch manner as thou diſcouereſt his vnto him, and thou ſhalt doe me a high pleaſure: but beware thou neither conceale any thing for feare, or ſpeake ought for flatterie, or to feede mee with falſhoods, but tell me all things truely, although they ſhall in a ſort breed my diſcontent to heare them. Me ſeemed that I walked by a riuer ſide, & that I ſaw ſeuen well fed and very fat kine, which retyred themſelues from the floud into the paſture: and againe, mee thought that ſeuen others came from the paſture to encounter them, who were very leane and vgly to behold, who when they had deuoured the ſeuen others

But after this viſion being awaked out of my ſleepe, and troubled in my minde, thinking with my ſelfe, what that viſion might ſignifie, beeing ſeized by little and little by a pleaſant ſlumber, I fell aſleepe once againe. And againe, I ſaw a viſion more prodigious then the former, which doth likewiſe trouble and terrifie me the more. For I ſaw ſeuen eares ſprong out of one roote, that hung downe and bowed their heads, becauſe they were loaden with graine ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared ſeuen other, weake, and languiſhing for want of deaw, who deuouring thoſe other great and full eares, left mee highly aſtoniſhed. be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might prouide for themselues, to the end they might more easily preuent the imminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay vp and store the aboundance of the plentifull yeeres, Egypt shall not feele the penurie that shall follow. And when as the king (admiring at Iosephs prudence and wisedome) demanded after what maner he might prouide in the time of plenty, how to preuent and redresse the future sterilitie: hee warned and counsailed him, that the Egyptians should vse parcimony, and that that which remained of those yeares superfluitie, might bee reserued for future necessities. He counselled him also to bind the husbandmen, that they should hoard vp their corne in their barnes, and onely to distribute to the people as much as was sufficient, and no more. Hereupon the king (not onely praising Iosephs counsell, but also his interpretation of his dreames) made him Lord and commissarie of all the store; and commanded him to prouide whatsoeuer hee thought necessarie in that behalfe, either of his owne or of the peoples: assuring him that hee thought no man more necessarie to execute this counsell, then himselfe who was the authour thereof. Hauing therfore this authoritie giuen him by the king to vse his owne signet, and to be cloathed in purple, he was conducted thorow all the country vpon a chariot: and hee assembled the labourers of corne, and distributed to euery one by measure, that which they wanted for seede corne, and for their nourishment, without letting any man vnderstand for what cause he did it.

About this time had he already attained to thirty yeares olde, beeing helde in great honour by the king, and was for his incredible prudence, surnamed by him Psontom phanechus, which signifieth the discouerer of hidden things: he was also honoured with a wife of great dignity, for by the procuration of the king, he tooke to wife a virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan priest, whose name was Asaneth, by whom he begat children also, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manasses, which signifieth Obliuion (because attaining better fortune, he grew in obliuion of his former miserie:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which signifieth Returne, for that he was restored to the libertie of his aunceſtours.) Now when as according to Iosephs interpretation, the seauen yeares of plenty and affluence were ouerpassed in Egypt; the eight yeare of famine beganne to infest the land, and for that the euill was vnexpected, the headlong multitude grieuously trauailed with hunger and misery, began to flocke about the kings gates and garners. Hereon the king called for Ioseph, who presently distributing graine to those that wanted it, became without controuersie, the father and conseruer of the comminaltie. Neither did he only make merchandize with those that inhabited that countrey: but with strangers also, deeming that the whole race of mankinde was allied the one with the other; and that it was conuenient, that such as wanted should be succoured by their meanes, who had better fortune. And because the same calamitie both oppressed Chanaan and other kingdomes of the world, Iacob also sent all his sonnes into Egypt to fetch corne; (as soone as hee vnderstood that strangers also had libertie to traffique in that place) onely with himselfe he retained Beniamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german vnto Ioseph: who as soone as they arriued in Egypt, repaired vnto Ioseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corne, (for nothing was done without his expresse command) for euen then found each man fit occasion to honour the king, when they bethought themselues how to honour Ioseph. Hee taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing lesse then of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and besides, no one of them might suspect that hee had attained to so great dignitie): determined to trie and tempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For hee both denied them his licence to buy corne, & commanded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were gathered of diuers nations, and they fained kinred: for how can it be (saith hee) that a priuat man should bring vp so many worthy sonnes; which felicity scarcely and very seldome is granted vnto kings? This did he, to the end hee might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate hee liued, during the time of his absence; and what was become of Beniamin his brother: for he was sore afraid, least they had offered the same hard measure to the lad, which they had inflicted vpon him. But they were strooken with a mighty feare, bethinking them on their imminent perill, supposing that they had trauailed this long iourney all in vaine: & for that they saw their accusation must be answered; Ruben the eldest of them, began after this maner to plead their common cause. Neither are we come hither (said he) as spies, neither vnder pretence to indamage the king; but dire famine (whose furie we seeke to preuent) hath compelled vs to come into this countrey, grounding our selues on your humanitie; who (as we haue heard) haue not onely made offer of sale of corne, and meanes of sustenance to your citizens: but also

A vnto all ſtrangers. And that we are brothers and borne of the ſame father, our very countenances teſtifie no leſſe,in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our father by name, is Iacob; by nation, an Hebrew: who begat vs his twelue ſonnes on foure women, who while they all were in ſafety, our affaires were fortunate and proſperous: but one of them being dead, whoſe name was Ioſeph,our domeſticall fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our father languiſheth in continuall lamentations, whoſe teares doe no leſſe afflict vs, then in times paſt the vntimely death of our deareſt brother did affect vs. Now are we come to buy corne, hauing left in our fathers cuſtody the yongeſt of our brothers called Beniamin: That thus it is, if ſo thou pleaſe to ſend any one vnto our houſe,thou maiſt be aſſured. Thus ſpake Ruben both on his owne and his brothers behalfe; whereby he might exempt from Ioſeph his ſiniſter opinion of them: who

B knowing that both his father and brother were in health,commanded them to be ſhut in priſon, vnder pretence to call them to further examination vpon his better leiſure. Some three daies after (calling them before him)he began thus: Since (ſaith he) you proteſt that you came not hither into this kingdome on purpoſe, either to preiudice the King,or worke treaſons towards the State; and that you pretend your ſelues to be the ſonnes of one father: you ſhall induce me to beleeue that your allegations be true, if leauing ſome one with me as pledge of your loyalties (who ſhall be wel entertained)you beare hence your deſired corne vnto your father,and returne againe vnto me, bringing with you your brother, whom (as you ſay) you left behind you: for this ſhall be an Argument that you faine not. C themſelues, that the dire reuenge of their brother oppreſſed with vndecent tyranny, was fallen vpon them. Moreouer, Ruben reprehended their too late and vnprofitable penitencie, ſaying, that thoſe afflictions which God (the iuſt reuenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were conſtantly to be borne. After this manner ſpake they one vnto another, ſuppoſing that no man was preſent who vnderſtood the Hebrew tongue: and they all lamented being inwardly touched with the words of Ruben, and condemned their perpetrated wickedneſſe, as if they had not beene the authors of the fact, for which at that time they thought that God did moſt iuſtly puniſh them. Ioſeph beholding them in this perplexitie, vnable to diſſemble any longer his brotherly loue,in that the teares already began to burſt out of his eyes,which at that time he deſired to conceale, he departed from among them.

But Iacobs ſons returning into Chanaan told their father all that which had happened vnto them in Ægypt, and how they were attached for ſpies, and traytors to that countrey; and that when they proteſted that they were brethren,and that the eleuenth was left at home with their father,they would not beleeue them:moreouer that Simeon was left pledge with the Gouernour, vntill Beniamin came thither to giue teſtimony of their truth: whereupon they deſired their father, without con-

him to commit the care of his sonne vnto God, promising to bring him backe againe in safetie, G or else to die together with him: Moreouer he said, that certaine gifts gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the iuice of Mirabolans, Stacte, Terebinth, and Hony, should be sent as presents vnto Ioseph, together with the double price of their corne. Thus shedding teares on both sides, they depart from their father, leauing him miserably tormented for the health of his sons, and contrariwise suspecting with themselues, lest thorow his absence their father should be slaine with sorrow. In this perplexity spent they a whole day. At last the old man remained in his house wholly afflicted, and they trauelling into Ægypt, did mitigate their present griefe with the hope of better fortune; where no sooner were they arriued, but they repaired vnto Ioseph, being sore afraid least it should be laid to their charge, that vnder colour of fraud and deceit they had caried away with them the price of their former corne; which presently before Iosephs steward they H carefully excused, saying, that they found the mony among their wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks, which now in discharge of their truth they had brought backe againe: but he denying that he euer missed their money, & they being deliuered from this feare, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was sodainly set at liberty to conuerse among his brethren. Now when Ioseph was returned from the seruice of the king they offer him presents: and enquiring of them how their father did, they answered that he was in health: then perceiuing that Beniamin was yet aliue, whom he saw among them, he asked whether that were their yonger brother, and hearing that it was he, he onely vttered these words, that God had the prouidence of all things, and departed from them being vnwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which he I could not any longer containe. Inuiting them afterwards vnto a banquet, hee commaunded them to sit down in order according as they were wont to do when they were with their father, and whereas he kindly intertained all of them, he honoured Beniamin with a double share. After the banquet, at such time as they were all laid downe to rest, he commanded the Steward to measure out the wheat, which euery one should beare away with him, and to hide the price thereof againe in their sacks; but in Beniamins sacke he commanded him to put his cup wherein he most delighted: which he therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loues towards Beniamin, and whether they would sticke vnto him being accused of theft, or leauing him behinde as a malefactour, returne vnto their father, as if the matter no waies touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded it, earely in the morning all Iacobs sonnes arose, and taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their iourney, reioycing as well at his resti- K tution, as Beniamins returne, whom they both promised and protested to bring backe againe to their father; when behold sodainly a troup of horsemen roundly beset them, amongst whom was that seruant who had hid the cup in the sacke. Now they being troubled by this sodaine incursion, and asking them why they set vpon them whom they so lately had both inuited & intertained so honourably? the Ægyptians answered and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits receiued, and Iosephs gentlenesse and humanitie, were so wicked as to returne him iniuries for his courtesies, threatning them that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them that although for a time they had deceiued the minister of the table, yet could they not deceiue God; and againe, asking them whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished. L In these or such like speeches the seruant insulted ouer them. But they, who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, that they wondred at the mans intemperancy, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keepe backe, no not the price of their corne which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselues knew ought of that money, so farre were they from purposely offring any wrong: yet in that they thought this inquisition wold better satisfie them, then deniall, they bid them search their sacks; offering themselues each of them to suffer punishment if any one of them were found guiltie of the theft. This search which they offered, the Ægyptians accepted, yet referred they the punishment to be inflicted only on him who had done the iniury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sacke, but that they might seeme to discharge their dutie more cunningly: ~~now all the rest be-~~ M ~~his sacke, but that they might seeme to discharge their duty more cunningly~~: now all the rest being secured in themselues, they onely as yet were carefull of their brother Beniamin: they hoped also that he would not be found guilty of falshood: for which cause they more freely vpbraided their persecutors, obiecting vnto them how thorow their importunitie they had beene hindered the better part of their iourney. Now as they searched Beniamins sack, they found the cup: whereupon all the brothers began to mourne and lament, both bewayling their brothers fortune,

Iosephs brethren are staid in their iourney.

Iacobs sonnes are accused of theft.

A fortune, who was like presently to suffer death for the theft; and their owne mishap, who hauing plighted their faiths vnto their father for Beniamins safe returne, were compelled to falsifie the same thorow this present accident. And that which further increased their griefe, was, that when as they most of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were by fortunes enuy thrust into so great calamitie: confessing themselues to be the authors both of their fathers, and this their brothers misfortune; who neuer ceased to importune and compell their father (although he were vnwilling and resisted) to send the childe with them. The yeere of the world, 2238. before Christs Nativity. 1726.

Now the horsemen hauing laid hands on Beniamin, led him vnto Ioseph; whom his brothers presently followed. Who beholding his brother thrust into prison, and the rest bemoaning them round about him in mourning habits: Haue you, said hee (O most wicked men) either so contemned my humanity, or Gods prouidence, as that you durst attempt and offer such an hainous B iniury against him, who entertained you with hospitality, and dismissed you with benefits? To whom they answered, that they were ready to suffer punishment for Beniamin, calling againe to their remembrace Iosephs iniuries, saying: that he was happy, who deliuered by death from life was exempt from all calamities; and that (if he liued) God inflicted that plague on them for his sake. They said also, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their father, because that (to his former sorrow, which he had conceiued euen vntil that time of Iosephs death) they had also annexed this new misery: neither did Ruben desist to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickednesse which they had committed. But Ioseph told them that he dismissed them all (saying that their innocency was approoued vnto him) and that hee onely would be contented with the C lads punishment: For (said he) neither is it reasonable that he should be deliuered for the loue of those who had not offended: neither that they should bee punished for him, who had done the theft. He commanded them therefore to depart, and promised them safe conduct on their way. Beniamin is attached for theft.

Whilest all of them were grieuously wounded with these words (so that scarcely one of them could speak for sorrow) Iuda (who had perswaded his father to send Beniamin with them, & who amongst the rest was a man of confidence) purposed to expose himselfe to all danger, vnder resolution to deliuer his brother from perill: whereupon hee addressed himselfe to Ioseph and spake thus. Dread Lord (quoth he) wee confesse that we are all ready to suffer punishment (although we haue not all of vs committed the offence, but onely the yongest amongst vs) and although we suppose his life to be almost desperate, yet our only hope as yet resteth in your goodnes and cle- D mencie. For which cause we beseech you, that you will not only haue compassion of vs, but of your owne nature, and that in this case you would bee pleased to take counsaile, not of your iust indignation, but your natiue goodnesse: gouerning your wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and small occurrences, are wont to submit. Consider, I pray you, whether it stand with your dignity to kill those, who present themselues to be punished, & desire in no sort to liue, except it be by the benefit of your mercy. Suffer not your selfe to be depriued of this honour: that after you haue deliuered vs from famine and liberally furnished vs with corne, so of your mercy likewise you haue permitted vs to returne vnto our family, being trauelled by the same perill, and to bring them home sustenance. For one and the same bounty is it to continue them in life, who are trauelled with famine; and to forgiue them death, who haue merited it by E their offences: to whom their wickednesse hath enuied that bounty which you haue heroically extended towards them. It is one and the same grace imparted by you in diuers maners. For thou shalt saue those whom thou hast fed; & that life which thou wouldest not suffer to faile by force of famine, thou shalt redeliuer and giue againe: whereby thy clemencie may be more commendable, whilest both thou giuest life, and those things likewise whereby life is maintained. Moreouer, I thinke that God himselfe hath giuen thee this meanes to expresse thy vertue, that it may appeare that thou setteſt lighter by the iniuries offered vnto thee, then by thy will to doe good; and that thou art not liberall to them onely, who are poore and innocent. For although it bee a great praise to yeeld succour in aduersities; yet is a prince no lesse honoured by his clemency especially in a cause that concerneth his particular interest. For if they that remit small offences, F are followed by deserued praise; what is it to restraine a mans ire in a capitall crime; doth it not most neerely approximate the diuine clemencie? And had I not good experience by Iosephs death, how grieuously my father digesteth the want of his children, I would not so earnestly intreat for his safety, but so farre forth and no otherwise, but as it might redound to the praise of thy clemency; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both griefe and discontent, we were willing all of vs to suffer punishment. But now whereas we haue not so much commiseration of our selues (although as yet wee be but yong, and haue not much tasted the pleasures, and Iudaes oration vnto Ioseph for Beniamin.

and fruit of this life) as of our wretched parent being drowned in yeeres and cares, wee offer vp G vnto thee these our prayers in his name also, and beseech thee to grant vs life, though at this day wee are vnder thy iustice for our offences. Assuredly hee is a good man, and begat vs, that wee should be like vnto him: worthy is hee neuer to taste or be tried by any such calamitie, who now through our absence is discruciate with care and sorrow. Now if so be hee should re» ceiue any tidings either of our death, or the cause thereof; hee will not indure any more to liue:
» the infamy of our deaths will shorten his daies; and make his death by this meanes more vnhap-» py, who rather then he should heare the rumours of our shame, would hasten his death in suppo» sing them. All these well considered, (although thou art iustly moued by this offence;) remit the » reuenge vnto our father, and rather let thy pitty towards him, then our iniquity towards thee pre» uaile with thee. Impart this honour to his old age: which if it be depriued of our presence, neither H
» will, nor can desire to liue; yeeld this respect to thy fathers memory; yea ascribe it to the very » name of a father, wherewith thou art honoured: so God the father of all men, will blesse thee in » that name, and fortunate thee in thy increase: whom also thou shalt honour, if in respect of that » common name, thou take compassion of our father, in considering the sorrow that hee shall in-» dure, if perhaps hee shall be depriued of his children. It now lieth in your power to giue vs that,
» which you may depriue vs of, by that power which God hath giuen you: and in doing vs this fa-» uour you shall imitate the nature of God; and in this respect become like vnto him. For, since it and contenting thy selfe with thy power, not to remember or vrge thy reuenge: but onely to thinke that thy power was giuen thee, to keepe and conserue men; and that the more mercie I » thou extendest towards many, the more honour thou redoublest on thy head: now it lieth in thy » power by forgiuing our brothers errour to giue vs all life. For neither can we be safe, except he

» be saued, neither may we returne home vnto our father, except he returne: but heere must wee » suffer whatsoeuer our brother suffereth. Neither do we craue any other mercy at thy hand (dread » Prince) if we be repulsed in this, but that thou wilt inflict one and the same punishment on vs, in » no other manner, then as if we had beene partakers of the felony: for this were more better for » vs, then that wee our selues through sorrow, should offer violence to our owne soules. I will not » alleadge or vrge his youth, or iudgement as yet vnripened, neither will I inferre that pardon is » vsually granted vnto such: but here will I make an end, that whether we be condemned in that I
» haue not sufficiently pleaded his cause, or whether we be absolued; we may wholly ascribe this K
» grace to your fauour and clemency: to the bounds of whose praise this likewise shall bee added,
» that not only thou hast saued vs, but also in pardoning vs of the punishment which we haue iust-
» ly deserued, hast had more care of vs then wee our selues. If therefore it bee thy pleasure to ad-
» iudge him to die, suffer mee to suffer for him, and send him backe vnto our father: or if it please
Gen. 40. thee to retaine him for thy slaue, I am more fit then hee to doe all sorts of seruices, as you may perceiue; and am ready to suffer all that which may bee inflicted on mee. When Iuda had spoken thus, he humbled himselfe at Iosephs feete, indeuouring as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appease his ire; in like sort also all the other brothers prostrated themselues, offring themselues to

A past you pronounced against me, any waies trouble you, since you perceiue it hath wanted effect: but reioyce ye at these works of God, and go and tell your father that which you haue seene, for feare lest he being consumed with immoderate care of you, I my selfe be depriued of the chiefest fruite of my felicity, before hee come to my presence and bee made partaker of those benefits. Wherefore depart you, and bringing with you him, your wiues, and children, and all your kindred, come backe vnto me: for it were inconuenient (my deare brethren) that you should not be partakers of my felicity, especially since this famine is as yet to continue for the terme of fiue yeeres. This said, Ioseph embraced his brethren: but they were wholly confounded in teares and sorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had sinned against so kinde a brother. After all this, there followed a banquet. And the King vnderstanding that Iosephs brethren were arriued, (as if some good fortune had befallen him) right heartily reioyced, and hee gaue them B charriots laden with corne, and golde, and siluer, with other presents to present their father with, who enriched with diuers gifts (some by their brother vnto his father, other some to themselues, but in especiall to Beniamin) they returned home into their countrey. But after that Iacob vnderstood by his sonnes in what estate his sonne Ioseph was, that he had not onely escaped from death (which he had so long time bewailed) but also that he liued in high prosperity, and ministred to the King of Ægypt, and had welny the whole gouernment of the kingdome vnder his hands: he easily beleeued all things that were told him, and acknowledged the great workes of God, and his goodnesse shewed vnto him, although for a time it seemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he addressed himselfe to goe and visit his sonne Ioseph.

Chap. IIII.

BVt when hee arriued neere the fountaine of Couenant, hee offered in that place a sacrifice vnto God; and fearing least his children should inhabite Ægypt, by reason of the fertility of the place, and that his posteritie by not returning backe into the land of Chanaan, should leese the possession of that which God had promised them; and furthermore, doubting least that his iourney into Ægypt, beeing by him enterprised against the will of God, should bee ominous vnto his children; suspecting likewise lest hee should die before hee came D to Iosephs presence: hee was wonderfully perplexed in minde. Whilest thus he ruminated and examined these things in his thought, hee was surprised with a heauy sleepe, during which time God appeared vnto him and called him twise by his name: who asking who it was that called him, God answered: Doest thou not acknowledge (O Iacob) that God, who hath both protected thee and thy ancestors, and succoured you in all your necessities? who contrarie to thy fathers purpose made thee Lord of his family, and when as by thy selfe thou diddest trauell into Mesopotamia, I brought to passe, that being matched in wedlocke very happily, thou returnedst into thy countrey backe againe, being blessed with many children, and stored with much riches. I also kept thy progeny in safety, and when it seemed thou hadst lost Ioseph, I raised him to that high steppe of dignity wherein now hee liueth; and made him the next in person to the king of E Ægypt. And now also I am come vnto thee vnto this end, that I may guide thee in this thy iourney, and that I may foretell thee that thou shalt leaue thy life betwixt the hands of Ioseph, and that thy posterity shall bee mighty and famous for many ages, and shall possesse that land, the empire whereof I haue promised them. Assured and made confident by this dreame, hee more willingly hastened, both he, his sonnes, with all their progeny into Ægypt, whose number amounted to the summe of 70. Their names in that they are somewhat hard, I had not written downe, except it were to satisfie some, who contend that wee are Ægyptians and not Mesopotamians. The sonnes of Iacob therefore were twelue in number, of whom Ioseph came thither long before them. Now are the rest to be reckoned vp with euery one of their progenies. Ruben had foure sonnes, Anoches, Phalles, Essaron, and Charmisus. Simeon had sixe, Iumilus, Iaminus, Puthodus, Iachenus, Goar, Saar. Leui also had three, Gelsemis, Caathus, and Mararis. Iuda had likewise three, F Sala, Phares, Zara; with two sonnes of Phares, Esrom and Amyrus. Issachar had foure, Thulas, Phruras, Iobus, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elon, and Ianel. And these were the children he had by Lea, who also led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amounteth to 33. But Rachel had two sonnes, of which the elder who was called Ioseph, had likewise two, Manasses and Ephraim. But Beniamin had ten, Bolossus, Baccharis, Asabel, Gela, Naamans, Ises, Aros, Nomphthis, Optatis, and Sarodus. These fourteene added to those abouenamed, make vp

the number of fortie seuen. And this was the legitimate issue of Iacob. But on Bala Rachels handmaid Dan and Nepthalim, who was attended by foure sonnes, Eleinus, Gunes, Sares and Hellimus. But Dan had onely one sonne called Vsis. Now if those be added to the aboue named, they make vp the number of 54. But Gad and Asser were borne by Zelpha Leas handmaid, of these Gad was attended by seuen sonnes: Zophonias, Vgis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Erodes and Ariel. Asser had one daughter and sixe male children, whose names were Iomnes, Essus, Iebus, Baris, Abarus, Melmiel. These fifteene being added to the foresaid fifty foure, make vp the number aboue named, together with Iacob. But Ioseph vnderstanding that his father was at hand (for Iuda posted before to giue him notice thereof) he went out to meete him, and incountered him neere to a towne called Heros, who was seased with such extreame and vnexpected ioy, that he had almost expired; but Ioseph recomforted him, being himself almost endangered thorow extreame ioy, yet not in such extasie and extremity as his father: afterwards desiring him to march softly onward, he taking with him his fiue brethren hasted vnto the King, signifying vnto him that his father with all his family were arriu'd. Who no sooner vnderstood therof, but that he ioyfully asked Ioseph in what studies he tooke delight: who answered him that his exercise was keeping of cattell, and that he had no other trade. And this answer made he to the intent they might not be diuided one from another, but that liuing altogether, they might take care of their father: another reason was, lest emulation should happen betwixt them & the Ægyptians, if so be they should be conuersant in the same studies; for it was not lawfull for that nation to exercise the shepheards trade. Now when Iacob was brought into the kings presence, & after he had done him reuerence, and prayed God for the prosperitie both of him and his Realme; Pharao asked him how long he had liued: and when he had vnderstood that he was a hundred and thirty yeeres old, he admired at the age of the man: and after he had certified him that his ancestors had liued far longer time, he commanded him and his sonnes to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the kings shepheards had their pastures. But the famine increased in Ægypt, and the euill augmented more & more, by reason that Nilus did not ouerflow the earth, neither extended his armes ouer the same: on the other side God rained not vpon the earth: Moreouer in that the euill was vnsuspected, it was more grieuous especially to the communaltie, who had laid vp nothing, neither did Ioseph giue them corne without readie money; which when they began to want they exchanged their cattell and slaues for corne; but they that had lands, sold a certaine portion thereof vnto the king for their prouision. And when as by this meanes all these possessions came into the kings hands; they went to inhabite the one heere, the other there, to the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their land: the sacrificers only were accepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained intire. Finally, this necessity reduced both the bodies and minds of the whole nation into seruitude after such a manner, that they esteemed no labour or meanes vnseemely, that might serue them towards the maintenance of their sustenance. But when the famine ceased, & the earth watered by the ouerflow of the flood, began to gather her former fertility; Ioseph visiting euery city of the kingdom, & assembling the multitude in euery one of them, restored them the profits of those lands which they had sold vnto the king, and exhorted them to manure the same in no worse maner then they would do their owne, comanding them to pay the fift part vnto the king which was due vnto him by his prerogatiue and kingly right. Who reioycing at this vnexpected restitution, earnestly intended and prosecuted their tillage: and by this meanes not only Iosephs authoritie, but also the peoples hearts were not a little tied vnto the King: and the inheritance of the fift part of the profits remained with the Kings that succeeded and all their posteritie.

But Iacob after he had liued seuenteene yeeres in Ægypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his sonnes, hauing first besought God to giue them prosperitie and aboundance, and prophecied that euery one of their posteritie should attaine to the possession of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to passe. Besides, praising his sonne Ioseph for that forgetting the iniuries done vnto him, he had bestowed diuers benefits on his brethren, yea and such as well beseemed his benefactors; he commanded his sonnes, that they should admit Iosephs sons Ephraim & Manasses into their number, at such time as they should diuide the land of Chanaan, as hereafter it shall be declared. Last of all, he praied them to burie him in Hebron. And he died at such time as he had liued one hundred and fiftie yeeres wanting three, being second to none of his ancestors in pietie, and obtained the reward which he ought iustly to possesse, in that he was a man adorned with so many vertues. But Ioseph by the Kings permission went and transported his fathers bodie into Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But he likewise died, when he had liued one hundreth and ten yeares; a man endowed with admirable vertue, and prudent in all affaires, and moderate in his gouernment: by which means it came to passe that neither his forraine birth, neither his calamities whereof we haue spoken, did any wayes hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignitie. The rest of his brothers also, hauing spent their liues in happines, died in Ægypt, whose bodies their sons and nephewes transported and buried in Hebron: but Iosephs bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrewes into

B Chanaan, at such time as they departed out of Ægypt into Chanaan: for hereunto had he bound them by oath. But in that I am to declare this, and other actions of this Nation, I will first of all shew the cause why they departed out of Ægypt.

CHAP. V.

Of the affliction which the Hebrewes endured in Egypt, for the space of foure hundreth yeares.

THe Ægyptians are a Nation addicted vnto delicacie, and impatient of labour, subiect onely to their pleasures, and affecting gaine: whence it came to passe, that bearing hatred toward the Hebrewes, and enuying their happines, they were very euilly disposed

C towards them. For seeing the race of the Israelites flourish and to abound in riches, which they got by their labour and industrie, they conceiued an opinion that their aduancement and increase, would bee the ouerthrowe and decrease of the Ægyptians; so that at length they forgot the benefits which Ioseph had done vnto them: and after the royaltie was transported into another familie, they committed diuers outrages against the Israelites, and complotted against them in what manner they might more grieuously afflict them. For they were inioyned by them to cut Nilus into diuers trenches, and to enuiron their Cities with walles, and to build fortifications and banks, wherby the inundations of the flood might bee diuerted. They also vexed our nation in building their hie and vaine Pyramides, compelling them to learne diuers artes, and to accustome themselues to endure labour; and in such afflictions led they their liues

D for the space of 400. yeares, the Ægyptians studying nought else but to tire the Israelites with continuall labour, and our country-men endeuouring themselues alwaies to performe far more, then was expected from them. Liuing thus in this estate, there grew afterwards an other occasion, which instigated them the more to seeke the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the sacred secretaries (to whose predictions those kind of people doe very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be one bred and born amongst the Israelites, that in time to come should grieuously afflict the estate of the Ægyptians, and wonderously enhance the good hap of the Israelites; who should surpasse all other in vertue, and purchase to himselfe immortall glory, if so be he should attaine to mans estate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, he published an edict by the aduise of this secretary, that whatsoeuer male child should bee

E borne amongst the Israelites, hee should bee cast into the floud to be drowned: hee commanded likewise the Ægyptian midwiues diligently to obserue the time when the Hebrew womẽ trauelled with child, carefully to keepe & marke their children at such time as they were deliuered. For it was enioyned thẽ that they should be brought to bed by such midwiues, who by reason of cõsanguinitie with that Nation, should not transgresse the kings commandement. Hee enacted also a law with a penaltie, that if any should bee so bold to conceale their children, both they and all their family should be done to death. Great was this their calamitie, not onely in that respect, because they were depriued of their children, & for that the parents themselues were made the ministers to murther their owne children; but foreseeing also the future time they were intolerably dismayed, expecting nought else but the certaine and fatall extirpation of their whole nation, by

F reason that when the children were slaine, the parents themselues not long after were assured to die: thus conceited they in themselues into what extreame misfortune they were fallen. But no man whosoeuer, although he complot neuer so many stratagems, can resist the wil of God. For both the childe, of whom the sacred secretary had foreprophecied, was secretly brought vp vndiscouered by the kings spies, and approoued by the euents of his life, that he was no false Prophet. Amarames an Hebrew borne and a noble man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publike perill, least the whole nation should be brought to nothing thorow the want of issue; and his owne priuate misfortune, whose wife at home was big with childe and readie to lie downe; was troubled in his minde, and vncertaine what to doe. For which cause he made his recourse vnto God, beseeching him that at the length he would haue mercy on those men of whom onely he had beene perpetually honoured; and that it would please him to bring to end the present affliction which threatned the whole nation with vtter ruine and destruction. But God being mooued vnto mercy by his most humble prayer appeared to him in a dreame, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the pietie of his auncestors, and that he would for euer remunerate them, euen as in times past he had beene gracious to their forefathers. For it was he that had increased their posteritie, and multiplied them to so mighty a nation, that by his fauour, Abraham departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Chanaan; besides other felicities, had issue by his wife that was before time barren, and left ample possessions to his successors: to Ismael, Arabia; to Chæturas children Troglottida, and to Isaac Chanaan. Neither can you euer forget without note of impietie and ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily atchieued in warre by my meanes: but Iacobs name also is renowned amongst forraine nations, both in respect of the felicitie wherein he liued, and also for that prosperitie which by hereditarie right happened vnto his posteritie, who taking their originall from 70. men that accompanied their father into Ægypt, are now increased to the number of sixe hundreth thousand: know therefore now also, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publike securitie, and priuately thy glory. For this childe, for feare of whose natiuitie the Ægyptians haue condemned all your children vnto death, shall be borne vnto thee: he neither shall be discouered by the constituted spies, and after he hath escaped beyond all expectation, shall he bee brought vp, and in his time shall he deliuer the Hebrews from the thraldome of the Ægyptians, and shall obtaine an eternall memorie, for this his famous action, not only amongst his owne nation, but also amongst strangers: for this fauour will I extend vnto thee, and on thy posteritie that followeth after thee; he shall also haue such a brother, who shall deserue both in himselfe, and in his posteritie to inherite the priesthood for euer. After these things were declared in a vision vnto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Iochabel, and by reason of the prediction of this dreame, their suspicion and feare the rather increased more and more: for they were not onely pensiue in respect of their childe; but also by reason of the future great good fortune that was promised them. But anone after the woman being brought a bed, gaue credit to the Oracle; who had so easie and gentle a labour, that she beguiled the ouerseers and spies, in that she felt none of those throes which doe commonly afflict such as are in labour: so that she nourished the infant three moneths secretly in her house, without being in any sort discouered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be surprised, and sore doubting least he should incurre the kings displeasure, if the matter were discouered, whereby both he and the childe should be made away, and Gods promises should be frustrate; he had rather wholly commit the safetie of his son to his prouidence: supposing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troublesome vnto him to liue in continuall perill both of his owne and his sonnes safetie: moreouer, he thought that God would purvey some meanes of assurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be prooued false. Grounding himselfe on this resolution, they prepared and made a cradle of sedge, after the manner of a couch, so great as it was sufficient to lay the child in at ease, and hauing pitched it on euery side least the water should pierce the same, they put the child into it, & suffered him to float along the streame in committing him to the mercy of God. Whilest in this maner it was borne down by the stream; Mariam, the sister of the yong infant, by her mothers command went along the banke on the other side of the riuer, obseruing whither at length the basket would be carried, and where it did arriue. At that time God manifestly declared, that nothing is atchieued by mans wisedome, but that all things are brought to passe by his omnipotent bountie, and that they who for their profit & particular securitie seeke the ruine and destruction of others with neuer so much subtiltie, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceiued in their expectations: Againe, that they that submit their wils vnto Gods will, are warranted from all wrongs by such meanes as were neuer thought on; which may most manifestly be perceiued by this childe.

A feare leaſt he ſhould be borne, had decreed to deſtroy all the reſt of the race of the Hebrewes. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her ſome one nurſe, who might giue the childe ſucke; who refuſing the ſame, and all other nurſes whatſoeuer they were ſent for to ſuckle him: Mariam as if by good fortune and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had light into their company, began to ſpeak thus vnto Thermuthis. In vaine (ſaid ſhe) O Queen, doſt thou endeuour whileſt thou ſtriueſt to giue this babe ſucke by any but an Hebrew nurſe, for he will not accept it: for if thou call vnto thee a nurſe of the ſame nation, and agreeable with his nature, doubtleſſe he will take the nipple. When he was but onely three yeeres old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable audacitie. He was ſo faire and amiable, that there was not any one how auſtere and inhumane ſoeuer he were, which but in beholding him would not be aſtonished: and it chanced alſo that diuers, who encountered him as he was borne thorow the ſtreetes, turned themſelues about to behold him, and intermitted their other affaires onely to looke vpon him: for the admirable and innated beautie which was in this infant, did rauiſh all thoſe that beheld him. Whence it came to paſſe that Thermuthis in that ſhee had no other iſſue, adopted him for her heire, & conducting him vnto her father, ſhe preſented him before him, ſaying, that ſhe was carefull of a ſucceſſor, by reaſon God had not vouchſafed him to haue any iſſue. This ſaide, ſhe deliuered the infant into her fathers armes: who after he had embraced and hugged him at his breaſt (to giue his daughter the more content) he put his Diademe vpon the childs head: but Moſes pulling it from his head after a childiſh manner, caſt it on the ground, and ſpurned it with his feete; which act of his was ſuppoſed ominous to the Realme, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the ſacred ſecretarie (who had foretold that his natiuity would be the deſtruction of the Egyptians) willed them to kill the child, and enforced himſelfe to enact it, crying out with a loud voyce and ſpeaking vnto the King after this manner: O king, this child by whoſe death God promiſeth vs ſecurity, hath already confirmed the preſage, inſulting ouer thy kingdome and ſpurning at thy Diademe. Take

E from the Ægyptians that feare which they haue conceiued thorow him, by his death: and from the Hebrews that hope, which they build on his courage & life. But Thermuthis haſtily conueied and ſnatched him thence, and the King was not ouer forward to lay hands on him, by reaſon that God diſpenſed all things in that ſort, in that hee had a care of Moſes preſeruation. Hee was therefore very carefully brought vp, and in reſpect of him the Hebrewes in generall were repleniſhed with good hope, but to the Ægyptians his education both was ſuſpected and grudged at: but by reaſon that if the lad ſhould haue beene ſlaine, there was not any one eyther akinne or adopted, or otherwiſe whatſoeuer, that had regard of the eſtate of the Ægyptians, they abſtained from his ſlaughter. Being therefore thus borne and after this manner brought vp, at ſuch time as he increaſed in years, he euidently by his vertue made it known vnto the Ægyptians, that he was born instantly pursued them; and supposing it a cowardly part in them, not to take the benefit of their present good fortune, and conceiuing an assured hope of conquering Ægypt, they generally wasted the same: and hauing tasted of the sweetnesse of pillage, without any temper or moderation in their victorie, they were incensed to attempt greater matters. And whereas they perceiued, that hauing wasted all their neighbour regions, no man durst sally out to encounter them in armes, they marched forward toward Memphis, euen vnto the sea, arriuing neere no Citie that either had the heart, or durst make head against them. By which calamities the Ægyptians beeing ouersore oppressed, they send one to aske counsell of the Oracle, in what manner they might preuent their miseries; and when as an answer was giuen them, that they should choose an Hebrew to assist them in the warres, the king commanded his daughter to giue them Moses, who together with the Empire, might gouerne the whole armie. Shee taking an oath of the king, that no iniurie or violence should be offered him, deliuered him into his hands; esteeming it to bee a great good fortune for Moses, that he was called to the succours of her countrey: and contrariwise she blamed the Sacrificers, who were not ashamed to demand his aide and assistance, whom they had foreiudged, and adiudged to bee slaine as their common enemy. But Moses exhorted by Thermuthis and the King, willingly tooke the charge vpon him. Whereat the Priests of both nations were very ioyfull; for the Ægyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had ouercome their enemies, they afterwards might more easily dispatch and murther him, by some treason and sinister meanes: and the Hebrewes conceiued a hope that they might depart out of Ægypt, by reason that Moses was the Generall of the armie. Moses therefore making haste, before such time as the enemies had any notice that he was dislodged, he leuied his army, and conducted them, not along the bankes of the riuer, but through the maine land; wherein he made manifest his most admirable prudence. For the iourney by land being very dangerous, by reason of the multitude of serpents (for the countrey thereabouts breedeth vp all sorts of them, and some of that kinde, as the like thereof are not seene in any place else, all different in propriete, malignitie, and horrible forme: and amongst these likewise there are some winged, and apt to flie, who not onely offend those that they encounter on the earth very priuily, but also tower very high in the aire, who houer about to hurt those that are not aware of them) he for the security of his army, and to the end he might march without any inconuenience, inuented this maruailous and admirable stratageme. For he caused two paniers of sedge to be made, in forme of cofers, and filled them with certaine birds which were called Ibes, who are mortall enemies to serpents, and before whom the serpents flee: and sometimes in flying from them like Harts, they are laid hold of and swallowed by them. Otherwise these birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmefull to any but to serpents, of whom I will now cease to write any further, because the Greekes doe already know what kind of bird it is.

The Egyptians require Moses to be their Captaine.

Moses marcheth against the Ethiopians.

When as therefore hee arriued in the countrey of serpents, hee let flie his Ibes against the venomous beasts, and made vse of them to encounter the other: and when hee had marched in this sort, he attained and surprised the Æthiopians, before they suspected him; and sodainly charging them, he ouercame them in battell, spoiling them of the hope they had to conquer Ægypt; and entring the townes of Æthiopia, hee raised them, and made a great slaughter of the inhabitants. The Ægyptian armie hauing tasted the happie successe that happened vnto them vnder the conduct of Moses, intermitted not their occasion, especially for that they saw that the Æthiopians were welnigh conquered, or rather wholly destroyed: and in the end hauing driuen them euen vnto Saba, the chiefe citie of Ethiopia (which Cambyses called Meroe, for the loue which he bore vnto his sister, who was so called) they besieged them. The Citie was strong, and very hard to bee assailed, by reason of the riuer Nilus, which enuironed it round about: on the other side, the riuers of Astapus and Astaborra did flow in so freshly, as they could neither breake the course of the water, nor wade ouer the streame: for the citie is builded in an Island, inuironed with a strong wall round about, hauing great rampiers betwixt the riuers and the walles built, to resist the inundations of the waters; which are the cause that the Citie may be very hardly taken, although the opposite armie had found meanes to passe the water. Now when Moses was very sore grieued that his armie profited nothing, by reason that the enemies durst not encounter them in open field; behold what a chance happened: Tharbis the daughter of the King of Ethiopia beholding Moses, at such time as hee approched with his armie neere vnto the walles of the Citie, and seeing how valiantly he fought and behaued himselfe, and wondering at the exploits and enterprises which he made (which was the cause that the Egyptians, almost despairing of their estates and libertie, were grown so forward) and how the Ethiopians, not long before esteemed

The matter was no ſooner motioned, but the effect followed; ſo that hauing ſurpriſed and conquered the Æthiopians, and after he had giuen thankes vnto God, Moſes accompliſhed the marriage, and ſent the Ægyptians backe againe into their countrey. The Ægyptians ſeeke to betray Moſes.

But he hauing intelligence of thoſe his practiſes, eſcaped and fled ſecretly, flying from his preſence thorow the deſart, by which the enemies leaſt ſuſpected that he ſhould haue fled: and al-
C though at no place in his iourney he found victuals to ſuſtaine him, yet ouercame he his penury by his patience. And arriuing neere a Citie of the Madians, ſituate vpon the ſhoare of the red ſea (that was named by one of Abraham and Chæturas ſonnes) he ſat him downe neere vnto a fountaine refreſhing himſelfe, and taking his eaſe after his laborious iourney: for it was about nooneſted, and the Citie already appeared in his ſight. In this place there befell an occaſion vnto him, deriued from the manners and cuſtome of liuing, among the inhabitants of the countrey; by which he both expreſſed his vertue, and found an opportunitie to better his eſtate. For whereas the Region is ſore trauelled with want of water, the ſhepheards had a cuſtome to ſtriue which of them ſhould firſt poſſeſſe the pits, for feare leaſt the water ſhould be quite conſumed by others, before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirſt. To this fountaine therefore there came ſeauen virgins, which were ſiſters and daughters of Raguel the Prieſt, whom the D inhabitants of that place held in great eſtimation, who had the charge to attend their fathers flockes, for that it is the exerciſe wherein the Troglodites are wont to exerciſe their women. Theſe haſted themſelues to draw ſufficient water for their troupes into the troughes, expreſſely made to receiue the water; and when in the mean time the ſhepheards came and ſurpriſed them, and droue away the virgins, to the end they might be maſters of the water: Moſes ſuppoſing it a matter vnworthy his honour, to ſuffer this outrage, and to indure that by violence men ſhould deprriue virgins of their right and intereſt; he droue away the ſhepheards, who would haue enioyed that which appertained not vnto them, and gaue neceſſarie ſuccours to the diſmayed maydens. Who as ſoone as they were returned into their fathers preſence, tolde him the outrage that was done them by the ſhepheards, and the ſuccours that they found by the hands of a
E ſtranger, beſeeching him that the courteſie which he had ſhewen vnto them, ſhould not bee forgotten, but that in ſome ſort he might receiue recompence. The father commending his daughters thankfulneſſe towards their benefactor, commanding them to bring Moſes into his preſence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deſerued. As ſoone as he came into his preſence, Raguel told him how his daughters had giuen him to vnderſtand, how kindly he had aſſiſted them: and hauing his vertue in admiration, he ſaid that he had not aduentured himſelfe, nor done kindneſſe to thoſe that were without ſenſe of the curteſies that were ſhewed vnto them, but vnto thoſe who were capable to giue him thankes, yea ſo ready to requite him, that the greatneſſe of their requitall ſhould farre ſurpaſſe the meaſure of his humanitie. Hee
M therefore adopted him for his ſonne, and gaue him one of his daughters to wife, and made him
F ſuperintendent and maſter of his flockes (in which in times paſt the wealth and riches of forraine nations conſiſted.) Moſes hauing obtained this good fortune at Ietheglaus hands (for ſuch was Raguels ſurname) he abode there with him and attended his flockes. But not long after he led his cattell to graze neere to the mountaine Sinai, which is the higheſt of all thoſe that are in that quarter, and good for paſturage, by reaſon of the holſome hearbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithſtanding was not fed vpon before that time, becauſe the ſhepheards durſt not frequent there-abouts, by reaſon of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey, who ſaid that God inhabited bited that mountaine: there happened there vnto him a maruailous prodigie, which was, that a flame of fire seemed round about him in a bush, without offensing either the greene herbes, or the flowers, or the boughes charged with fruit, although the flame were both great and vehement. Hee not little amazed at this vnexpected spectacle, at last grew more and more amazed when as hee heard a voice issuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accusing him of boldnes, in that he was not afraid to tread vpon that ground, which hitherto was vnaccessible, and religiously reuerenced, and vnhaunted by men; counselling him that he should depart a farre off from the flame, and content himselfe with that vision: for although that hee were a vertuous man, and descended from great personages, yet that he ought not to bee curious to make further search into the same. The same voyce also tolde him, that the honour and glory which he obtained amongst men, was by the assistāce of God, charging him to be of a good courage, and to repaire into Ægypt, for that in that place hee should bee captaine and guide of the Hebrew nation, and should deliuer that people which were therein, from the outrage & seruitude which they suffered. For (said the voyce) they shall inhabit this happy countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they shall enioy all sorts of blessings vnder the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreouer it commanded him, that hauing brought the Hebrewes out of Ægypt, hee should offer sacrifice of thanksgiuing, at such time, as hee should arriue againe in that place. And such was the Oracle which hee receiued from out of the flame. Moses altogether rauished at that which he had both heard and seene, spake thus: O Lord, it were madnes in me, and no prudence, if I should distrust thy power the which I reuerence, and which as I know hath bin manifested vnto my predecessors: notwithstanding I stand in doubt how I, who am a man of no eloquence, and of lesse force, should perswade my brethren by my words, to forsake the countrey wherein they inhabite, to follow mee into that countrey whether I will conduct them: And although they should be perswaded to doe the same; how can I force Pharao to permit them to depart from thence, by whose labours and trauels, the Ægyptians are dayly increased in goods and riches? Whereupon God gaue him to vnderstand, that he should take vpon him a good courage, and promised him; that he himselfe would assist him, and that if hee had neede of eloquence he would bestow vpon him the facultie of perswasion; or if he were driuen to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding that in confirmation of those promises he had made him, he should let fall his staffe vpon the ground: which hauing done, a Dragon began to creepe vpon the ground, and in turning and rouling himselfe, lifted vp his crest on high; making semblance to defend himselfe against those that should assaile him: and againe, a little whiles after became a staffe againe. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his bosome: and no sooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, & in colour resembling chalke: and a little while after it recouered his ordinary forme. Moreouer, he further willed him to draw water out of the next well, and to poure it on the ground, and he saw it turned into a bloodie colour. Amazed at these accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and assured that he should haue great assistance. Moreouer, that he should vse these signes before all men, to the end (saith God) that all may beleeue that being sent by me, thou dost all this according to my commandements. Furthermore I enioyne thee, that without any further delay, thou haste thee into Ægypt; and that thou trauell day and night, without leesing time, without delaying any more to succour the poore Hebrews grieuously afflicted in Ægypt. Moses hauing no cause to distrust that which God had promised him, and being confirmed by these things wherof he was both an eye-witnesse, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occasion to expresse the like power in Ægypt, he would vouchsafe to further the effect; beseeching him further that he would not conceale his name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voyce, and the sight of his presence; that it might please him therefore to declare vnto him his name, to the end that when he should offer sacrifice vnto him, he might call vpon the same. God declared vnto him his name, which before time had beene concealed amongst men, and of which also it is not lawfull for me to speake. Moses wrought these signes not only at that time, but also when or whersoeuer he thought it requisite: by all which he gaue further credit to the fire which had appeared vnto him, and assured himselfe that God would be his fauourable defender, that he would deliuer his brethren, and intangle and enwrap the Ægyptians in great calamities. And after that he had vnderstood that Pharao King of Ægypt was dead (during whose life he fled from thence) he requested Raguel that he would giue him leaue to depart into Ægypt, for the profit of those of his nation; and taking with him Sephora (who was Raguels daughter and his married wife) and Gerson and Eleazar his children, which he had by her, he departed to goe

A goe into Egypt. Now this name of Gerſon in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth, Forraine: and Eleazar ſignifieth, fauoured by God, in memory that Moſes had eſcaped from amongſt the Egyptians, by the aſſiſtance of the God of his fathers. And as he approched neere the mountaines, Aaron his brother by the commandement of God came foorth to meete him, to whom hee declared all that which had happened vnto him in the mountaine, and that which God had giuen him in charge. And as they paſſed onward of their way, the men of greateſt eſtimation amongſt the Hebrewes (hauing intelligence of his comming) came out to meete him, to whom Moſes preſented the abouenamed tokens, by reaſon that hee could not perſwade them by words: and they being aſtoniſhed at that which they had ſeene him doe, beyond their expectation; waxed confident, and conceiued a good hope of all things, ſeeing that God had a care of their ſafetie. When he perceiued that the Hebrewes were readie to obey him, and that they proteſted to follow him
B in all that which he ſhould command them, through the earneſt deſire they had to be at liberty: he preſented himſelfe before the king, who had newly vndertaken the gouernment, and ſhewed him the great benefits he had done vnto the Ægyptians, at ſuch time as they were deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, who had ſpoiled all their countrey; and how hee had ſpared no trauell, but ſuſtained all the charge of the warre, as if it had beene waged for his owne proper nation. On the other ſide, hee opened vnto him the dangers which he had iniuſtly ſuffered for his recompence: he afterwards diſcourſed vnto him that which had befallen him neere vnto the fountaine of Sinai, and the talke which God had in that place with him, and the ſignes in particular which had been ſhewed vnto him, in confirmation of thoſe things whereunto hee was enioyned; exhorting the
C King not to miſtruſt or impeach the ordinance of God. The king hearing this, began to mocke him: but Moſes made him ſee in effect the ſignes, which were ſhewed vnto him neer to the mountaine of Sinai. But the King waxed wroth, and grieuouſly reuiled him, accuſing him for that in times paſt he fled away for feare to bee ſlaine in Ægypt, and at this preſent returned thither vnder a ſubtill pretext, cloaking his craft with magicke, and inchantment, the more to affright him. And at the ſame inſtant hee called into his preſence the Prieſts of Ægypt, to let them ſee thoſe ſignes, and to make it manifeſt that the Ægyptians were exerciſed in thoſe Sciences: and that he only was not maſter in thoſe things, the which he boaſted to performe by Gods power, but that they were but deceits & ſhadowes of meruailes to deceiue the multitude: whereupon the Prieſts caſt downe their rods, and they became ſerpents. Moſes being nothing mooued herewith, ſayd:
D O King, I deſpiſe not the wiſedome of the Ægyptians, but I proteſt that that which I haue done, doth ſo farre ſurpaſſe all their magicke and art, as there is difference between diuine and humane things: I will therefore ſhew you, that that which I doe, is not by enchantment, nor vnder colour of apparent verity, but by the prouidence and power of God. This ſaide, hee caſt his rod vpon the ground, commanding it to change it ſelfe into a ſerpent: whereunto it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it deuoured all the rods of the Ægyptians which ſeemed to bee ſerpents, vntill they were all of them conſumed; and that done, Moſes tooke his ſtaffe into his hand againe, and it reaſſumed his priſtine forme. But the king beeing neuer the more aſtoniſhed, (but the rather incenſed at that which was done) ſaid, that this wiſdome and ſubtilty of Moſes ſhould profit him nothing, which hee vſed in diſgrace of the Ægyptians. Hee commanded therefore the E ouerſeer of the works, who had the gouernment of the Hebrewes, that hee ſhould remitte nothing of their labour, but that hee ſhould oppreſſe them with more tedious and grieuous taskes, then they were wont to be put vnto: whereupon (where hee was wont to allowe them ſtrawe to make their tile with) he forbare after that time to giue them that allowance: and taxing them in the day time to follow their worke, he appointed them by night to find and bring in their ſtrawe, doubling thereby the waight of their former labour. Notwithſtanding all this, Moſes would neither deſiſt from his purpoſe, in regard of the kings threatning, nor the continuall cry of his countrimen, neither was in any ſort appauled thereat; but with a confident and vnappauled minde (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to reſtore his countriemen to their deſired libertie. Hee therefore once againe accoſted the King, perſwading him to diſmiſſe the Hebrewes, to the ende F they might repaire vnto the mount Sinai, and ſacrifice vnto God in that place: for no leſſe (ſaith he) hath hee commanded, neither can any reſiſt his will. For which cauſe hee aduiſed the King to indeauour himſelfe (leaſt hee ſhould ſeeme to contemne his fauours) to grant the people free paſſage; for feare leaſt if hee ſhould ſecretly forbid them the ſame, he might accuſe and condemne himſelfe to ſuffer that which they in reaſon ought to endure, who reſiſt the will & works of God: for to thoſe that ſtir vp the wrath of God againſt themſelues, all kind of miſhaps do flock and flow on euery ſide: The earth befriendeth them not: neither ſmileth the ayre vpon them, their their children are not begotten according to nature; but all things oppose themselues as ene- G

mies and contraries against them. Moreouer he added, that the Ægyptians should feele the plague, after that the people of the Hebrews should (in despight of their resistance) depart out of their countrey: but in that the King despised these words of Moses, and would not be conuerted, most grieuous plagues fell vpon the land of Ægypt. (The which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Ægyptians suffered those things, which neuer before that time happened to any other people; and for that cause likewise that I may testifie and declare, that Moses hath not falsified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and besides, for that it is expedient for men to learne & do those things which are agreeable to Gods will, for feare least he being prouoked and incensed against them, should punish them for their vniustice.) the commandement of God, the riuers ouerflowed with blood, neither was it possible for H them to drinke (notwithstanding they had no other fountaine of water) neither was the water only coloured like blood, but when as likewise any one drank thereof, it ingendred and procured in him diuers dolors, and grieuous gripings. Such was the water to the Ægyptians, but to the Hebrewes it seemed good and sweete in taste, without any waies changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the King (not knowing what to doe, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid by reason of the Ægyptians) permitted the Hebrewes to depart: but no sooner was this plague ceased, but he presently changed his minde, and would not permit them liberty to depart: for which cause God (seeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned, notwithstanding he had deliuered him from the former calamitie) he inflicted an other plague vpon the Ægyptians. He therefore sent an infinite number of frogs vpon them, that couered and in- I fected the whole countrey, and the riuers were so packed and stored with them in such manner, that they that drew water to drinke, found it altogether infected with the putrefaction of them, dying & rotting in the waters: so that the whole country was full of filthy mud, by reason of the frogs that defaced and died on the same. They corrupted also their meats, mingling themselues in their houses amidst their meat and drink, and creeping amidst their chambers; from whence an odious stench exhaled by reason of the multitude of frogs that lay dead. Now when the Ægyptians saw themselues so sore pressed with these euils, the King commanded Moses that he should take the Hebrews, and that he should depart: and as soone as he had spoken this, the multitude of frogs vanished and appeared no more, neither on the earth nor in the water, but that they retained their accustomed nature. No sooner was the earth deliuered from this curse, but Pharao for- K got the cause thereof, and retained the Hebrews anew: and (as if he had a desire to experiment the maner of diuers miseries) he denied them that issue which before time he had granted them, rather inforced thereunto by his feare, then forward good liking. For this cause God once againe rewarded his fraud, by sending him another plague: for a multitude of lice swarmed from the bodies of the Ægyptians, whence the wretched men perished wretchedly; neither could they exterminate that race, either by bathings or inunctions. The king troubled with this calamitie, and fearing the ruine of his people, and bethinking him of the shamefull end thereof, he was constrained to remit the better part of his malignity. For as touching the Hebrewes he permitted them to depart, but (after the plague was appeased) he required at their hands that they would leaue their wiues and children behind them for pledges till their returne: and by this meanes he L prouoked Gods wrath more heauily against him, in that he supposed to delude his prouidence: as if it had not beene God, who (in the Hebrews behalfe) had punished them, but Moses that had plagued the Ægyptians For God filled their countrey with many and diuers sorts of beasts, (the like whereof before that time had not beene seene in that countrey) which killed them vp, so that the earth became desolate and vnmanured, and if any one amongst them escaped from death, they were afterwards destroyed by sicknesse. But notwithstanding all these, the King still continued obstinate in his wickednesse, and disobedient vnto God, permitting onely that the women and men should depart, and that their children should be left behind them: but

God desisted not to punish his wickednesse by diuers and most grieuous plagues, farre more te- M

this sort the greater part of the Ægyptians perished: but when as the King was neither moderated, nor mollified by this plague, God rained downe haile vpon them (which neuer before that time was engendred in the ayre of Ægypt; & further so great, or rather greater then that, which

A offenced by the hayle; ſo that all the hope which the Ægyptians had of their harueſt or fruite, was vtterly ouerthrowne. Theſe aforeſaid afflictions had beene ſufficient to perſwade a man of the meaneſt wit (except he had been a reprobate) to grow wiſe, and make vſe of that which was moſt profitable for him. But Pharao knowing the cauſes of the ſame, enforced himſelfe to reſiſt God, not onely thorow imprudence, but for malice; ſo that voluntarily hee betrayed his commonweale. Hee therefore commanded Moſes, that hee ſhould leade away the Hebrewes with their wiues; but that they ſhould leaue their ſubſtance behind them for a prey, in that they complained, that after all theſe calamities they had nothing left them. To whom Moſes anſwered, that hee demanded an vnlawfull matter, by reaſon that they were to offer ſacrifice vnto God of their prey or bootie. Now while the time was ſpent in theſe conſultations, darkeneſſe altogether deuoyd of light ouerſpred the land of Ægypt, where through they died miſerably in cloſing their eyes, by reaſon of the thickneſſe thereof, ſo that they were afraid leaſt the fogge ſhould choake them: which beeing diſperſed, after three dayes, and ſo many nights, Moſes ſeeing that Pharao would not repent, nor let the people of Iſrael depart, hee came vnto him, and ſpake after this manner. As long as you ſhall reſiſt the ordinance of God (who commaundeth you to ſuffer the Hebrewes to depart) there is no meanes, whereby you may be exempted from theſe miſchiefes in doing that which you doe. The King enraged at theſe words, threatned him to cut off his head, if once more hee durſt appeare in his preſence, to motion vnto him any ſuch matter. Moſes anſwered him, that hee would no more ſpeake vnto him as touching this matter; but that both himſelfe, and the chiefeſt among the Ægyptians would exhort the Hebrewes to depart: which ſaide, hee forſooke his preſence. But God intending to expreſſe that he meant yet once more to plague the Ægyptians, and to conſtraine them to deliuer the Hebrewes: he commanded Moſes to declare vnto the people, that they ſhould haue their ſacrifice in a readineſſe, and hauing prepared it the thirteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, to celebrate the ſame the 14. of the ſaid moneth (by the Ægyptians called Pharmuth, and by the Hebrewes Niſan, and Zanthicus by the Macedonians) and that hee ſhould leade foorth all the Hebrewes, bearing with them all their goods. Whereupon hee who had the Hebrewes already in a readineſſe to depart, and had diſtributed them by families, kept them in one place, and in the ſame order: but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (addreſſed to depart) made ſacrifice, and with the blood of the lambe purged their houſes, beſprinkling them with branches of Iſope. And after they had ſupped, they burned the fleſh that remained, as beeing on the point to addreſſe themſelues to depart. Whereupon euen at this day wee retaine the ſaid cuſtome to ſacrifice in like ſort; and do call this ſolemnitie Paſcha, which is as much to ſay, as the paſſage, by reaſon that on that day God leauing and ouerpaſſing the Hebrewes without harme, ſtrooke the Ægyptians with ſicknes: for that plague in the night time cut off all the firſt begotten in Ægypt, ſo that by multitudes they that dwelt round about the palace, aſſembled them in the preſence of the King, and beſought him to let the Hebrewes goe: for which cauſe Pharao calling for Moſes, gaue order that they ſhould depart the countrey, ſuppoſing that aſſoone as they were gone, Ægypt ſhould no more be afflicted with ſuch like plagues. Moreouer, they honoured the Hebrewes with preſents, partly to the end they ſhould depart with the more expedition, partly for the neighbourhood and acquaintance ſake which they had one with another. And as they departed the Ægyptians wept, and repented them of the euill vſage they had ſhewed vnto them: but they tooke their way towards Latopolis at that time deſert, and in which place afterwards Babylon was builded, at ſuch time as Cambyſes deſtroyed Ægypt. The third day they came vnto Beelzephon neere vnto the red ſea, and for that they wanted victuals by reaſon of the deſart, they tempered their meale with water, and hardned it with a little heat, and made cakes, with which they ſuſtained themſelues for the ſpace of thirty dayes: for they had not brought any more victuall out of Ægypt, but as much as would ſerue them for that time, and that which they had they diſpenſed very ſparingly, rather feeding for neceſſitie, then eating with ſafetie. For which cauſe in memory of that want, wee celebrate a feaſt for the ſpace of eight daies, which wee call the feaſt of Azymes, that is to ſay, of vnleauened bread. But it is not eaſie to number the multitude of them that diſlodged, if we conſider the women and children; but of thoſe that were of full age, and fit to beare armes, they were in number ſixe hundred thouſand.

The time of their departure out of Egypt. Exod. 12. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 14. al. 11.

THEY therefore forſooke Ægypt the fourteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, foure hundreth and thirty yeeres after Abraham our father came into Chanaan, and in the two hundreth and fifteenth yeare after Iacob was tranſported into Ægypt, the eighteenth yeare of Moſes age, who had Aaron to his brother three yeeres elder then himſelfe. They carried alſo with them the bones of Ioſeph, according as hee had commanded his ſonnes. But the Ægyptians repented themſelues, becauſe they had ſuffered the Hebrewes to depart: the King alſo was very ſore mooued, ſuppoſing that which was fallen vpon them had happened by Moſes meanes, and they all concluded to purſue and follow after them. They therefore armed themſelues, and furniſhed them with all their abiliments of warre, intending to purſue them vnder intent to bring them backe, if they might ouertake them: for they ſaid that God would no more bee diſpleaſed againſt them, for that already they had giuen them leaue to depart. They hoped likewiſe very eaſily to bring them vnder ſubiection; becauſe they were all of them diſarmed, and wearied with trauaile. They therefore inquired of euery one which way they helde, and haſted themſelues to follow them, although they knew the Region was very hard to trauell in; not onely for thoſe that were to march in troup, but alſo for thoſe that were to iourney one by one. And therefore did Moſes conduct them this way, to the end that if the Ægyptians ſhould repent them of their diſmiſſion, and ſhould haſte them to purſue them, they might receiue the reward of their wickedneſſe, and the breach of their promiſe: Hee choſe this way likewiſe, leaſt the Paleſtines ſhould vnderſtand of their departure, by reaſon they were diſpleaſed againſt the Hebrewes, becauſe of an ancient grudge which they bare them. Now doth Paleſtine confine and border vpon Ægypt, and therefore led hee them not by the way that directly leadeth thither: but hee intended to bring them into Chanaan, by conducting them farre about, and thorow many calamities, to the end that afterwards he might leade them to the mountaine of Sinai, where they might offer ſacrifice, according to Gods commaundement. As ſoone as the Ægyptians ouertooke the Iſraelites, they prepared themſelues to fight, truſting themſelues to the number which they had, and ſhut themſelues into a place of ſecuritie. For with them there ſerued ſixe hundreth Chariots, with fiftie thouſand horſemen, and two hundreth thouſand armed footemen. They had alſo ſtopped the paſſages, where through they thought the Hebrewes might eſcape, encloſing them betwixt vnacceſſible rockes, and the ſea; on which place there abutteth a mountaine, vnfrequented by reaſon of the dangerouſneſſe of the way, and by this meanes they excluded them from all hope of eſcape or flight. For on the one ſide they were ſhut in by the mountaine that extended it ſelfe euen vnto the ſea, and on the other ſide by their campe pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the champaine, if ſo be they intended to flie that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no ſecuritie, but were hemmed in by the importunitie of the place, and by reaſon of their want could not endure the ſiege, and for that they could not finde any iſſue to flie from their enemies; neither although they greatly deſired to fight, had they meanes to defend themſelues, becauſe they were diſarmed: finally, when as they perceiued that there was no hope of ſafetie left them, but onely by their abiect ſubmiſſion: they began to accuſe Moſes, forgetting thoſe prodigies, whereby God had fore-promiſed them their libertie; and ſo farre forgot they themſelues, that after hauing ſtoned the Prophet, and thorow incredulitie contemned Gods promiſes, they were reſolued to yeeld themſelues ſubiect to their former thraldome. For they were exaſperated by the teares of their wiues and children, who expected nothing but death, ſeeing themſelues begirt with rockes, ſeas, and ſouldiers, and left deſtitute of all hope of flight. But although the multitude were exaſperated againſt Moſes, yet ceaſed he not to take care of them, and to thinke on God; laying before their eyes that which he had ſaid in times paſt, as touching their deliuerance, and aſſuring them that God would not ſuffer them to be ſubiected or ouerthrowne by their enemies; and ſtanding vp in the midſt of them he ſaid: If your affaires had hitherto beene managed by men onely, it were not amiſſe in you to diſtruſt them, leaſt hereafter they ſhould not bring them to their determined and your deſired iſſue. But in that at this time you diſtruſt the prouidence of God, this ſheweth you to be without ſenſe or vnderſtanding, conſidering it is he that hath made you ſee all thoſe things which hee hath promiſed you by me, tending to your ſaluation and deliuerance; yea euen at that time when you your ſelues expected it not: you rather ought to hope that God will Therefore repose your selues and stay your fortunes vpon such a helper, who can make great things of small, and maketh the strongest feeble. Feare not the force and power of the Ægyptians; neither, for that you haue the sea and mountaines before you, which permit you not to flie from them, despaire of your liues: for God (if he please) can turne the mountaines into plaines, and change the sea into dry land.

Chap. VII.

The Hebrewes are pursued by the Aegyptians, the sea diuideth it selfe, and giueth passage to the Hebrewes.

THIS said, he conducted the Hebrewes towards the sea in the sight of the Ægyptians. For they were within sight of them, being very much wearied with pursuit and trauell, and made their account that it should be best for them to remit the combate vntill the next day.

But when Moses was arriued vpon the banke of the Sea, he tooke his rodde and called vpon
C God, and implored his ayde and succours in these words. O Lord, thou too well knowest that it is impossible for vs by force or mans policie to escape these extremities: but thou art hee only that canst saue this companie, who haue forsaken Ægypt, following thy commandement. And since of our selues we haue not any hope or meanes, we onely recommend our selues vnto thy prouidence, assuring our selues, that by that meanes onely wee may bee deliuered from the pursuite and hatred of the Ægyptians: Send vs therefore speedily thine assistance, to the end that thy power may be knowen in our weakenesse. Relieue, encourage, and hearten thy people, assuring them of their safetie, who through their distrust haue sinned against thee: we are inuironed with difficulties, which notwithstanding thou canst make easie. For, the sea is thine, and this mountaine that encloseth vs; the which shall open, and the Sea also diuide it selfe into D firme land, if thou commandest them. We may likewise flie through the ayre, if it please thy power to deliuer vs in that manner. Hauing made his request vnto God after this manner, he strooke the red sea with his rod; which sodainly diuiding it selfe at that stroke, and retyring backwards, left a drie passage through the midst thereof, where through the Hebrews might escape. Moses seeing how God had made himselfe knowne, and how the sea had forsaken the land, and left his natiue channell; he first of all marched through the same, and commanded the Hebrewes to follow him, marching through that way which God had in his diuine power prouided for them, willing them to reioyce at the danger which attended their enemies, and to giue God thankes for the vnexpected succours he had sent them: who were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At the first the Ægyptians supposed them to be mad, and that they
E did headlong cast themselues into manifest perdition: but when they perceiued that they were forwardly entred without danger, and that they encountred no danger or let, they dislodged, and followed them, as if the sea ought to haue giuen them issue also; and hauing set their horse in the vauntgard, they began to descend, and enter the way of the sea. The Hebrewes perceiuing that they spent the time in arming themselues, hasted them to flie to the opposite shore, where they arriued without any disturbance; which made their enemies more bold, supposing that no euill should happen vnto them. They supposed not that this path was made expressely for the Hebrewes; but entered the same, as if it had beene a common beaten way, forgetting that it was made to saue the Hebrewes from danger, and not themselues, who sought to ruinate them. But as soone as all the Ægyptian armie was entred thereinto; the sea returned to his old
F course, and with winds and waues ouerwhelmed the Ægyptians. The showers from heauen fell vpon them, vehement thunders rattled from the ayre, intermixed with flashings, and the lightenings tempested vpon them. In briefe, there was nothing that through the wrath of God might be inflicted vpon men, which at that time hapned not vnto them. For, besides all that which hath beene spoken, an obscure and darke night surprised them, in such sort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to beare backe the tyding of their misfortune: That the Hebrewes could not containe themselues, such ioy they had conceiued through this their vnexpected deliuerance, and the totall ruine of their enemies: so that they assuredly G perswaded themselues that they were deliuered; by reason that they who had made them slaues vnto them perforce, were exterminated; and for that they had God so visibly assistant vnto them. When they had escaped this danger, and perceiuing likewise that their enemies were in this sort punished, yea and after such a manner as the like punishment hath neuer beene heard of amongst men; they all of them during the whole night, sung hymns and songs of reioyce. Moses likewise composed an Ode in Hexameter verse, containing the praises of God, and a thankesgiuing for the fauour he had done vnto them. All these things that I particularly declared, according as I haue found them written in holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to maruaile at this so wonderfull a discourse, that thorow the sea there should a passage be found, to saue so many persons in times past, and they rude and simple, whether it were done by the will of God, or that it chanced of it selfe; since not long time agoe, God so thinking it good, the sea of Pamphilia H diuided it selfe to giue way to Alexander king of Macedons souldiours, hauing no other passage to destroy the Empire of the Persians. The next day the Ægyptians armes transported by the force of the streame, were cast a shore into the army of the Hebrewes: which when Moses perceiued that it was done by the prouidence of God, to the intent they might not be disarmed; he gathered them together, and furnished the Hebrewes therewith, who afterwards ledde them to the mountaine of Sinai to sacrifice vnto God, and he offered him thankesgiuing for their deliuerance in the behalfe of the people; according as he himselfe had before time commanded him.

How MOSES conducted the people out of Aegypt to the mountaine of Sinai.

The yeare of the world, 2454. before Christs Natiuitie, 1510.

THis new and vnexpected deliuerance of the Hebrewes from their danger, was not a little obscured by the wearinesse and tediousnes of their iourney, which they indured in their trauell towards the mountaine of Sinai: by reason that the countrey was desert and inhabitable, destitute of victualls, and wholly depriued of waters; and not onely barren of that which serued for the sustenance of men, but also euery wayes destitute of pasturage and prouision for cattell: for it was not only dry and vtterly destitute of water, but also depriued of all meanes to nourish and increase fruite. Now they were inforced to prosecute their way thorow this countrey, by reason they could not otherwise chuse; so that they were constrained to beare with them the water which they had drawen before such time as they entered the desart, according as their Captaine and conductor had commanded them: which being spent, they digged pits, out of which they drew water with great difficultie, by reason of the sterilitie of the countrey: and further, the water which they found in those places was bitter, and no waies fit to drinke, and that which was worse, very little in quantitie. Trauelling onwards of their iourney after this manner, they arriued about the euening in a certaine place, which by reason the waters thereabout were brackish, they called Mara, that is to say, bitternesse: there wearied with their trauell and their prouision failing them, they began to be trauelled with necessitie, so that they resolued to stay in that place; and the rather in that they found a certaine pit there, which although it were insufficient to satisfie so great an army, yet for that they found it in that countrey, it yeelded them no little consolation. For they were giuen to vnderstand, that if they trauelled onwards they should finde no water; and as touching the water of that pit, it was so bitter and vnfit for their drinking, that it neither was agreeable with mens taste, nor supportable by their very cattell likewise. Whereupon Moses seeing them so discomforted, neither knowing in what sort to satisfie them, in that he had not to deale with an opposite army or enemie to the end to enforce, and to repell them with valor; and for that he manifestly perceiued that not onely a troupe of valiant men, but also a multitude of women and children were like to perish: he was very sore perplexed not knowing what to doe, and on himselfe he heaped the calamitie of them all; as if himselfe onely were to beare the heauy burthen of their misery. For all of them had their recourse vnto him, and to no man else; the women besought for their children, the husbands intreated for their wiues, beseeching him to take compassion of their desolations, and to furnish them with some meanes to escape their miserie. He addressed himselfe therefore in most humble manner to beseech almightie God, that it might please him to conuert the euill qualitie of the water, and to make it potable: which grace and fauour he no sooner obtained, but he tooke the end of his staffe, and cast it at his feete, and afterwards brake it in the midst, and cleft it long waies, and cast it into the pit; giuing the Hebrewes to vnderstand, that God had heard their praiers, and that he had promised them to giue them that water they desired, if so be they would obey him, and with alacrity & diligence performe that which should be commanded them. And when they were inquisitiue of that which they ought to do; to the intent the water might be changed, he enioyned euery one of them, that was of best strength and abilitie amongst them, to draw water; giuing them to vnderstand, that so soone as they had drawne out great store of water from the pit, the rest that should remaine, would be very good and conuenient to be drunke: wherein they trauelled in such sort, that the water agitated and purified by often drawing, became potable, and refected the wearie multitude. Hereupon dislodging from that place they came to Helim, a countrey that afarre off seemed very pleasant, by reason that it was planted with Palme trees; but the neerer they approched it, the more tedious they found it (for there were no more then seauentie Palme trees in that place, and they not very tall or well growne, by reason of the drinesse and barrennesse of that countrey: for they were not watered by the fountaines, whereof there were twelue in that place, neither did any one of them yeeld any moysture, to giue them sustenance) so that indeuouring themselues to dig vp the sand they could light on no veines of water, and if perhaps any litle deale appeared, it was so troubled by their digging as it became vnfit to be tasted: neither did the trees beare any store of fruit, by reason of the want of water. For which cause the whole multitude began to murmure against their guide, ascribing all the cause of their calamities and miseries vnto him. For hauing marched for the space of thirtie daies, they had consumed all that which they brought with them, and conceiuing in their imagination that there was no remedy, they were wholly surprised with despaire. Bethinking them therefore onely of that euill which was before their eyes, and forgetting the maruels which God by the ministerie and prudence of Moses hast made them both see and partake, they conceiued hatred against him, and were readie to stone him to death, as if he had beene the author of that calamitie which oppressed them. But he perceiuing the multitude so inraged and incensed against him, strengthened himselfe in God: and warranted by the testimonie of a good conscience, and the vprightnesse of his actions, he came out into the middest of them; who reuiled him, and had gatherd stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorned with a singular grace and alluring countenance, and endued with pleasing eloquence, and fit to pacifie the popularitie, he began to appease their wrath; exhorting them not onely to forget their present difficulties, but also to remember their forepassed blessings; not permitting that the trauell which they endured at that time, should driue out of their remembrance the graces and great good turnes, which they had receiued at Gods hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliuerance from that extreamitie, by the prouidence of God, who (as it were likely) made triall of their vertue, to see what perseuerance they had; or whether they kept in their remembrance those things which had hapned vnto them; or whether forgetting their forepassed pleasures, they would suffer themselues to bee swallowed with their present miserie: he willed them therefore to take heede, least through their impatience and ingratitude, they should be found vnworthy of Gods fauour; who both neglected his will, by whose direction they were brought out of Ægypt, and sore threatned and hated him, which was Gods minister, especially since hither they might no waies complaine of him in any thing, which he had vndertaken to execute by the commandement of God. Then reckoned he vp particularly vnto them, how the Ægyptians were ouerthrowne and afflicted, whilest contrarie to Gods will they endeuoured to detaine them; how the same riuer which to them was bloodie and vnprofitable to drinke of, to themselues became both sweete and potable: likewise how the sea retired it selfe, and furthered both their night and passage, wherein they saw themselues secure and free from danger: and contrariwise, their enemies destroyed, ouerthrowne and drowned; and how euen vntill that day being disarmed, they were by Gods prouidence both furnished and fortified aboundantly. Againe, how often God had deliuered them from apparent death and danger, besides all mens opinion, who being all and alwaies omnipotent, gaue them at that time, no not the least suspicion of his assistance. For which cause they were to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselues that the succour, although it were deferred, was neuer too late, which was receiued before such time as the danger had preuailed: and so to thinke that God contemned not their perils, but that he made triall of their fortitude and free loue, to see whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meate and drinke; or rather whether after the manner of brute beasts, they had leifer be trained in seruile trauell, to the end they might be glutted like them, and made the better able to endure their labour. To conclude, that he nothing feared his life (because that being vniustly slaine, no euill could happen vnto him) but that he was fearefull of their safetie, least lifting vp their hands to stone him, they should be thought to oppose themselues against Gods ordinance. Thus pacified he them, and mollified the furie they had conceiued to endanger his life; and so much preuailed hee, that they repented them of that enterprise, whereby they sought to indanger him. And for that hee knew that they had some reason to be thus mooued, hee addressed himselfe to prayer and supplication: and ascending a certaine rocke, hee required Gods helpe to releeue their infirmities, wants, and afflictions, in whose hands only the saluation of the people consisted, beseeching him in mercie to forgiue the people being exasperated with extreme miseries, and by reason thereof distracted and withdrawne from their dutie: whereupon God promised him to haue care of the people, assuring him to send them a speedie and present deliuerance. Which when Moses vnderstood, he came downe vnto the multitude: who perceiuing him altogether refreshed with ioy, by reason of those promises which he had receiued at Gods hands, exchanged their dolesome lamentations, into a habit of delight. He therefore standing vp in the midst of them, told them that he brought vnto them a most speedie remedie for their present necessitie: and not long after, a number of Quailes (which about the gulfe of Arabia multiply and increase more then any other sorts of birds) flew and crossed the sea; and being wearied in their flight, and accustomably accosting and flying neere

A to the ground, came and fell amidſt the campe of the Hebrewes: who caught them as a prouiſion prepared for them by God, and ordained to extinguiſh their famine. Whereupon Moſes once more addreſſed himſelfe to call vpon God, yeelding him thankes for the preſent and the future good hee had promiſed him. Who beeing after this manner fed and refreſhed, were preſently ſupplied with a new kinde of foode: for at ſuch time as Moſes ſtretched out his hands and prayed vnto God, a dewe deſcended from heauen that thickned betwixt his handes, which for that hee ſuppoſed it, to be an other kind of ſuſtenance ſent them by God, hee taſted the ſame; and taking pleaſure therein; for that the people knew not what it was, but thought it to be ſnowe which fell in that place, according to the ſeaſon of the yeere, hee taught them that it was no dew falling from heauen as they ſuppoſed, but that God had ſent them that grace for the conſeruation and nouriture of their bodies; and hauing eaten thereof, he gaue them of it,
B to the end he might ſtrengthen their beliefe: who taſting the ſame in like manner as their chieftaine had done, were greatly refreſhed with the ſuſtenance. For in ſweetnes and pleaſure it equalled the honie, in odour Bdellium, and in forme and greatneſſe the graine of a Coriander ſeede: of which euery one gathered, and by commandement it was enioyned that euery one of them ſhould particularly gather euery day the meaſure of an Aſſaron, which is the tenth part of an Epha, to the end that no one ſhould be ſcanted of this food: which was done to that end, leaſt the weaker ſhould want, whileſt the ſtronger thorow auarice ſhould gather more then ſufficed them. And if any one contrary to the preſcript command, had gathered more then was permitted him, although hee toyled and trauelled more then any of them, yet was his portion no
C waies increaſed by that meanes. For whatſoeuer (beſide the appointed meaſure of the Aſſaron) remained till the next morning was of no value, thorow bitterneſſe, and was putrefied thorow wormes: ſo diuine and admirable was this kind of foode, and of that nature, that who ſo had ſufficient thereof, needed no other ſort of ſuſtenance. Moreouer euen in theſe our daies, al that countrey is beſtrewed and bedewed with that kind of aliment, which God in fauour of Moſes ſent for the peoples ſuſtenance. The Hebrewes call it Manna, for in our tongue Man is an interrogation; ſignifying what is that? Thus liued they then ioifully, being ſuſtained by this kind of meat ſent the from heauen, and vſed the ſame for the ſpace of forty yeeres; during that time which they liued in the deſart. But afterwards when they were diſlodged from that place, and encamped neere to Raphidim, they were extreamely trauailed with thirſt; where, vpon their firſt arriuall they found
D ſome few ſprings, but afterwards they found the land wholly deſtitute of water. They therefore once more were incenſed againſt Moſes: but the withdrawing himſelfe apart from the furie of the people, conuerted himſelfe vnto God in prayer, beſeeching him that as he had giuen them foode in their neceſſitie, he would now alſo giue them drinke at that preſent, wherein they were welnie choaked with thirſt, praying him to prouide them of drink alſo, or otherwiſe that their meate was vnprofitable to them: whereon God preſently granted his prayer, promiſing Moſes that hee would giue him a fountaine and aboundance of water from that place from whence he leaſt expected it. Hereon he commanded him; that ſtriking vpon the rock with his rod, which was thereby hard at hand, hee ſhould from thence ſeeke that which they demanded and wanted; aſſuring him that euery one without trauell or labour ſhould haue ſufficient therefro: which counſaile
E when Moſes had receiued from Gods hands, hee returned vnto the people who expected him, and had their eies fixed vpon him: for at that time they behelde him deſcending from the rocke where hee had made his prayer. No ſooner was hee arriued, but he told them that God would in like ſort deliuer them from that neceſſitie, and would gratiouſly grant them an vnexpected reliefe; telling them that a ſloud ſhould ſodainly breake from the rocke: but they beeing amazed at that which they heard, and doubting leaſt tired with thirſt and trauelled by iourneyes, they ſhould be inforced to hewe and cleaue the rocke: Moſes ſtroke the ſame in ſuch ſort with his rod, that he diuided it in ſunder, and deliuered out moſt cleere and pure water in great aboundance. The people were very ſore aſtoniſhed at this ſo ſtrange accidēt: ſo that beholding the water, their thirſt was quenched. They afterward drunke of the water, and found it very ſweet and pleaſant,
F reſembling in the goodnes of it, the diuine bountie and power of the giuer thereof. For this cauſe they highly eſteemed Moſes, ſeeing that God had honoured him in this ſort, and they acknowledged Gods prouidence and their thankſgiuing by their ſacrifices, humbly thanking him for the care he had ouer them. The ſacred ſcriptures likewiſe, which are kept and conſecrated in the Temple, teſtifie that God had foretolde Moſes alſo that water ſhould in this ſort iſſue from the rocke.

CHAP. II.

How the Amalechites and their associates were ouercome, and how great a prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 2.

BVt when the renowne of the Hebrewes waxed great, and was spred in the eares of all men (so as the brute thereof was heard in euery part) it came to passe that the inhabitants of that countrey were in very great feare: whereupon (sending embassages the one vnto the other) they mutually incited themselues to expell and vtterly ruinate the whole nation.

Exod. 17. The Amalechites warre against the Israelites.

Amongst the rest those of the countrey of Gobol, and the Citie Petra (who are called Amalechites, a nation very warlike, and more actiue then the rest) were the chiefe agents in this expedition: whose Kings both encouraged one another, and whetted their neighbour nations to the Israelites destruction; telling them that a forraine army, flying from the thraldome of the Ægyptians, had inuaded their countrey, whose increases were not a little to be suspected: counselling them (before they had gathered head, and recouered more meanes, and a countrey to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident by reason of their forbearance) to charge them first; rather then to expect their increases, and so to oppresse them: esteeming it a better point of wisedome to represse their insolencie and frowardnes in the desart, then to expect whilst they were possessed of strong Cities, & rich meanes. For this (said they) is the part of wise men to resist the vprisings and power of their aduersaries; and not to expect, whilest by daily exploites they more & more increase, & rather to prouide to preuent, then deliuer themselues from perill. After these embassages, it was decreed by generall counsell, that they should endeuour to confront and assault the Hebrewes. These determinations and dessignes of theirs amated and troubled Moses very much, for that hee expected no hostilitie. When therefore hee perceiued that the people were affrighted, and amazed to see themselues (beeing wholly vnprouided) to bee charged by so strong and well furnished an armie; hee recomforted them; and willed them to bethinke themselues of God promises, who by his power had set them at libertie; assuring them that they should ouercome al those that made party and head against them to destroy them: wishing them to thinke, that though they were inferiour vnto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and such like; yet since they had God to friend, and ready to fight for them against their enemies, that they ought to conceiue such courage, as if they were furnished with far more then humane supplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant how great an assister God was, hauing had so often triall of his goodnesse in their greatest dangers, whom both hee knew to be an enemie to their enemies, and fauourable to their proceedings: which fauour of his he most manifestly expressed, by his miraculous deliuerance of them from hunger and thirst, by yeelding them free escape when they were shut in by sea and mountaines; and that which should most animate them to the fight and victorie at that time was, that after this plunge they should want nothing that appertained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moses thus hauing encouraged the people by his words, hee called vnto him the chiefest of the tribes, and euerie one of them that had the charge of them, both in priuate and publike assembly; commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to bee obedient to their Generall. But they contemning their danger, and desirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would prooue the final end of their calamitie: for which cause they instantly besought Moses to lead thē forth against the enemie, praying him not to dull the alacritie of the souldiers, by any vntimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out among the whole multitude, such as were most fitte for warre) hee chose Iesus the sonne of Naueus the Ephraimite to leade them, a man valiant in armes, and prouident in counsaile, and exceeding in pietie, and not degenerating in that respect from Moses his master. He also in such sort disposed certen bands that he might not in any sort be cut off from water; he left also so many as might guard the multitude, and keepe the campe and weaker company. Thus stood they all the night long in a readines to take armes; such as they had fitted for them, expecting their captaines, who should lead them out to fight as soone as Moses should command them. On the other side Moses slept not, but instructed Iosuah how hee should conduct the army. And as soone as the day appeared, he encouraged Iosuah to shew himselfe such a one in that battell, as both the place wherewith he was honoured, and the cause for which they fought, required; wishing him by his prowesse and good deserts to giue life and courage to his souldiers that followed him. He likewise exhorted the chiefest of the Hebrewes in particular, and in generall heartned and emboldned all other that entred the battell.

Moses encourageth the people to expect nothing but victorie.

Iosuah made captaine ouer the Israelites.

And

A And as touching himselfe (after hee had thus disposed the armie, by words and effect) hee retired himselfe vnto a mountaine, committing the army to Gods protection, and Iosuahs, conduct. Then encountred the armies on both sides; and euery one fought most valiantly, neither wanted there encouragements on either sides. And as long as Moses lifted vp his hands, the Hebrewes had the better against the Amalechites. But for that hee was vnable continually to support the same, (and because hee throughly perceiued and obserued, that as often as hee helde downe his hands, so long the enemies droue the Israelites to retreate) hee willed his brother Aaron and Vron (his sister Maries husband) to stand on each side of him, and sustaine his handes and succour him, for feare his forces should faile him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrewes by maine force ouercame the Amalechites, so that all of them had beene slaine, B if so bee the chace had continued, and had not beene cut off by the approach of the night. At this time our predecessours obtained a most happie and necessary victory. For they had the vpper hand ouer them that were embattelled against them; and astonished and amated the nations round about; and got great strength and riches by their trauell: for beeing seased of the enemies campe, they generally gat great riches, and particularly were all of them relieued; whereas before that time they had not necessarie meanes to maintaine themselues. And this victorie of theirs was the cause of their very great good fortune, not onely for the present, but also for the time to come. For not onely had they their enemies bodies vnder their subiection, but also their spirits; so as they were feared by all the nations round about. And they multiplied both in strength and riches: for there was a great quantitie of golde and siluer taken in the C campe. Diuers vessels likewise and tables of brasse were found therein: likewise great quantitie of tissue worke and excellent furniture for armes. Moreouer, they had all their baggage, tents, harnesse, and horses, and generally the whole prouision of an arranged battell became their prey. Then after also they became more vertuous, and industrious then before; supposing that the ende of all actions was obtained by industry. Thus ended this battell. The next day Moses caused the enemies that were slaine to be rifled, and gathered the scattered armes of those that fled. He honoured them also that had brauely demeaned themselues in the battell, & praised the captaine Iosuah in publique, whose honour was confirmed by the applause of the whole armie. There was not one Hebrew that perished that day: and so many of the enemies were there put to the sword, as their number cannot bee expressed. Hee offered likewise a sacrifice of thanksgi- D uing vnto God, and erected an altar vnto him, and dedicated it to God the Victor. Hee prophesied moreouer, that all the Amalechites should be vtterly extinguished, so that none of them should be left aliue, in that they had assaulted the Hebrews, and that in the desart, and at such time as they were in affliction. Hee feasted the Generall in like sort. This issue had this battell, which was the first that was leuied against them, or durst assault them, since their departure out of Ægypt. But as soone as Moses had celebrated a feast in memorie of the victorie, to the ende hee might giue the Hebrewes some repose after the battell abouenamed, he caused them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed souldiers. Thus passing onwards by little and little, they arriued the third month after their departure out of Ægypt neere to the mountaine of Sinai, where (as before time it hath beene declared) Moses saw the vision in the bush, and other E such like wonders.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 5. Moſes alloweth his father in laws aduice

This counſell of Raguel highly contented Moſes, ſo that hee fulfilled all that whereunto hee had ſuggeſted him, not concealing the inuention of this policie, neither attributing it to himſelfe, but declaring publikely vnto all men, that his father in law was the inuenter thereof. Hee hath likewiſe written in his bookes, thot Raguel was the author of this gouernement; accounting it no leſſe honour to attribute praiſe to thoſe that deſerue it, then ſhame to vſurpe vpon another mans deſert; ſo that hereby you may coniecture his vertue: of which hereafter in many places we haue more to ſay. Moſes afterwards aſſembling all the people, tolde them that hee would aſcend the mountaine of Sinai to talke with God, to the end that hee might afterwards returne vnto them, and impart vnto them whatſoeuer profitable thing hee had receiued from him in their behalfe. He likewiſe commanded them to pitch their tents about the mountaine, and to haue it in reuerence, by reaſon of the Proximitie of God.

CHAP. IIII.

Moſes aſcendeth the mountaine, and receiueth the Tables of the ten Commandements at Gods hands, and gaue them to the people.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cha. 6. Moſes aſcendeth the mountaine of Sinai.

THis ſaid, hee aſcended the mountaine Sinai (which is the higheſt beyond compariſon of all that countrey, and which, by reaſon of his ſtrange height, and for his ſteepe and inacceſſible ragged rockes, is not onely vnfrequented by men, but alſo may not bee beheld, by reaſon it trauelleth the eye.) Further, for that it is reported, that God conuerſeth and dwelleth on the ſame, it is held ſacred by the inhabitants, and dreadfull and vnacceſſible to all that beholde it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commandement of the Prophet, remooving their tents, pitched them at the foote of the hill, ſuſpending their iudgements, and expecting the execution of the promiſes of thoſe goods which Moſes had forepropheſied vnto them, at ſuch time as he returned frō God. And in the meane ſpace, while they expected their guide, they kept holy day, and feaſted, and purified themſelues for the ſpace of three dayes in all ſorts of purification and abſtinence from the companie of their wiues, following that which Moſes had commanded them. They beſought God alſo that he would be fauourable and aſſiſt Moſes, and by his meanes to bleſſe them with ſome fauor, that might make their life good & happy. They banquetted alſo in great pompe, and their wiues & children were richly attired: Now after they had feaſted

A feasted fortie dayes space, on the third day before Sunne-rising, a cloud couered all the Hebrewes campe (a thing before time vnseene by them) and inuironed al the place where they pitched their pauillions. And although all the rest of the countrey had a cleare and vntroubled skie; yet thereabout violent winds were raised, and hideously roared, and a tempestuous raine succeeded them; and thunderclaps dreadfull to heare, and lightnings horrible to beholde, signified that God was there present, and that Moses (with good successe, and for their profit) had conferred with him. Let those that reade this iudge thereof, as it shall please them: but as touching my selfe, it is not any waies lawfull for me to depart in any sort from that which is written in holy scriptures. That which the Hebrewes both heard and saw, in that it was strange and vnaccustomed vnto them, troubled them greatly. Furthermore, the report that was published as touching that mountaine,

B that God repaired and dwelt on the same, maruailously amated their spirits: they therefore sad and pensiue, contained themselues within their tents, thinking that Moses was destroyed thorow the wrath of God, and expecting no lesse misery themselues. But whilest they were thus troubled in thought, Moses presented himselfe vnto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleasing maiestie, and lookes so contented, as they testified the inward consolation of his mind) whom they no sooner beheld, but suddenly all their feare vanished, and in place thereof a hope of some great good happe succeeded, and withall, the aire vpon his arriuall recouered his former cleerenesse and serenitie. Hereupon hee summoned the people to a solemne and generall assemblie; to the end hee might report, and they heare, what commandements God had giuen them by him: no sooner were they assembled, but he (from an vpper place, to the end that all the peo-

C ple might both see and heare him) stood vp and spake after this manner. Know (saith he) you Hebrewes, that Almighty God, as he hath neuer neglected my prayers hitherto; so at this time also hath he entertained me (being your truchman and messenger) very graciously; and behold himselfe here in presence in your company, and propitious to your supplications, ready to prouide you of meate to sustaine your bodies, and order and dispose your policie to make it lasting and happie: now although that you see mee, and that a humane tongue speaketh vnto you, yet despise not my words, no more then you doe his workes already executed and testified vpon our nation. For if you consider the worth and wonder thereof, you shall conceiue his greatnesse that hath brought them to passe, and hath neuer denied to talke with me, and heare mee when I spake for your profit. For it is not Moses the sonne of Amram and of Iocabel, but hee it is that con-

D strained Nilus to flow with blood, and that thorow diuerse plagues hath tamed the pride of the Ægyptians: it is he that hath giuen you passage thorow the midst of the sea: it is he that hath furnished you with meat prepared from heauen, at such time as you were in extreamitie: it is he that made water spring out of the rocke to coole your thirsts, at such time as you were in necessitie: it is he by whom Adam had the possession and fruition, both of the fruit of the earth, and the fishes of the sea: By him Noe escaped from the Deluge: by him our ancient father Abraham of a wandring pilgrime, became an inhabiter of the land of Chanaan: by him Isaac was borne at such time as his father and mother were old: by him Iacob hath beene ennobled by the vertue of his twelue sonnes: by him Ioseph became Lord ouer all the forces of the Ægyptians: He it is that graciously imparteth these words vnto you by me his messenger; let there-

E fore these holsome lawes of his be holy and inuiolable amongst you, and more deere vnto you then either your wiues or children: for in obseruing the same, you shall lead a happie life, enioy a fruitfull countrey, a calme sea, and a progenie made happie according to the lawes of nature: finally, you shall become alwaies dreadfull vnto your enemies. For I haue talked face to face with God, and haue heard his immortall voice; so dearely beloued are you vnto him, and so carefull is he of the prosperitie of your nation. This said, he conducted the people (both men, women and children) to the end they might heare God talke vnto them, and teach them what to do (for feare the law should haue beene in lesser regard, if it had beene presented to their vnderstandings by a humane tongue) they all of them therefore heard his voyce descending from the mountaine, so that euery one vnderstood the same. But these precepts which Moses left re-

F gistred in two Tables, it is not lawfull for me to expresse in so many words, and therefore I will onely expresse the sentences. For he teacheth vs:

First of all that there is one God, who is onely to be worshipped.
Secondly, that no Image of any creature is to be adored.
Thirdly, that no man ought to sweare rashly.
Fourthly, that the seauenth day is not to be prophaned by any worke, Fifthly, that father and mother should be honoured.

For there fell a contention amongſt them, the one affirming that he was dead and deuoured by wild beaſts (which was their opinion, who conceiued a hatred againſt him) the other ſaid that he was rauiſhed vp vnto God: but they of the wiſer ſort among them, who tooke no pleaſure to heare any one of theſe their ſuſpicions, contained themſelues; being equally affected in reſpect of both the opinions; for that the one ſeemed not to be eſtranged I

Of the Tabernacle made by MOSES in the desart, resembling a portable Temple.

The yeare of the world, 2455. before Christs Nativitie, 1509.

NOVV when all things were prepared for this worke, as gold, brasse, and wouen worke, Moses commanded them to feast, and sacrifice each one according to his abilitie, and set forward the building of the Tabernacle. First of all therefore he measured the outward court, which in breadth contained fiftie, and in length one hundred cubites, in such manner as followeth. Hee raised pales of fiue cubites high, and twentie in length from the one side to the other, and tenne in breadth; in the hind-side to euery one of these pales or postes there were fastned rings, the chapters whereof were siluer, and the bases thereof golde, and the lower parts of these resembled the points of a speare made of brasse, and fixed in the earth. Thorow the rings there passed certaine cords of fiue cubits length, which on the one side fastned in the ground with brasen nayles of a cubits length, did fasten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle against the force of winds. Then was there a most fine silken Curtaine drawne about the same, which hanging from the chapters of the bases, and inclosing all that place, seemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three sides of the inclosure arounded. But the fourth side, being of fiftie cubites, was the front of the whole frame; the doore wherof was twenty cubits wide, hauing on both sides double barres in stead of posts; and these also were of siluer, except the bases which were of brasse; and on both sides there stood three barres well fastned, which were also hung round about with a Curtaine of wouen silke: but at the gate there hung a vaile of twentie cubits long, and fiue deepe, wouen of purple, violet and fine silke, embrodered with diuers flowers, without any figures of sensible creatures: within the gates there was a brasen Ewer, with a foote of the same mettall, wherein the Priests might wash their hands and feet. And after this manner was the enclosure of the Court; In the midst hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the East, that the rising sunne might shine vpon it: the length thereof was thirty cubits, and the breadth twelue; the one of the walles thereof was towards the South, an other towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the West; and it was as high as long; and on each side there were twentie wooden plankes foure square, and ioyned together, foure fingers thicke, and a cubit and a halfe broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and euery boord had two hinges, which were put thorow the two bases that were of siluer, & in their sockets receiued the hinges of the boords: the plankes of the west wall were sixe in number, and gilded both within and without, all of them so closed together as it seemed to bee but one wall. But on both sides there were certaine boords neerely ioyned together, which in breadth contained the measure of one cubit and a halfe; and in thicknesse, the third part of a hand breadth; and so made vp thirty cubits: but sixe boords made vp the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were ioyned other two boords cut halfe a cubit broad, which they placed in the corners in stead of whole ones: euery boord had rings of gold fastned to the outward front thereof, riueted in order, and answering one another on euery side. Thorow these rings were put certaine barres which were couered with gold, euery one fiue cubits long, which ioyned the boords together: and the ende of euery barre was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a boxe. And one the backeside of the walles of the Tabernacle, there was one ranke of barres placed long-wise, passing thorow all the plankes, in which by hookes or haspes, the sides of either were held together, and riueted and fastned one within the other; by which meanes the Tabernacle was secured from the force of winds, and kept steddy and immoueable. Within, the length thereof was diuided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubites, on the inside were placed foure pillars made of the same worke and matter, planted on like bases, and distant one from the other by equall spaces ouerthwart, beyond these was the secret place. The rest of the Tabernacle was for all the Priests; and this tripartite diuision of the Tabernacle resembled the nature of the world, for the third part (which was contained within the foure pillars, to which the Priests had no accesse) did in a manner represent heauen the seate of God: but the space of twentie cubites (which was onely permitted to the Priest, and was vnaccessible to others) resembled the sea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed fiue pillars vpon brasen bases; after these the Curtaines were spread about the Tabernacle, wouen of silke, and embrodered with purple, violet, and scarlet colours; the first of these was spread ten cubits euery way, and was drawn about the pillars, which separated the Adyt from the other space; and seuered it from the sight of men; and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that was situate beyond the foure pillars, it was called the Sanctum sanctorum, or holy of holiest: and this curtaine or vaile was pictured with all sorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diuersified with all that which might giue it ornament; but that there were no figures of liuing creatures to be found therein. The second vaile equalled the first in greatnesse, workemanship, and colour: and encompassed the fiue pillars of the entry, which reaching from the top to the middest of them, and fastened to each of them by a certaine ring, gaue accesse to the Priests that entred the same: To this almost was there annexed on the outside another vaile of like bignesse and wouen of linnen, drawne vpon cordes from the one side to the other, by meanes of certaine rings; which was sometimes spread, and other times (especially on the holy daies) vnspread, lest it should hinder the peoples sight: on the other daies (especially such as were cloudy) it was spread, and serued for a couerture to defend the painted vaile from the weather. Sithence, that custome hath continued after the building of the Temple, that another such like vaile (as this) should bee spread in the entrance. Besides this, there were ten other vailes, foure cubites broad, and twenty eight cubites long, with certaine golden hookes, enchased the one within the other, to the ende to conioyne them, so that they seemed to bee one; which beeing spread did couer the Tabernacle in the vpper part, and the walles on the sides and behind; not extending to the earth within the compasse of a foot. Moreouer, there were eleuen other hangings of equall breadth, but longer; namely, euery one of them of thirty cubits, wouen with as great arte of haires, as the other out of wooll: which couering all the rest extending to the earth, resembled the forme of a bed-chamber, one of them couered and extended from the front, which being the eleuenth, was annexed to this vse: these also were couered with certaine skinnes sewed together, which protected the same against the storme and iniurie of raine: for which cause, to them that beheld it from farre, it seemed a thing most worthy of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other sort shine, then as if a man should haue beheld the heauens. But the vailes of haire and skinnes hung after such a manner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, set to resist the force and outrage of stormes and tempests.

Of the Arke, wherein Moses placed the Tables of the Law.

Exod. 37. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8.

AFTER that the Tabernacle was after this manner builded, they erected also an Arke, which was dedicated vnto God, of a certaine wood that was naturally strong, and such as was permanent and resisted corruption. This in our natiue tongue is called Heoron, framed after this manner. The length thereof was of fiue handfuls, and the breadth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was couered with golden plates, and it had a couer fitted with golden hinges, egall on euery side. And to euery side in length there were fastened two rings of gold, driuen and riueted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certaine barres of gold were thrust, that whensoeuer there were any neede, it might be carried any wayes: for neuer was it borne on beasts backs, but the Priests bare it on their shoulders. On the couer thereof there were two semblances planted, which the Hebrewes call Cherubins (which are winged creatures, of a strange forme, the like whereof were neuer seene by any man) which Moses saw figured on Gods seate. In this Arke he placed the Tables containing the tenne commandements: in euery one fiue, and in euery page two and a halfe: and this Arke hid hee within the Sanctuarie.

Of the Table and Candlesticke of gold, and of the Altars of the Tabernacle.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9.

IN the Tabernacle hee placed a Table not vnlike to that at Delphos, two cubites in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feete thereof, from the midst downewards, were like those feete which the Doriens set vnto their beds; but that which ascended from the other halfe vpwards, was square: The bodie of this Table was arounded with a border standing out foure fingers length, and in euery of the feete there were rings fastened about the top of the foote, to which were annexed on both sides two things after the manner of handles, gilded, and framed of most firme wood, which were not thrust thorow the circle on both sides like barres, but with a button tooke hold of the vpper border of the Table, and beneath comprehended the ring of the foot, being a means to transfer it whithersoeuer need requi-

This was wont to bee placed in the Temple towards the North wall,not farre from the Sanctuarie : and on it were placed twelue vnleauened loaues, ſet ſixe by ſixe the one ouer againſt the other,and made of two Aſſars of the pureſt wheate, which meaſure of the Hebrewes contained ſeauen Cotylas of the Achenians;and aboue theſe loaues two golden pots filled with frankincenſe;but after ſeuen dayes other loaues were ſet in their place on that feſtiuall day,which wee call the Sabbath. The cauſe of which ceremonie ſhall hereafter bee declared by vs. Hard by this Table neere the South wall, was placed a Candleſticke of molten golde (but not ſolide) of one hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrewes call Cinchares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with boawles, lillies, pomgranats, and little cuppes; then ariſing vpwards from one baſe,it was diuided into ſeauen branches,according to the number of the Sunne and the reſt of the Planets : it ſtretched out likewiſe into ſeauen heads, hauing orderly correſpondence the one with the other, on which were planted ſeauen candles,according to the number of the ſeauen Planets, which branched out towards the Eaſt and South,in that the Candleſticke was ſet ſidelong. Betweene this and the Table(as I ſaide) was a little Altar erected for incenſe, made of laſting wood likewiſe, and couered on euery ſide with a ſolide plate,beeing a cubit broad from euery corner, and twiſe as high, on which there ſtood a little hearth enuironed with a golden crowne on euery ſide, in which were rings with their barres and ſtaues, whereby it might be borne by the Prieſts in the way. There was another Altar of wood alſo before the doore of the Tabernacle, couered with plates of braſſe, fiue cubits ſquare,and three high,decked with golde in like ſort, and plated with braſſe,the hearth whereof was made after the manner of a grate : for the earth receiued whatſoeuer fire fell from aboue by reaſon there was no baſe therevnder, but neere vnto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and cenſers,and cups,with other inſtruments made for the diuine ſeruice,al which were of pure gold.

Of the veſtment of the Prieſt,and of the high Prieſt.

SVCH was the Tabernacle with all that belonged thereunto. Now remaineth for mee to diſcourſe as well of the veſtments of the other Prieſts,which they call Chaneas,as of the Prieſt, whom they name Sar-Hazabachin, ſignifying thereby the high Prieſt. And firſt of all as touching the ordinary Prieſts. When as the Sacrificer (purified according to the purification which is ordained by the Law)addreſſeth himſelfe to ſacrifice : he firſt of all inueſteth himſelf with Manachaſſes(which is as much to ſay,a truſſe or reſtrainer,which is a kind of breech or ſlop, couering the priuities, made of wouen ſilke) where through hee thruſts his feete, as in a paire of vpper breeches, and faſtens the ſame about his loynes: On this hee caſts a linned ſhirt or ſurplice, made of double linnen (which wee call Chetomene)and that word ſignifieth a linnen garment or ſurplice : for we call linnen Cheton (that kinde of garment is a coate comming downe to the ankles,bound to the bodie; hauing narrow ſleeues about the armes)which is tied vpon the breaſt a little beneath the armeholes,with a girdle foure fingers broad,inwardly void,ſo wrought as it ſeemed to be like a ſerpents skinne.) It is likewiſe pictured with red, purple,Hyacinthine and ſilken flowers,but the ground is only ſilke;which being twiſe doubled about his breaſt,extendeth downe to his ankles at ſuch time as he deſiſteth from ſacrifice,(and this ſeemed they to weare in way of ornament)but when as hee is to miniſter in ſacrifice,then(leaſt blowne vp by the wind, it ſhould hinder his worke)he caſts it on his left ſhoulder. This girdle Moſes calleth Abaneth,and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians,name it Emian(for ſo call they it.) This coat was in no manner pleited,and in the necke hath a broad opening,faſtened about the two ſhoulders with claſpes,from the edge of the coller to the breaſt and the middeſt of the backe: This call they Maſſabaſſanes. But on his head he weareth a hat(not made with a high crowne, neither comprehending the whole head,but ſomewhat more then the halfe:)this is called*Maſnaemphthes*; which is decked and dight after ſuch a rate,that it ſeemed a Chapplet made of thicke Riban, or of wouen linnen often times doubled and ſowed, which in the vpper part is couered with another linnen, deſcending to the front, hiding thoſe ſeames of the Riban which were vnſeemely to bee beheld; this is curiouſly fitted, leaſt during the time of ſacrifice it ſhould ſlip off. colours (not vnlike the former) but that it is ſtudded with golde: but the skirt of the veſture is bordered with fringes, ſowed together, to which are tied certaine counterfait pomgranates with certaine golden bels, properly diſpoſed; ſo that betweene two Pomgranates, there is placed a bell, and betweene two bels one Pomgranate. This coate is not made of two pieces (as hauing ſeames on the ſhoulders, and on the ſides) but a long vaile wouen and left open in the coller, not athwart but long-waies, from the breaſt to the middeſt of the backe. To it is a riban or hemme faſtned, leaſt the opening ſhould bee perceiued: it is likewiſe open in that place where the hands ſhould be put out. Beſides theſe veſtures, hee hath a third called an Ephod (reſembling a Grecian frocke, that is made after this manner.) It is wouen of diuers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midſt of the breaſt there is a ſpace left open: the ſleeues are made in ſuch maner, & all the reſt in ſuch ſort compoſed, that it ſeemeth to be a coat: in this void ſpace there is a piece enchaſed of the bignes of a ſpan long, embrodered with the ſame colours, golde, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Eſſen, that is as much to ſay, as Rationall (which wholly filleth the ſpace that was left void by them that haue wouen the Ephod.) And this piece is ioyned with the Ephod, and to euery corner thereof with buckles of gold, which are tied with a lace of Hyacinth applied to tie them together with theſe buckles. And to the end the ſpace between the buckles bee not ſlacke, they filled the ſuture with a Hyacinthine threed: but on either ſhoulder two Sardonix ſtones enchaſed in golde (in ſtead of buttons) doe tie the hood or Ephod; in theſe are ingrauen the names of Iacobs ſonnes in Hebrew Characters, in eyther ſtone ſixe: ſo that the elder of them were placed on the right ſhoulder. Moreouer twelue precious ſtones diſtinguiſh the Eſſen or Rationall it ſelfe, of excellent greatnes and beautie, which for their ineſtimable price could not be bought by any priuate man. They were inchaſed three and three in foure ranks in certaine crownes of golde, to the end they might not fall out: in the firſt order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the ſecond, a Carbuncle, a Iaſpis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurius, an Amethyſt, and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chryſolite, an Onyx, and a Berill ſtone. In theſe were the names of Iacobs ſonnes engrauen, whom we eſteeme for the firſt authors of our tribes (euery ſtone being honoured with a ſeuerall name, according to the order of their birth.) But whereas theſe rings (whereof before wee haue ſpoken) are weake and cannot ſuſtaine the waight of the precious ſtones, they made other two greater in the toppe of the Rationall inclining toward the neckeward, beeing eminent aboue the texture, which might receiue the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the ſhoulders to be faſtened with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked, and conueied certaine pipes, put thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brim behinde the Ephod, to faſten the Rationall, to the end it ſhould neither ſway this waies nor that waies. To the ſame Rational alſo was there a girdle ſewed, diſtinguiſhed with the ſaid colours & gold; which comprehending the whole, and againe knit vpon the ſeame was ſuffered to hang downewards. And as touching the fringes, they were ſhut in hollow loops of gold from the one end to the other. Now his hat was ſuch as the other prieſts vſed, on which there ſtood an other ſewed thereto, and flouriſhed with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was inuironed with a golden crowne, in which there were diuers veſſels of gold made after ſuch a ſort as may be ſeene in that herbe which we call Daccharus, and amongſt the Grecian herbaliſts, Henbane. And leaſt any man that hath heretofore ſeene the ſame, ſhould be ignorant of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the ſame, hath not ſeene the herbe it ſelfe; I haue thought good to ſet downe the deſcription thereof in this place. This herbe is of the height of three ſpans, it hath a roote like a Turnep or Nauew (and he ſhall not erre, that in regard thereof ſhall compare it therewith) it hath leaues that reſemble Smallage or Rocquet: this out of the ſtem thereof yeeldeth forth a certaine bud cleauing to the branches of it, inueſted with a coat, which it caſteth off when the fruite waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the ioynt of a little finger, hauing a circumference like vnto a cup; which I will deſcribe more fitly, once againe that the ignorant may the better diſcouer it. In the lower part therof about the bottome it reſembleth in roundnes a halfe boawle; and according as it groweth euery part thereof is ſtreightned, vntill being againe dilated in the extremitie or brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much vnlike to a Pomgranate cut in the middeſt, to which there is annexed and groweth a round couer as if turned and framed on purpoſe, hauing theſe eminent clefts (as I ſaide) like to the middeſt of a Pomgranate, reſembling the pointed and ſharpe thornes, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certaine fruit vnder the couer, and in the whole cup is like to the ſeed of the herbe Sideritis, his flower is not much vnlike that which ſpringeth from the Poppey. Such was this crowne about the necke and the two temples, for theſe cups came not neere the front or brow. For on the

the ſame there was as it were a bend of golde, on which the name of God was engrauen. Such were the ornaments of the high Prieſt. The yeare of the world, 2455. before Chriſts Nativitie, 1509.

I cannot therfore but greatly wonder at the ſtrange and cauſeleſſe malice, which other nations haue conceiued againſt vs, as if wee were iniurious againſt the diuine maieſtie, which (they ſay) they ſo much honour. For, if a man marke the compoſition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Prieſt, and conſider all the neceſſaries which wee vſe in celebrating the diuine ſeruice; they ſhall finde that our law-maker was a man of a diuine ſpirit, and that we without any deſert are iniured by other nations. For if without partialitie a man will duely examine it, hee ſhall finde that all things haue beene done to repreſent and figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, diuided into three parts, whereof two are left for the ſacrificers as a place prophaned and common, ſignifying the land and ſea wherein all ſorts of creatures are conuerſant. B But the third part is ſequeſtred and reſerued for God alone; in like ſort as the heauen is vnacceſſible by men. The table on which the twelue loaues were placed, ſignifieth the yeere diuided into 12. moneths. The candleſticke made of ſeauenty peeces, ſignifieth the twelue ſignes, thorow which euery one of the ſeauen Planets paſſe: the ſeauen lampes that were therin, repreſented the ſeauen Planets. The vailes made of foure ſeuerall kinds of ſtuffes reſembled the foure Elements. For the linnen ſeemed to repreſent the earth, from whence it was drawne and deriued. The purple reſembled the ſea, becauſe the purple colour is made of the blood of a ſhel-fiſh called Murex. The Hyacinth ſignifieth the ayre: and as touching the ſcarlet, it ſignifieth the fire. The tunicle likewiſe of the high Prieſt, demonſtrateth the earth, for it is made of linnen. The Hyacinth ſheweth the Pole: the Pomegranates reſembled the lightning; as the bels the noyſe of the thunder. C The ſircot ſheweth that the whole world is compaſſed of foure Elements reſembled in his foure colours, to which gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that light is annexed to all things. Eſſen alſo is planted in the middle thereof in ſuch ſort as the earth obtaineth the middle place of the world. Likewiſe the girdle wherewith he is girt reſembleth the ſea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix ſtones (ſet as buttons or loopes in the high Prieſts garment) ſignifie the Sun and Moone: the number of the gems are alluded to the number of the moneths, or the twelue houſes, or the equall number of the parts of that circle, which the Græcians call the Zodiacke (hee ſhall not much erre that followeth either the one, or the other of theſe opinions.) The cap likewiſe hath an alluſion to heauen, by reaſon of his azure or Hyacinthine colour, D for otherwiſe the name of God might be placed therein. For it was beautified with a crowne of gold, to ſignifie the light wherein God highly delighteth. Let this ſuffice for the preſent, for that which we ſhall diſcourſe hereafter, will furniſh vs with ſufficient and ample matter to ſhew and ſet out the vertue of our Law-maker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Prieſthood, and the lawes which appertaine to the feaſts and ſacrifices.

E AFTER theſe things aboue ſaide were finiſhed and left as yet vnconſecrated, God appeared vnto Moſes, commanding him to eſtabliſh Aaron his brother in the Prieſthood (who in reſpect of his vertue, deſerued that title of honour aboue all the reſt.) For which cauſe Moſes (aſſembling the congregation) diſcourſed vnto them his vertues, and diſcouered his good affection, and reckoned vp vnto them how many dangers he had ſuffered in their behalfe, (whereof each of them gaue ample teſtimony, declaring the forward zeale and loue they alwaies bare vnto him) whereupon hee ſpake vnto them after this manner. The worke is now brought to ſuch an end as it hath pleaſed God, and hath beene poſſible for vs: and for that you know we are to receiue him into this Tabernacle, wee ought aboue all things to haue an eſpeciall care in the election of ſuch a one, who ſhall make ſacrifice and ſupplication for vs. Touching my ſelfe, if the matter depended on my priuate choiſe, I ſhould eſteeme no man more worthy then my F ſelfe to execute this function, both for that naturally men loue themſelues, and for that I am well aſſured, how many trauels I haue ſupported for your ſafety ſake: But God himſelfe hath iudged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath choſen him for his high Prieſt and Sacrificer, in that hee excelleth all other of vs in equitie and iuſtice: commanding that hee ſhould bee inueſted with the robe conſecrated to God, and that hee ſhould take charge of the altars and ſacrifices. Hee ſhall make prayers for you vnto God, who will heare them willingly, by reaſon that he hath care of your race and will receiue them proceeding from a perſonage whom hee himſelfe had elected.

lected. These words of his were gratefull vnto the people, and they all of them approoued the G election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour then any other, both by reason of his race, as also in regard of the prophecying spirit and vertue of his brother: he had at that time foure sonnes, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoeuer remained of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was employed to make vailes to couer the Tabernacle, Candlesticke, Altar, and the other instruments, to the end that in their trauaile they should not bee soiled, either by raine or dust. And hauing once more assembled the people together, hee commanded them to offer euery one of them halfe a sicle; (now the sicle is a kinde of Hebrew coyne, that is as much in value as foure Athenian drammes) whereunto they obiected willingly, so that the number of them that offered was sixe times one hundreth thousand, fiue hundreth and fiftie: and they that brought this money were such H as were of a free condition, and betwixt the yeeres of twentie and fifty; and that which was receiued, was employed in the necessaries of the Temple. Then did hee purifie the Tabernacle, and the Priests, in manner and forme following. Hee tooke the waight of fiue hundreth sicles of chosen-Myrrhe, and the like quantity of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus) which is a most odoriferous drugge) the halfe of the saide waight; and hee caused all these to bee beaten and infused into a Hin of oyle of oliue, others write palme (this Hin is one of our measures containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed & boiled together, according to the art of perfumers, and he made thereof a most odoriferous oyntment: which hee tooke and annoynted the Priest withall, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them; offering many and sundry sorts of beasts of great price to sacrifice within the temple vpon the Altar of I gold (whereof I forbeare to speake any further, for feare I should grow offensiue and tedious to the readers.) Twice a day before the Sunne rise, and Sunne set, they were to burne incense, and purifie the oyle and refresh the lampes, whereof three ought to burne euery day vpon the sacred Candlesticke in honour of God, and the rest were lighted in the euening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Beseleel and Eliab were the most excellent and experteſt workemen: for whatsoeuer had beene enterprised by others, they in their arte polished and perfected; and they of themselues found many new things of their owne inuention: yet was Beseleel iudged the most excellent of them two.

All the time employed in this worke, was seauen moneths, and at that time was the yeere accomplished, which began at their departure out of Ægypt. In the beginning of the second yeere, K in the moneth which the Macedonians call Xantichus, and the Hebrewes Nisan, vpon the newe Moone they dedicated the Tabernacle with all things belonging thereunto, according as I haue made mention. And God presently testified that both their gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrewes labours fruitfull and pleasant in his sight, testifying his presence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the heauen was otherwaies cleere and faire, ouer the Tabernacle only there was a cloud, not wholly thicke like a winter storme, nor obscure; and yet not so thinne as a man could see thorow the same, from whence there descended a dewe that gaue testimonie of Gods presence vnto them that had will, and beliefe. Moses honoured the workmasters that made the worke, with such rewards as appertained vnto them by desert; and sacrificed according as God had commanded him in the doore or porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, a Ramme, and a Kid L for their sinnes (but with what ceremony these things are done, I will declare when I intreat of sacrifices, as also what offerings are to bee burnt by fire, and according to the lawe are allowed to be fed vpon) and with the blood of the slaughtred beasts he besprinkled the vestment of Aaron, and purified both him and his children with fountaine water and the pretious ointment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seuen daies space he consecrated both themselues, and their vestments and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained thereunto, with that oyle whereof I haue before time foretold you, with the blood of Buls, and Rammes slaine euery other day after their kind. But on the eight day he proclaimed a holy day and festiuall to all the people, and decreed that euery one of them should particularly sacrifice according to his M abilitie, and they with emulation (striuing to exceede one another) obeyed him, and offered vp their sacrifices according as it was commanded them.

Whilest thus the sacrifices were vpon the Altar, sodainly there issued a fire from them, which kindled of it selfe, the flame whereof resembled the light or brightnesse of lightning; and consumed all that which was vpon the Altar. At that time there hapned an inconuenience to Aaron, which although it somewhat mooued and amated his fatherly patience, yet digested hee it with a constant and generous mind: for he was a man of much constancy, and such a one as knew that nothing

A nothing could befall him without the preſcience and prouidence of God. For of thoſe foure ſons (which I told you that hee had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing ſacrifices vnto the Altar (not ſuch as were appointed by Moſes, but of that ſort they were accuſtomed to offer before times) were burned by the violent flame that iſſued from the Altar, ſeiſing both their breaſts and faces, in ſuch a ſort, as by no meanes poſſible that might bee extinguiſhed; ſo that at leugth they died. Moſes commanded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the hoſt, and burie them ſumptuouſly: all the people wept and were amazed very much at this their death, ſo ſtrange and vnexpected. But Moſes ordained that neither the father, nor his ſonnes ſhould lament; but that they ſhould rather make eſtimate of Gods honour, then of their owne misfortune: for Aaron was already inueſted in the ſacred robe. But as touching Moſes, he refuſed all honours which were offered him by the people, neither ap-
B plied he himſelfe vnto any other thing but to the ſeruice of God: neither did hee aſcend any more vp to the mountaine of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle to take counſaile at Gods hands in thoſe things, whereof hee had neede to be informed. Hee demeaned himſelfe like a priuate man, not onely in his apparrell, but in all other things, and liued very popularly, perſeuering in that familiar and ciuill courſe of life, and challenging no priuiledge aboue any man, but onely in thoſe things which pertayned to the adminiſtration of the commonweale.

Beſides theſe, he reduced vnder writing both the lawes and ordinances as touching Policie, in due performance whereof if they ſhould liue, they ſhould be both agreeable to God, and
C liue without cauſe of controuerſie the one againſt the other. And all this eſtabliſhed hee, following thoſe directions, which God inſtructed him in. But now will I returne and bend my ſtile to diſcourſe vpon that which I haue omitted in the ornament of the high Prieſt: for this apparrell of theirs leaueth not any occaſion to falſe prophets, to execute their wicked impoſtures: and if there bee any ſuch, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods maieſtie, this habite maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to bee preſent with the ſacrificers, at ſuch time as it pleaſeth him; and to be abſent when him liſteth: which God would haue made knowne not onely to the Hebrewes, but to all thoſe ſtrangers, who by any occurrence might be eye-witneſſes of the ſame. For of thoſe ſtones which the high Prieſt bare on his ſhoulders (which were Sardonixes, whoſe nature is ſo notorious to all men, that it were vn-
D neceſſarie to reueale it (the one ſhined at ſuch time as there was any offering, & that other which was faſtened on his right ſhoulder, ſhined very cleerely at ſuch time as God was preſent at the ſacrifice, and caſt his raies afarre off, that it might be perceiued by thoſe that beheld the ſame, both contrarie to his nature and cuſtome: which truly deſerueth admiration amongſt all men, except thoſe who thorow contempt of religion, doe hunt after an opinion of wiſedome. But that which I will now ſpeake of is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelue ſtones which the high Prieſt bare (ſewed and inchaſed in his Rationall in the midſt of his breaſt) God was wont to foreſignifie victorie to thoſe that were addreſſed to battell. For ſuch brightneſſe lightned out of them, euen before ſuch time as the army did diſlodge or enter skirmiſh, that it was notoriouſly knowne to the people, that God was preſent and readie to aſſiſt them: for which E cauſe the Greeks making account of our manner of liuing, in that they had no power or reaſon to contradict it, haue called that Rationall which we tearme Eſſen (mooued thereunto by this expreſſe miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rationall and the ſtone Sardonix gaue ouer to ſhine two hundreth yeeres before I began to write theſe Antiquities, by reaſon of Gods wrath which he had conceiued through the breach of his lawes (of which at another time I will more fitly intreate, and at this time continue and proſecute my intended diſcourſe and purpoſe. After the Tabernacle had beene thus conſecrated, and that which appertained to the Prieſts was ſet in order, the people was perſwaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and began to ſacrifice and ſing hymnes of praiſes; as to him that had driuen farre from them all ſuſpicion of euill, and from whom they expected in time to come farre better and F more proſperous things; and both in generall and in particular they offered gifts vnto God according to their tribes: for the gouernours of the tribes (aſſembling themſelues together two by two) prepared a charriot and a yoake of Oxen, ſo that there were ſixe charriots to beare the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore euery one of them offered a viall and a cenſer, and a cofer to keepe incenſe in, which was eſteemed to be worth tenne Dariques, and this was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the cenſer was of ſiluer, and both of them together weighed two hundreth ſicles; yet on the viall there were but 70. employed: and both the cofer cofer and viall were filled with meale ſteeped and moulded in oyle, which they were wont to G vſe at the Altar, at ſuch time as they offered ſacrifice. They offered likewiſe a Calfe, and a Ram, with a Lambe of one yeere old, for a burnt ſacrifice; and a Goat for a ſinne offering. All the other gouernours likewiſe brought euery one of them their ſacrifice called Salutarie, for euery day two Oxen and fiue Rams, with a Lambe and a Goat of a yeere old, and ſacrificed them during the terme of twelue daies euery one. But Moſes aſcended no more to the mountaine of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was inſtructed by God of that which he had to doe, and what lawes he ought to make, which are ſo good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wiſedome: They haue beene faithfully obſerued likewiſe alwaies, becauſe they are ſuppoſed to be receiued from God. So that not any one of his lawes haue beene tranſgreſſed by the Hebrewes, neither in peace (at ſuch time as they liued to their content) nei- H ther in warre, at ſuch time as they were afflicted therewith. But I will now ceaſe to ſpeake of theſe lawes, being reſolued to compoſe an other treatiſe as touching the ſame.

CHAP. X.

The ordinances of Sacrifices and Purifications.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cha. 13. al. 12.

NOVV will I only reckon vp a few things as touching the purifications and ſacrifices (in that we haue begun to talk of ſacrifices.) The ſacrifices are of two ſorts: the one of them is made for a priuate perſon; the other for the people in generall: and theſe are made in two manners; for in the one, all is conſumed which is vpon the Altar, which for that cauſe I

Two kinds of ſacrifices.

are called Holocauſts, that is to ſay, Burned. The other are of thankſgiuing, and they are made with banquets of thoſe that ſacrifice. But firſt of all I will ſpeake of the firſt kind. The particular perſon that offered a burnt offering, killed an Oxe, a Lambe, and a Goate of one yeere old, (yet is it lawfull to kill oxen more elder.) But all thoſe creatures which muſt be conſumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Prieſts beſprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dreſſe they the beaſt, and cut it in pieces, and pouder it with ſalt, and lay it on the Altar alreadie charged with cleft wood, and flaming fire: then after they haue well cleanſed the feete and intrails, they lay them with the reſt; and the prieſts take the skinnes. Such is the manner of a burnt offering or Holocauſt. They that offer ſacrifices of thankſgiuing, kill likewiſe ſuch ſorts of beaſts without ſpot, and more then a yeere old; both male and female: and K after they haue cut their throats, they ſprinkle the bloud on the Altar: then take they the reines, the caule, and all the fat; with the lobe of the liuer, and the tayle of the Mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the breaſt, and the left leg is left to the Prieſts: and as touching the reſt of the fleſh, the Prieſts banquet therewith for the ſpace of two daies; and if then there remaine any thing thereof it is burned. The ſame cuſtome and ceremonie likewiſe is obſerued in the ſacrifice for ſins: but thoſe that are not of abilitie to offer the greater offerings, offer vp two Pigeons, or two Turtles, the one of which the Prieſts haue to feaſt withall, and the other is conſumed with fire. We will intreat more expreſſely of the ſacrifices of ſuch beaſts, at ſuch time as we ſhall diſcourſe vpon ſacrifices. For he that hath ſinned vpon ignorance offereth a Lambe, and a ſhee Goat at the ſame time. The Prieſt beſprinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in ſuch manner as it is ſaid L heretofore, but the hornes of the Altar only: and on the Altar they offer the kidneies, and the reſt of the fat, with the lobe of the liuer: the prieſts carry away the skins, and eate the fleſh within the Temple the very ſame day; becauſe the law permitteth them not to reſerue any thing till the next morrow: he that hath ſinned (and that knoweth it in himſelfe without the knowledge or priuitie of any other man) offereth a Lambe according as the law commandeth, the fleſh whereof is in like ſort deuoured by the Prieſts the ſame day: but if the gouernours offer for their ſinnes, they ſacrifice in like manner as priuate men doe, and are different from them in that they bring a Bull, or a male Kid. The law alſo ordaineth, that in ſacrifices both priuate and common, there ſhould be fine flower brought, for a Lambe, the meaſure of an Aſſar; for a Ramme, M

the meaſure of two; with a Buſl, three; which flower is firſt of all mingled and wrought with oyle, and ſet vpon the Altar to be ſanctified. They that ſacrifice likewiſe doe bring oyle, the halfe part of a Hin for a Bull; for a Ramme, the third of the ſame meaſure; and for a Lambe, the fourth part: this Hin is an Hebrew meaſure, which containeth two Attique Choas: they brought alſo the like meaſure of wine as of oyle, and poured out the wine neere to the Altar. And if any without ſacrificing offer vp fine flower, he putteth the firſt fruits vpon the Altar, that is to ſay one handfull, and the reſt is taken by the Prieſts for their maintenance, either fried

A (for they are kneaded in oyle) or with loaues made thereof: but whatſoeuer the Prieſt offereth, all that muſt be burned. The law likewiſe forbiddeth to offer any beaſt whatſoeuer, that day that it is borne, or to kill it with his damme, or in any other ſort before it hath fedde twelue daies. There are alſo other ſacrifices made for deliuerance from ſickneſſe, or for other cauſes; in which ſacrifices they employ wine or licour with that which is offered, of which licours it is not lawfull to reſerue any thing againſt the next morrow, when the Prieſts haue taken that portion which belongeth to, and ſufficeth them. The law commandeth that on the common purſe there be euery day killed a Lambe of a yeere old, the one in the morning, the other at the ſhutting vp of the euening: and on the ſeauenth day, which is called the Sabbath, that two ſhould be offered in that manner as hath beene declared. And on the new Moone beſides their daily offe-

B rings they ſacrifice two Oxen, ſeauen yeerling Lambes, and a Wether and a Kid, for the abolition of thoſe ſinnes which are committed thorow forgetfulneſſe. On the ſeauenth moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) beſides the aboue-named, they ſacrifice a Bull, one Mutton, ſeuen Lambes, and a Kid for ſinnes. The tenth day of the ſame moneth according to the Moone, they faſt till the euening, and on the ſame day they ſacrifice a Bull, two Muttons, ſeauen Lambes, and a Goat for a ſinne offering: beſides which they bring two Kids, one of which is ſent aliue out of the limits of the campe into the deſart (on whom all the euill may fall, if ſo be any bee threatned to the people) the other is borne without the camp into a cleane place, where it is burned with the skinne, being not any waies purged: with this they burne a Bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but by the proper coſts of the Prieſt. This Bull being opened

C and ſlain, & the blood therof (with that of the goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he ſprinkleth the couer thereof with his finger ſeuen times, and the pauement as many times, and the Tabernacle & the Altar of gold, and all the reſt about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. Beſides that, they ſet on the Altar the reines, and the fat with the lobe of the liuer, and the Prieſt offereth vnto God a Mutton for a burnt offering. The fifteenth day of the ſaid moneth (at ſuch time as it draweth towards winter) he commanded them to plant Tabernacles euery one in his family, againſt the inſtant cold weather which the increaſing yeere was wont to bring, and that when they ſhould enioy their countrey, and ſhould enter that City which they ſhould hold for their Metropolitane, (by reaſon of the Temple which ſhould be there builded) they might cele-

D brate a feaſt during eight daies ſpace, in offering burnt offering & ſacrifices vnto God: and that in witneſſe of their thankſgiuing, they ſhould beare in their hands a branch of Mirtle, and of Willow tied together with wooll, and a bough of Palme likewiſe, to which a Peach was faſtned; and that the firſt day they ſhould ſacrifice thirteene Oxen, and fourteene Lambes, and two Sheepe, with a Goat for a ſinne offering. Thoſe daies that inſued they ſacrificed likewiſe a like number of Lambes, and Wethers with a Kid, and in rebating day by day the number of Oxen, they come backe to the ſeauenth. The eight day they ceaſe from worke, on this day (as we haue ſayd) they ſacrifice a Calfe, a Ram, and ſeauen Lambs, and a Kid for a ſinne offering: and it is the cuſtome of the Hebrewes to performe theſe ſacrifices at ſuch time as they pitch their Tabernacles. In the month Xantique (which we call Niſan) which is the firſt month of the yeare, the fourteenth day after the new Moone, the Sun being in Aries (for at that time were we deliuered out of Ægypt)

E he ordained that euery yeare we ſhould do ſacrifice, which we cal the paſſeouer, which (as I ſaid) was celebrated the ſame time that we departed out of Ægypt. This ſolemnity of Eaſter we celebrate by companies, without reſeruing any thing of that which is offered till the next day. The fifteenth day the feaſt of vnleuened bread followeth the ſolēnity of the Paſſeouer, & during thoſe ſeuen daies, it is vnlawfull to eate any vnleauened bread, and euery day are ſlaine two Bulls, one Ram, and ſeauen Lambes, which are all conſumed with fire, to which there is added a Kid for a ſinne offering, for a ſeuerall daies banquet to feaſt the Prieſts with. The ſecond day of this feaſt of vnleauened bread (which is the ſixteenth of the month) they begin to enioy the fruites that are mowed, and before that time vntouched: and for that it is very conuenient that GOD ſhould bee honoured with the firſt fruites thereof, from whom they receiue ſuch aboundance,

F they offer the firſt fruits of Barley after this manner. After they haue dried a handful of the eares, they beat or threſh it, and clenſe the Barley from the chaffe, and offer an Aſſar of the ſame vpon the Altar vnto God, & after they haue caſt a handful of the ſame on the Altar, they leaue the reſt for the Prieſts vſe: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reape as wel in publike as in particular. With theſe firſt fruits they ſacrifice vnto God a Lambe for a burnt offering. Seauen weekes after the feaſt of the Paſſeouer (that is fortie nine dayes) on the fiftieth (which the Hebrewes by reaſon of the number, call Aſartha) they offer vnto God a leauened bread made of wheat wheate flower of the quantitie of two Assars, and sacrifice two Lambes, which are onely offered G vp to God; and afterwards are prepared for the Priests dinner; and it is not lawfull for them to reserue any thing thereof vntill the next day. But the burnt offerings are of three Calues, two Wethers, and fourteene Lambs, besides two Kids for a sin offering. There is not any feast wherin they offer not a burnt offering, and desist not from all manuell labor: but in euery one of the same there is ordained a certaine sort of sacrifice which they ought to doe; and it is presently ordered, that they rest from their labours, and after sacrifice fall to banquet. On the common charge they offered vnleauened bread of twentie foure Assars of flower; and those loaues they baked two by two the day before the Sabbath, and the day of the Sabbath in the morning they bring it, and set it on the sacred Table, opposing sixe to sixe, the one against the other; and vpon them are imposed two platters full of incense; and these things remaine after this maner till the next Sabbath, and then set they new in the place of the first, which are giuen to the Priests for their maintenance. H The incense is cast into the sacred fire in which the burnt offerings are consumed, and in place thereof there is new incense put. The Priest also sacrificeth on his owne charge flower mingled with oyle, and a little baked by fire, and this doth he twise euery day, and bringeth to the fire halfe an Assar of flower in the morning, and the other halfe in the euening. But I will entreate hereof more expresly hereafter, and for the present me thinks I haue sufficiently spoken already.

Leuit. 8. Num. 3.

Moses separated the tribe of Leui, and exempted them from the other people, to the end they might be consecrated vnto God; and he purified them with liuing fountaine water, and purged them with solemne sacrifice, and committed the Tabernacle to their charge, with all the holy things pertaining thereunto, and all the rest which had bin made for the couer of the Tabernacle, I to the end they might be ministers to the Priests their superiours, who were already consecrated to God. After this he distinguished the beasts also, namely those that were to be eaten from those which were to be forborne and abstained from (of which we will speake at such time as occasion is offered vs, and will bring proofes; and the reason which induced him to ordaine, that some were proper to feede vpon, and for what cause he would that we should abstaine from other some.) He hath generally interdicted all vse of blood in meates, esteeming the blood to bee the soule and spirit of beasts. Hee hath also generally prohibited to eate the flesh of those beasts that died by themselues: likewise the caule and fat of goates, of sheepe and oxen. He thrust them likewise out of the company and conuersation of men, who were leprous, and such as were troubled with the flue of their seed. And as touching women that haue sickenesse, he sequestred them K for the space of seuen daies, after which it was lawfull for them to conuerse indifferently the one with the other. The like decreed he of those that had assisted the buriall of a dead man, whom he permitted to conuerse with other after seuen daies were expired. It was a thing also decreed by law, that he that was surprised with vncleanesse and vnpurified beyond the number of those daies he should sacrifice two Wethers, one of which should be purified, and the other giuen to the Priests. The like sacrifice is made for him that hath had vnnaturall pollution, who first washeth himselfe in cold water. The like must they offer that haue vse of their lawfull wiues. He altogether droue the leprous out of the Citie, not permitting them to frequent any mans companie but esteeming them as men little differing from the dead. And if any one by his prayers made vnto God, was deliuered from this disease, and his skin reduced to his natiue colour, such a one L presented himselfe before God in diuers oblations and sacrifices, of which we will speake hereafter. For which cause they are worthy to be laughed at, who say that Moses fled out of Ægypt, because he was a leper, and that he conducted with him other such as were trauelled with that disease, and brought them into the land of Canaan. For, if that were true, Moses had not made these ordinances to his owne preiudice: which if other had proposed, it behooued him to haue opposed himselfe against them: especially since amongst other diuers nations there are lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are so farre from disdain and contempt, as that they haue beene made Generals of most notable armies, and elected for Gouernours of common-weales, hauing libertie to enter the Temples, and to be present at the sacrifices. What therefore hindred Moses (if he had beene polluted with the like hatefull sickenesse) to make such lawes, and ordaine M such statutes among those people, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby such as were therewith infected might be preferred? By which it is manifest, that those things that are obiected against him, are rather of malice then probability. But Moses being cleane from such sickenesse, and conuersing amongst his countrimen which were vntainted, made these ordinances for them that were sicke, hauing regard to the honour of God. But of these things, let each man censure as best liketh him.

He

A He forbad that women ſhould enter into the Temple after their deliuerance, or to aſſiſt the ſacrifice, vntill fortie daies were expired (if they had beene brought a bed of a ſonne) but if it were a daughter, he willed that the number of the daies ſhould be doubled; and that when they ſhould enter, they ſhould preſent their offerings vnto God, and to the Prieſts that offered them. And if any one ſuſpected that his wife had committed adulterie; he brought an Aſſar of grinded barley, and caſt a handfull thereof before God, and the reſt was reſerued for the maintenance of the Prieſts: and then the Prieſt placing the woman in the Porch which is right ouer againſt the Temple, and taking the couer from her head, writeth the name of God vpon a skinne, and maketh her ſweare that ſhe hath not played falſe with her husband; and wiſh if ſhe had tranſgreſſed the bounds of chaſtitie, that her right thigh might be put out of ioynt, her wombe might rot, and that death might follow thereupon: but if (through entire loue, and iealouſie proceeding
B therefro) her husband had beene inconſiderately drawn into that ſuſpicion, that ſhe might within ten moneths bring forth a male childe. And after ſuch an oath miniſtred vnto her, the Prieſt wipeth out the name of God that was written on the skinne, and wringeth it into a viall; and then taking of the earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and hauing mingled the ſame, giueth it the woman to drinke; and if ſhee had beene vniuſtly accuſed, ſhee continueth with childe, and beareth her fruit her full time: but if ſhe hath falſified her faith to her husband, and forſworne her ſelfe before God, then dieth ſhe a ſhamefull death; for her thigh is nummed, and her wombe growes full of water. See here how Moſes hath prouided for theſe ſacrifices at the purifying of a woman. He furthermore made theſe lawes which enſue. He generally forbad
C adulterie, iudging it to be a great good hap, if men demeaned themſelues honeſtly in marriage: and that both in politique eſtates, and priuate families, it was a thing moſt profitable, that children ſhould be borne in lawfull Matrimony.

It prohibiteth alſo the vſe of a woman when ſhe hath her monthly ſickneſſe; the vſe of beaſts alſo eſpecially the male, by reaſon that ſuch affections are abominable: and againſt the tranſgreſſours of theſe lawes he eſtabliſhed moſt ſtrict and mortall puniſhments. Hee willed alſo that the Prieſts ſhould be twiſe more chaſte then the reſt, for he not only forbad them that which he

For which cauſe they that beare the habit of the Prieſts are vnreproueable, and in all things pure and ſober, being forbidden to drinke wine as long as they ware the prieſtly veſture. They were willed alſo to offer vp entire ſacrifices, and no waies maimed. Theſe ſtatutes did Moſes decree, and make during his life time. He likewiſe decreed that this ſhould be done after the ſeuenth week of yeers, which containeth the ſpace of fiftie yeeres, which the Hebrews call Iubile, in which the debtors are acquited by their creditors, and the bond-men made free, who being of the people (and for that they had forfeited againſt ſome one law) had beene puniſhed, being handled after the maner of ſlaues, and not put to death; and to thoſe, who from the beginning had beene poſſeſſours of

And if the profits and expences are anſwerable the one vnto the other, the reſtitution is made to him that had the ancient inheritance. He ratified likewiſe the ſame law in houſes that were bought in Villages or Cities. For if he that ſold, counted downe the money he had receiued before the yeere were finiſhed; he compelled the purchaſer to reſtore him his houſe: and if hee ſtayed till the yeere were fully finiſhed, the poſſeſſion and free purchaſe remained vnto him that bought it. Moſes receiued this diſpoſition of his lawes from H

Sedition against Moses through the scarcitie of victuals, and the punishment of the Rebellious.

NOT long after this they remooued their campe from the mountaine of Sinai; and after certaine encampings (of which we will speake) they came to a place which is called Iseremoth, where the people once more began to ruminate and reuiue their seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage vpon Moses, obiecting that by his perswasion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not onely that they were destitute of the plentie thereof, but also in stead of hoped felicitie, forced to wander here and there in extreame miserie, and trauel-

Hereunto annexed they diuers contumelies, which were euery where inflicted against him, being a man of so great desert and consequence. Meane while there arose one amongst the people, who (admonishing them of the forepassed benefits receiued by the hands of Moses) counselled them to be of good courage; assuring them that at that time they should not be frustrate either of that hope, or helpe, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incensed against him by these words, and more and more whetted their spleanes against the Prophet; who seeing them so desperate, willed them to be of a good courage; promising them, that although by iniurious speeches he had vndeseruedly beene offenced by them, yet that he would giue them store of flesh,
C not for one day onely, but also for many. But they being incredulous (and some one amongst them demanding how he could make prouision for so many thousand men) God (saith he) and I, although we be euill spoken of by you, yet will we neuer desist to be carefull for you, and that shall you shortly perceiue. Scarce had he spoken this, but that all the campe was filled with Quailes, which they hunted for by heapes. Yet God not long after that, punished the insolency and slander of the Hebrewes, by the death of no small number; for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cause was imposed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba, as if you should say, the monuments of concupiscence.

Of the spies that were sent to search the land of Canaan; and how returning to the Israelites, they amated them with feare.

BVT after that Moses had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a country not so apt for habitation (not far from the borders of the Canaanites, which is called the Iawes) he called the people to a councell, & standing vp in the midst of them, he spake after this maner. God (saith he) hauing decreed to grant you two great benefits, namly the libertie and possession of a happie countrey, hath granted you already the possession of the one, & will shortly make you partakers of the other. For we are vpon the borders of Chanaan, from whence both the Cities and Kings are so farre from driuing vs, as the whole nation being vnited together, is E not of power to expell vs. Let vs therefore addresse our selues very confidently to attempt the matter: for neither without fight will they resigne the title of their countrey vnto vs; neither without great conflicts may we obtaine the Palme of victorie. Let vs therefore send out certaine spies to search into the secrets of the countrey, and such as may coniecture how great their power is: but aboue all things, let vs be at vnitie one with another, and let vs honour God, who assisteth vs in all dangers, and fighteth for vs. After that Moses had spoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counsels) chose twelue out of the most nobleste families of the tribes, to goe and search the countrey, out of euery tribe one; who beginning from the parts extending towards Ægypt, visited all the countrey of the Chanaanites, vntill they came to F the Citie of Amathe, and the mountaine of Libanus: and hauing searched out both the land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home againe, hauing consumed fortie daies in those affaires. Moreouer they brought with them such fruits as the countrey yeelded; and by the beauty thereof, and by the quantity of those riches (which they reported to be in that country) they incouraged the harts of the people to fight valiantly: but on the other side they dismaid them with the difficulty of the conquest, saying, that there were certain riuers impossible to be ouerpassed, both for their greatnes & depth: that there were therin also inaccessible mountains and Cities fortified both with wals & bulwarks: Moreouer they told them, that in Hebron they found a race of Gyants. And thus these spies (when as they had found all things farre greater amongst the Chanaanites, then to that day they had seene since their departure out of Egypt) they of set purpose by their feare, brought the rest of the multitude into a dangerous suspicion & perplexitie. Who coniecturing by their discourse that it was impossible to conquer the land, dissoluing the assembly, returning each one to their houses, lamenting with their wiues and children, saying that God had onely in words promised many things, but that in effect he gaue them no assistance: moreouer they blamed Moses, & reuiled both him & his brother Aaron the high Priest. And thus spent they all the night in disquiet, vrging their discontents, both against the one and the other: but on the morrow they reassembled their councell vnder this pretence, that stoning Moses, and his brother, they might returne back again to Egypt from whence they came. Which euent, when two of the spies greatly suspected (namely Iesus the sonne of Naue, of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb of the tribe of Iuda) they went into the middest of them, and appeased the multitude, praying them to be of good hope, and not to challenge Almightie God of deceit, by yeelding certaine slight beliefe to some, who by spreading vaine rumors of the affaires of Canaan had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather that they should follow them, who both would be the actors and conductors also of them in the conquest of the countrey: and that neither the greatnes of the mountaines, nor the depth of the riuers could hinder them, that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, especially God being their guide, and readie to fight for them in that battell. March forward therefore said they) and laying aside all feare (and being assured of the diuine succours) follow vs with a bold courage whither soeuer we lead you. With these words laboured they to appease the insulting multitude. In the meane while Moses and Aaron falling prostrate on their faces, besought God, not for their owne safetie; but that it would please him to restore the despairing multitude to a better minde, who were troubled with so many present and instant necessities. Whereupon sodainly a cloud appeared on the Tabernacle, and gaue testimony that God was there present: which when Moses perceiued (drawing his spirits vnto him) he pressed into the presence of the multitude, and told them how God was incited and whetted to take punishment of the outrage which they had committed against him; yet not so seuerely as the iniquitie of their sinnes deserued, but in that discipline which fathers are accustomed to vse for the instruction of their children. For at such time as he stood before God in the Tabernacle, and besought him with teares for the safetie of the multitude, God had recounted vnto him, how many benefits and fauours they had receiued from him, and how vngratefull they shewed themselues towards him: and that at the present being transported with the feare of the spies, they had esteemed their reports more true, then his promises. Notwithstanding all which, that he would not vtterly consume them all, nor exterminate their whole race (whom he had honoured aboue all the nations of the earth) but that he would not grant them the grace to conquer the land of Canaan, neither making them partakers therof, but would bring to passe that they should liue in the desart without house or Citie for the space of fortie yeeres, for punishment of their transgression. Yet hath he promised (said he) to giue the countrey to your successors, whom he will make Lords of their goods, and heires of those possessions which you haue enuied your selues.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18 al. 14.

The Israelites should wander in the desart fortie yeeres.

After that Moses had discourſed theſe things after this manner, according to the ordinance of God, the people were in great sorrow and calamitie, and besought Moses that he would appease Gods wrath conceiued against them; beseeching him that forgetting their faults that were past in the desart, he would make them Lords of their enemies Cities. Moses answered them, that God was not incited against them, according to the manner of humane weakenesse, but that he had giuen a iust sentence against them. In this place it is not to be supposed, that Moses (who was but a man onely) did appease so many multitudes of displeased men, but that God assisted him, and brought to passe that the people were conquered with his words (hauing with diuers disobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were falne, knowne that obedience was both good and commendable. Furthermore, for that Moses was admirable for his vertue, and the force proceeding from his faith: of whom not onely they haue spoken, who liued in his time, but euen at this day there is not any one amongst the Hebrewes, who (as if Moses were now here present to chastice him, if he ran astray) would not obey the ordinances made by him, although he might make breach of them in secret.

So much did the opinion once conceiued of this man preuaile, that hee is eſteemed more then a man, who is ſuppoſed to haue receiued lawes from God, and to haue deliuered them to men. Of late alſo (not long before the warres of the Iewes, during the Empire of Claudius, and Iſmael beeing high Prieſt amongſt vs) when as ſo great a famine oppreſſed our nation, B that an Aſſar was ſold for foure drams, and there was brought to the feaſts of Azymes the quantity of ſeauenty Cores (which make thirty Sicilian, and forty Athenian Medimni, which are two buſhels of ours almoſt) ſome of the Prieſts were not ſo bold as to eate one graine of Barley (notwithſtanding the countrey was in that extreamity) fearing the law, and Gods diſpleaſure extended alwaies againſt ſinnes concealed. For which cauſe we ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, conſidering that the writings left by Moſes are in ſuch force, euen at this day, that they themſelues who hate vs, confeſſe that hee that hath inſtituted our gouernment is God, by the meanes and miniſterie of Moſes and his vertue. CHAP. I.

The fight of the Hebrewes with the Chanaanites, and their ouerthrow by them without MOSES knowledge.

The yeere of the world, 2450. before Christs Natiuitie, 1509.

WHILEST thus the Hebrewes passed their life in great penurie and perplexitie in the desart, groning vnder the burthen of their grieuous afflictions; there was nothing that more distracted and distempered them than this, that God had forbidden them to hazzard or enter battell against the Chanaanites: neither would they now any longer giue eare vnto Moses (who perswaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themselues, that both without his conduct and counsails, they might easily obtaine victory ouer their enemies: and accused him likewise, as if hee sought after no other thing, but that they beeing daily pressed with great wants, should bee inforced continually to depend vpon his counsels. Whereupon they embattailed themselues against the Chanaanites, presuming with themselues, that God would succour them, not onely in regard of Moses; but also for that hee had a generall care of their nation, euer since the time of their forefathers, whom hee had alwaies held vnder his protection; and by reason of whose vertues hee had already granted them liberty. They said likewise, that if they would take the paines at that time and endeauour themselues, that God would alwaies fight with them: protesting that they were able to ouer-runne the nations, although they were but themselues; yea although Moses would endeauour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was behoouefull, that all of them should bee Lords of themselues, and that beeing recomforted and redeemed from the seruitude of Ægypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize ouer them, or to conforme their liues to his will; vnder this vaine beliefe, that God had onely discouered to Moses that which was behoouefull for them, by reason of the affection which hee bare him: As if all of them were not deriued from the loynes of Abraham, and that he onely were the motiue of all, in fore-knowing the things that should happen vnto them, by particular instruction from God? That euen then they should seeme to be wise, if (condemning his pride, and fixing their trust vpon God) they would take possession of the countrey which hee had promised them, in spight of Moses contradiction; who for this cause hindred them, setting the name of God before them: that therefore putting before their eyes their necessitie and the desart, which daily more and more aggrauated their miserie, they should endeauour themselues courageously to sally out against the enemy the Chanaanites; alleadging that God would bee their guide; so as they had no reason to expect the assistance of their law-maker. At last when this sentence was approoued by a generall allowance, they flocke out in multitudes against their enemies; who neither affrighted by their fierce assault, neither terrified with their infinite multitude, valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrewes beeing slaine) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turne their backes) euen vnto their campe. This ouerthrow (hapning beside all mens opinion) wondrously deiected the mindes of the multitude, that they grew desperate of all future good fortune, concluding that God had sent and inflicted that plague vpon them, because without his counsell and fauour they had enterprised the battell. But when Moses perceiued that both his owne countrey-men were dismaide with the ouerthrow which they had, and the enemy was waxen proude with their late victory, fearing likewise least (not content with their present successe) they should attempt further; hee determined to retire his forces backe againe into the desart. And whereas the people promised thereafter to bee obedient to him (beeing taught by their owne miserie, that nothing would fall out prosperously vnto them without the counsell and conduct of their guide) they disincamping themselues, retired into the desart vnder this resolution, that they would no more attempt the battell against the Chanaanites, before they receiued a signe of their good successe from heauen. But euen as in a great armie it accustomably falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude waxe headstrong and disobedient to their gouernours, so did the like also happen amongst the Iewes: for whereas they were in number sixe hundreth thousand, and euen in their better fortunes seemed disobedient to their gouernours, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants and misfortunes, both amongst themselues, and against their gouernour. For which cause there arose so great a sedition, as neither amongst the Greekes or Barbarians the like was neuer heard of: which things without doubt had ouerthrowne them (being brought into so desperate an estate) except Moses (forgetting the iniurie hee had receiued

Neither did God vtterly abandon the care of them : but although they were contumelious againſt their law-maker, and tranſgreſſed alſo againſt the lawes which hee had deliuered them by Moſes ; yet deliuered he them out of that dangerous ſedition, of which (without his eſpeciall prouidence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable iſſue. This ſedition, as alſo how Moſes gouerned the eſtate when the troubles were ended, wee will now declare, hauing firſt expreſſed the cauſe thereof. The yeare of the world, 2455. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 1509.

CHAP. II.

B The ſedition raiſed by CHORE againſt MOSES and his brother concerning the Prieſthood.

CHORES (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongſt the Hebrewes, and endowed with a certaine kinde of popular eloquence) ſeeing Moſes placed in the higheſt eſtate of dignitie, was ſore troubled and oppreſſed with enuie. For, although he were of the ſame Tribe and kindred ; yet thought he it to be a great indignity in himſelfe to be helde his inferiour, beeing both more inabled in riches, and nothing inferiour in parentage : For which cauſe hee began to mutine and murmure amongſt the Leuites (which were of the ſame Tribe with him, and his kinſmen) telling them (in vehement diſcourſe) that it was not to bee ſuffered nor permitted, that Moſes, vnder a pretext of certaine diuinitie, ſhould by ambitious policie (to other mens preiudice) onely ſtudy his owne glory : ſhewing them how of late without all lawe and right hee had giuen the Prieſthood to his brother Aaron, and diſtributed other dignities at his owne pleaſure like a King, without the allowance and approbation of the people : That this iniury done by him was not to be endured, by reaſon that ſo couertly hee had inſinuated himſelfe into the gouernement, that before hee might be eſpied, the people ſhould bee brought vnder ſeruitude. For hee that knoweth himſelfe to bee worthy of a gouernement, ſtriueth to obtaine the ſame by kind perſwaſions and conſent of the people, and not by force and violence: but they that deſpaire by good meanes to attaine thereunto, doe notwithſtanding abſtaine from force, leaſt they ſhould loſe the opinion of their goodneſſe and honeſty ; yet endeauour they by malicious ſubtilties to attaine thereunto. That it concerned the common-weale to extinguiſh and roote out the ſubtill inſinuations of ſuch men, leaſt of priuate, they ſhould at laſt grow publike enemies. For what reaſon (ſaid he) can Moſes yeeld, why hee hath beſtowed the Prieſthood on Aaron and his ſonnes? For if that God had decreed that this honour ſhould be beſtowed on one of the tribe of Leui, there were more reaſon that I ſhould haue it, who am of the ſame kindred with Moſes, & who ſurpaſſe him both in riches & age: And if this honor appertained to the moſt ancient of the Tribes, that thoſe of Rubens loynes ought by right to enioy it, namely Dathan, and Abiram and Phalal, who are the moſt ancient of that Tribe, and the moſt powerfull in riches. Theſe things ſpake Chores (vnder colour and pretence of the weale of the common-weale, but in effect onely to raiſe a tumult amongſt the multitude, and intrude into the office of the high Prieſt. This Diſcourſe of his paſſing by little and little from one eare to another amongſt the multitude, and multiplied by the enuious, and ſuch as maligned Aaron, at laſt brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: ſo that two hundred and fiftie of the chiefeſt Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conſpiracie, and all of theſe inforced themſelues to take away the Prieſthood from Moſes brother, and to transferre it to him. The people likewiſe were in ſuch ſort incenſed, as that they ſought to ſtone Moſes; and ran all of them by confuſed heapes with noiſe and vprore, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the tyrant was to be cut off and the people deliuered from thraldome, who vnder pretext of religion, had inſupportable thraldome impoſed on them : For if it were God that had choſen him to be high Prieſt, he would haue preferred ſuch a one to the dignitie who had been worthy, and would not haue departed it to thoſe who were far inferior to others; that if he had decreed to beſtow it on Aaron, he had remitted the commiſſion of his election to the people, and not left the diſpoſition thereof to his brother. Moſes, who long before that time had perceiued Chores treacherous ſlander, and ſaw the people very ſore incenſed ; was notwithſtanding nothing at all abaſhed thereat : but being reſolued in his conſcience that he had gouerned the eſtate vprightly, and well aſſured that his brother obtained the Prieſthood, not by his fauor but Gods election, he came into the congregatiõ, where he vttered no one word againſt the people : but addreſſing himſelfe to Chore, he expoſtulated with him, and accuſed him in as much much as was for him possible; being (besides his other qualities) fashioned & composed by nature eloquently to speake in publique assemblies. I thinke (saith he) Chore, that both thou and euery one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundred & fifty men of his faction) are worthy of honour: yea I contemne not the rest of this assembly (although they are not to be compared with you in riches, and other indowments. For neither doth Aaron therefore possesse the Priesthood becausse hee is richer (for thou hast more ample possessions then either of vs) neither becausse he is more noble (for God hath equally imparted the same vnto vs all, hauing giuen vs one & the same Grandfather) neither haue I bin mooued thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due vnto others. For had I not respected God and right in disposing of this dignity; I had not forgotten my selfe, to further and preferre another, since there is no man more neere my selfe then my selfe, or whom I had rather wish well to, then to my selfe: for what wisedome had it been for me, to expose my selfe to those dangers which they incurre, who make breach of lawes, to suffer another man reap the fruits of my impiety? But God forbid that my conscience should be stained with any such sin: neither, were the fault mine also, would God leaue it vnpunished; neither in me, who should contemne him, neither in you, for that you were ignorant of that you ought ro doe, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He himselfe it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this meanes hath accquitted me of that accusation, that in this respect might be obiected against me. For although Aaron hath obtained this degree (not by my fauour, but by Gods owne appointment) yet notwithstanding hee referreth and remitteth the matter to the publike disposition and order of you all, neither requireth he any prerogatiue (for that he hath already exercised the charge, or for that at this present it is granted him to entermeddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the greatest good fortune that may befal him, to see your mutinies and seditions cease; although with the losse of that honour, which he hath receiued from your owne election: for neither haue wee iniured Gods will, in this that we also wish your assent and allowance; but that which of his owne accord hee hath giuen, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe conscience: as reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable, that they which receiue it should alwaies enioy it, since God himselfe had giuen them both the assurance and confirmation. God therefore shall once againe determine who amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice vnto him, and to take charge of those things which appertaine to piety. For it is a most absurd matter that Chore should haue power to desire a dignitie, and that God should bee depriued of that authority to dispose the same as best liked him.

Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selues, and to bee troubled vpon these occasions: and let euery one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his censer with perfumes, and fire from his house. But thou O Chore, giue place vnto God, and expect his election, neither arrogate to thy selfe a greater authoritie then God hath, but come thou also amongst the rest thy competitors in this honour, to heare his iudgement. Neither see I cause why Aaron should not bee there also present to bee iudged with thee, in that hitherto hee hath vertuously and vprightly behaued himselfe in the execution of that office, and is likewise of the same tribe and race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer incense in the presence of all the people, and when the perfume shall bee past, let him whose sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high Priest: so shal I be acquit of that slander which is wrongfully vrged against mee, whereby I am charged to haue (vpon my particular grace and fauour) bestowed the office of the Priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gaue ouer murmuring, and forbare to suspect Moses, allowing in themselues all that which had beene spoken, as being profitable for the Common-weale: so that hereupon they dismissed the assembly.

CHAP. III.

How the authors of the sedition were slaine by Gods iudgement, and the Priesthood confirmed to AARON and his sonnes.

Ruffin. cap. 1. Num. 16.

THE next day the people reassembled themselues together to assist the sacrifice, and to heare the strife decided amongst the Competitors; neither was this assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in suspence in expectation of the euent, and some of them were desirous that Moses might be conuicted of deceit. But such as were of the wiser sort amongst them, desired an end of the sedition: for they feared least the common weale should be vtterly ruinated, if the tumult should proceede any further. The multitude likewise (being naturally

A rally desirous of noueltie, and prone to speake euill of their Magistrates) were diuersly disposed vpon euery occurrent. Moses also sent his seruants to Abiram and Dathan, to summon them to appeare (according to the couenants and accord) to attend the issue of the sacrifice. But their answer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moses by his subtill and siniſter deuices, should signiorize ouer the people. Which when Moses vnderstood, he tooke diuers of the Elders amongst the people with him: and being no waies mooued with Dathan and his contumacie, he came vnto him (being willingly attended by those who were drawne to accompanie him.) Now when Dathan and his friends vnderstood that Moses with the Nobles came vnto them, both they, their wiues and children assembled themselues before the Tabernacle, expecting that which would ensue. They came likewise guarded B with their seruants, who were armed to oppose themselues against Moses, if so be he should offer them any violence: But no sooner drew he neere vnto them, but that lifting vp his hands vnto heauen, he cried out with a loud voice in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this maner. O God (said he) thou Lord ouer all that which either heauen, earth, or sea containeth, thou art a sufficient witnesse with me of all mine actions: for that I haue managed all things by « thy will; and thou art he who hast giuen me power to execute my purposes: thou that alwaies in « commiseration of the Hebrewes hast beene my perpetuall helpe and assistance, heare this my « prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee: for which cause I hope « thou wilt not disdaine to testifie and iustifie my truth, and manifest the ingratitude of these men. « Thou doest exactly know the antiquitie of my race, not for that thou hast heard it, but for that « C thou hast seene and assisted it; in effect, now also testifie the truth for me in those things which « these men (although they know the contrarie) are not ashamed to impute vnto me. At such time « as I led a peaceable life, and that by my vertue and thy counsell, and my father in law Raguels « fauour, I had sufficient to liue vpon; I forsooke the possession of my goods, and the fruition of « my peace, to ingage my selfe in these miseries, which I haue suffered for these men: and first of « all for their libertie, and now likewise for their safetie, I haue most readily vndertaken grieuous « trauels. Now therefore since I am growne into suspicion among those men, who by my care « and prouidence haue escaped so many mischiefes and miseries; thou that appearedst vnto me in « that fire on the mountaine of Sinai, and vouchsafedst both to speake vnto me, and to confirme « me by the sight of miracles; that in my name sentst me a messenger into Ægypt; that hast aba- « D ted the great fortunes of the Ægyptians, and hast giuen me meanes to escape from their serui- « tude; and hast made Pharaoes power and armie inferiour to my fortunes; that when we were ig- « norant of our way gauest vs a passage through the sea, in whose bottome and wombe afterward « the Ægyptians were drowned; that gauest vs armes, when we were vnweaponed; that madest the « bitter water sauoury and fit to be drunke of; and in our scarcitie of water enforcedst drinke for « vs out of the bowels of the hard rocke; when we found no meat on the land, didst send it vs from « the sea; Moreouer (as a thing neuer before heard of) affoordedst vs meat from heauen, and hast « established our estate with lawes and customes: Be thou, O Lord, my Iudge in all things, and my « vnpartiall witnesse, that neither I haue beene corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, « to fauour iniustice, neither that I haue suffered a poore man in his iust cause to lose his right « E against a rich aduersarie. And now hauing administred the common weale with all sinceritie, I « am called in question for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltlesse, as if I had bestowed thy « Priesthood on my brother for priuate affection, and not for thy command sake: make it knowne « that all things are dispensed by thy prouidence, and that nothing is brought to effect by casualtie, « but by thy especiall ordinance: And to expresse that thou hast care of the Hebrewes, testifie the « same by thy iust punishment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuse thee to be insensible, « and boast that thou art circumuented by my subtilties. But thou shalt make thy reuenge more « notorious against the vnbridled detractours of thy glorie, if they perish after no common man- « ner, least any man should suspect that they suffer nothing inhumane: but let the earth which « they vnworthily tread vpon, open it selfe and swallow them vp both with their families and fa- « F culties. By this meanes both thy power will manifestly appeare vnto all men, and thou shalt leaue « an example to posteritie, that no man hereafter shall dare to thinke otherwise of thy maiesty then « becommeth him, and my ministery shall be approued to proceed from thy direction. But if those « crimes be truely vrged which are inforced against me, then let the curses returne and light on « mine owne head, and let those whom I haue cursed liue in safetie. And thus exacting a pu- « nishment from those that disturbe thy people, keepe the rest of the multitude in peace, concord, « and obseruation of thy commandements, secure and voide of that punishment which is due vnto « wicked wicked men, for that it is contrarie to thy iuſtice, that the innocent multitude of the Iſraelites ſhould anſwer their miſdeeds, and ſuffer their puniſhments. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, and intermixed them with teares, the earth inſtantly trembled, and ſhaking began to remoue (after ſuch a manner, as when by the violence of the wind a great billow of the ſea floateth and waltereth.) Hereat were al the people amazed. But after that, a horrible and ſhattering noiſe was made about their tents, the earth opened, and ſwallowed vp both them and all that which they eſteemed deere, which was after a maner ſo exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld. Wherupon in a moment the earth cloſed againe, and the vaſt gaping was faſt ſhut, ſo as there appeared not any ſigne of that which had hapned. Thus periſhed they all, leauing behind them an example of Gods power and iudgements. And this accident was the more miſerable, in that there were no one, no not of their kinsfolke or allies that had compaſſion of them: ſo that all the people whatſoeuer, forgetting thoſe things which were paſt, did allow Gods iuſtice with ioyfull acclamations, eſteeming them vnworthie to be bemoned, but to be held as the plague and peruerters of the people. After that Dathan with his family was extinguiſhed, Moſes aſſembled all thoſe that contended for the Prieſthood together, committing againe the election of the prieſthood vnto God, concluding that the eſtate ſhould bee ratified to him; whoſe ſacrifice was moſt acceptable in Gods ſight. For which cauſe the two hundred and fiftie men aſſembled themſelues, who were both honoured for the vertue of their anceſtors, and for their owne abilities farre greater then theirs: with theſe alſo ſtood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their cenſers before the Tabernacle, with perfumes ſuch as they brought with them; when ſodainly ſo great a fire ſhone, as neither the like was euer kindled by mans hand, nor vſually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was euer quickned in the woods, ſplit and borne downe in the ſommer time by a ſoutherne brize, but ſuch a one as ſeemed to be kindled in heauen moſt brightſome and flaming: by force and power whereof thoſe two hundreth and fiftie (together with Chore) were ſo conſumed, that there ſcarce appeared any reliques of their carcaſſes; Only Aaron remained vntouched, to the end it might appeare that this fire came from heauen. Theſe things thus brought to paſſe, Moſes (intending to leaue a perpetuall memory to poſteritie of that puniſhment) to the end they ſhould not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the ſonne of Aaron to conſecrate their cenſers affixed to the braſen Altar, that by reaſon of this monument, all men might be terrified, who thinke that the diuine power can be circumuented by humane policy.

CHAP. IIII.

What things hapned in 38. yeares ſpace to the Hebrewes in the deſart.

AFTER that by ſo euident an argument it appeared vety ſufficiently, that Aaron neither by ſiniſter inſinuations, neither by the fauour of his brother, but onely by Gods election had obtained the Prieſthood; he euer afterwards held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the ſedition was not ſufficiently ceaſed, but that it brake out with a more vrgent furie then at firſt: for it tooke his originall from ſuch cauſes that it might eaſily appeare that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perſwaſion had once taken roote in the hearts of men, that nothing is brought to paſſe without Gods will, they imagined that God wrought theſe things in fauor of Moſes; to him therfore imputed they al theſe things, as if God had not puniſhed thoſe men thorow the hate he bare againſt their ſins, but only on Moſes ſolicitation: & they were ſore aggrieued that Moſes (hauing giuen this mayme vnto the people, by the loſſe of ſo many noble men, that onely periſhed through the zeale they bare to Gods ſeruice) not onely had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had aſſured the Prieſthood to his brother after ſuch a manner, that thereafter no man durſt oppoſe himſelfe to purchaſe the ſame; ſeeing how vnfortunately thoſe others were ouerthrowne by a violent death. Moreouer the kinſmen of thoſe that were ſlaine, ſolicited and ſtirred the people, praying them to reſtraine the pride and ouergreat power of Moſes, in that it lay in their power eaſily to performe the ſame. But Moſes perceiuing that the people was incenſed, and fearing leaſt once more they ſhould bethinke them on ſome innouation, wherby ſome great misfortune might ſucceed, he aſſembled them together, and gaue audience to their accuſations: & without replying any waies (for feare he might the more incenſe them) hee onely commanded the heads of the tribes, that each of them ſhould bring a rod, wherein the name of each tribe ſhould bee written, promiſing that the Prieſthood ſhould remaine with them, in whoſe rod God ſhould ſhew any ſigne. Which iudgement of his being allowed

Another ſedition againſt Moſes.

A lowed by all men,both they,and Aaron brought their rods with their inſcriptions;and Aaron had written in his,the tribe of Leui. Theſe Moſes tooke from them,and laide them in Gods Tabernacle:the next day he brought them forth euery one of them (which were eaſily knowne to bee thoſe which the Princes brought,& the reſt of the people had marked)and they ſaw that al theirs remained in the ſame forme which the day before they retained, when Moſes tooke them; but out of Aarons rod there grew branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kinde of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amated at the noueltie of this ſpectacle (diſmiſſing their hatreds wherewith they both proſecuted Moſes & Aaron)became wholly amazed and drawne into admiration of Gods iudgement,and forbare any more to repugne againſt God, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt Aarons B Prieſthood. And thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all mens conſent he became hie Prieſt; and the people of the Hebrewes turmoyled with long ſeditions,at laſt by this meanes grew ſetled in peace and quietnes.But after that Moſes had made the tribe of Leui(which was dedicate to Gods ſeruice) free and exempt from warfare (for feare leaſt beeing occupied in prouiding themſelues neceſſaries for their maintenance, they ſhould grow negligent in executing their duties in ſacrifice)he ordained that after the land of Chanaan was conquered by their forces and Gods fauour, that of the Cities they ſhould conquer, they ſhould diſtribute fortie eight of the beſt & faireſt on the Leuites,& certen lands abutting on their Cities, to the quantity and ſpace of two thouſand cubits. Moreouer, hee commanded that the tenths of all the yearely fruit that was gathered by the whole people, ſhould bee giuen and beſtowed on the Leuites C and Prieſts;and euer after this tribe had their ſolemne reuenues.Now muſt Ideclare what things are proper to the Prieſts. Of the fortie eight Cities which were granted to the Leuites,he commanded them to grant thirteene to the Prieſts; and that of thoſe tenthes which they receiued of the people, they ſhould pay vnto them a tenth ſhare. Beſides,he gaue charge that the people ſhould offer vp vnto God all the firſt fruits of whatſoeuer the earth yeeldeth them: and that the firſt borne of foure footed beaſts dedicated for ſacrifice, if it were a male,ſhould bee deliuered to the Prieſts to ſacrifice,to the end they might be nouriſhed with all their family in the ſacred Citie of Ieruſalem; and that they which are not fit to bee ſacrificed to God, ſhould bee eaten by them according to the vſe and cuſtome of the countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firſtling a ſicle and a halfe,and for the firſt borne of a man, fiue ſicles. Hee allotted them likewiſe the firſt D fruits of ſheep-ſhearing,and ordered that the bakers ſhould offer them ſome cakes. But they that conſecrate themſelues by vow, and are called Nazarites (nouriſhing their haire, and taſting no wine) when as they conſecrate their haire;were bound to offer it vnto the Prieſts. They likewiſe who call themſelues Corban, which is called the gift of God, if they deſire to be diſmiſſed from that miniſterie(whereunto by voluntarie vow they bound themſelues) muſt pay money to the Prieſts, for a woman thirtie ſicles, for a man fiftie; and that thoſe that had not ſo much money ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the Prieſts. And if any man ſhould kill (for his priuate feaſt) any beaſt,and not for Gods ſeruice,yet that he ought to offer vnto the Prieſt the breaſt and legge of the beaſt. This is that allowance which Moſes ratified to the Prieſts, and beſides this, whatſoeuer the people offered for ſinnes (as we declared in the next precedent volume.) And what- E ſoeuer was contributed by the people to the order of the Prieſts, hee commaunded that both their wiues, children and ſeruants ſhould bee made partakers of the ſame (onely except thoſe things which were offered for ſinne offerings, for theſe things the Prieſts onely themſelues eate vp in the Temple the ſame day.)After thatthis policy was in this ſort ratified by Moſes,& thatthe mutinie was appeaſed,he remooued his campe, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumæa,where he ſent Embaſſadours to the King therof, requiring him to grant him and his free paſſage(and offering him ſuch and ſo ſufficient pledges, as hee ſhould eſteeme and recken of, to aſſure him that no violence or iniurie ſhould bee offered; aſſuring him to make payment for whatſoeuer victuall or drinke,eyther he or his army ſhould receiue.) But he ſetting light by their Embaſſage,denied them paſſage, and with a well furniſhed army marched foorth againſt Moſes F to withſtand him, if contrary to his will hee ſhould attempt to paſſe thorow his countrey. And for that God had not counſelled Moſes to begin the combate,if hee were inforced by the enemie,hee retired backe againe, determining to ſeeke his paſſage athwart the deſart. A man that is cleansed putteth it in a cleane place, and they that are vncleane by meanes of one that is dead, put a little of these ashes into a fountaine with Hysope, and after they haue mixed the ashes in the fountaine, they besprinkle themselues three times, and on the seuenth day, and after that they are purified. He likewise ordained that the like purification should be vsed, when a man should take possession of his inheritance.

Num. 20.

But after the army (that had so long mourned the dead sister of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the desart into Arabia; and arriuing in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitane citie, in times past called Arce, and at this present Petra) which is H inuironed with a high mountaine; Aaron ascended the said mountaine, and Moses shewed him the place, where he should yeeld vp his soule vnto God; and in the sight of all the army standing on a high place, he put off his stoale, and gaue it to his sonne Eleazar, to whom by eldership the succession appertained: and thus (in the sight of the people) he died in that very yeere wherein he lost his sister; and in the hundreth, twentie and third yeere of his age: he departed on the new Moone, in the moneth of August (called by the Athenians Hecatombeon, by the Macedonians Ious, and Sabba by the Hebrewes. The people mourned for him for the space of fortie daies, and then desisted. Moses displaced his campe from thence, and pitched his tents neere vnto a riuer called Arnon (which springeth from the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth along the de- I sart, and then entreth into the Asphaltique lake, separating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The countrey is fertill and sufficient to yeeld fruit to all the inhabitants in great foison: to Sehon King of this countrey Moses sent Embassadors, requiring passage thorow his kingdome, vnder such assurance as should best please him, that no wrong should be offered, neither to his countrey, nor the inhabitants thereof, assuring him to pay the price of what soeuer his soldiers tooke either in victuals or water. But Sehon refused him, and arming his people, pitched his tents on the banks of Arnon, being readie to repulse the Hebrewes if they presumed to passe the riuer.

Num 21. The Hebrews addresse themselues to fight against the Amorites.

BVT when Moses perceiued that the Amorites were disposed to hostilitie; for which cause supposing that the iniurie and contempt was not to be endured, and seeing the Hebrewes were an intractable kind of men (and such as either by idlenesse or want, might be easily perswaded to renue their former seditions and tumults, and being willing to preuent all these occasions) he asked counsell at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his passage by the sword. Now when God had allowed his purpose, and besides that promised him the vi- L ctory, he was greatly confirmed in hope, and animated and encouraged his soldiers, telling them that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprise their long desired warre with Gods fauour, and his approbation and encouragement: who reioycing at this libertie that was granted them, sodainly tooke armes, and in a set battell hasted to charge the enemie. On the other side the Amorite (as soone as he saw them march forward, and begin the onset) forgetting his former fiercenes was both himselfe terrified, and his souldiers likewise (who before the sight of their enemies were as cruell and bloody as Lions) now waxed as fearefull & as meeke as Lambs. So that they scarcely had endured the first assault, but that they fled, reposing the whole hope of their prosperity in their retreat: they trusted likewise to their walled townes (which notwithstanding did nought at all auaile them.) For no sooner did the Hebrews perceiue that their enemies M began to trust their feete and that their rankes were broken, but they more freshly pursued them and brought them into extreme feare: so that being vtterly put to flight and dispersed vpon the field, they were inforced to flie vnto their Cities. Yet ceased not the Hebrewes to pursue them more fiercely, but began more and more to molest them with those kinde of weapons wherein they were exercised before time: for being expert and well trained in the sling and bow, and perfect in casting the dart, and nimble in bodie (by reason of their light armours) they ran after their enemies,

The Hebrews ouerthrow the Amorits, and put them to flight.

A enemies,and with their ſhafts and bowes ſhot at thoſe which were afarre off, and might not bee ouertaken. So that there followed a moſt huge ſlaughter, and they that eſcaped were grieuouſly wounded: yet were they more afflicted with thirſt then any other hoſtilitie (in that it was ſommer time)ſo that all thoſe that went to refreſh and coole their thirſt at the riuer(beſides all thoſe that had turned their backs to flie) were purſued with all kindes of miſſile weapons and darts vntill they were all ſlaine. The king Sehon himſelfe alſo was ſlaine in this fight. And the Hebrewes ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlaine,& carried away great ſtore of pillage.They had likewiſe great foyſon and abundance of all kindes of fruites(in that the harueſt was not as yet gathered.) Thus paſſed the Armie through the whole countrey, forraging and ſpoyling the ſame without any reſiſtance; by reaſon that the enemie wes diſcomfited,& that all his forces in warre were defeated. This was the deſtruction which hapned to the Amorites,who neither vſed their counſell
B prudently,nor managed their warre valiantly. But the Hebrewes occupied their countrey (ſituate betweene three riuers,after the manner of an Iſland.) For the banks of Arnon doe terminate the Southerne coaſts therof,and Iobacchus the Northerne,which flowing into Iordan, leeſeth his name:now the Weſterne coaſt is watered by the riuer of Iordan. Amidſt this proſperous eſtate of the Iſraelites,there aroſe a new enemie againſt them,called Og,king of Galadine,& of the coũtries of Gaulanitis,who came as a friend and companion to aſſiſt Sehon; who ſeeing his fortunes and eſtate ſo deſolate and deſperate, yet in hope to obtaine the victorie, determined to make triall both of his owne mens vertue,and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for hee both died in the battaile, and his whole hoſt was likewiſe diſcomfited. But Moſes no ſooner
C ouerpaſſed the flood of Iobacchus, but that entring Ogs kingdome, hee ouerthrew one citie after another,and deſtroyed all the inhabitants thereof(who for riches and fruitfull paſtures exceeded all other men of that countrey.) Og alſo was a man of a moſt heroicke and high ſtature, and nothing inferiour thereunto either in ſtrength or vertue; the argument of whoſe ſtrength and ſtature was extant in the ſacke of the chiefe citie & palace of the country of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron bed found of foure cubits breadth,and nine in length.The fal of this man did not only further the preſent felicity of the Hebrews,but alſo became the cauſe of many their future and more fortunate ſucceſſes:for they took ſixtie well fortified cities which were vnder his gouernment;and what with their priuie preyes and publike pillage, they were all enriched. After this Moſes remooued his campe toward Iordan,and pitched it in a broade plaine
D neere vnto the Citie of Iericho(which is rich and fruitfull, and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the minds of the Iſraelites in ſuch ſort confirmed,as they deſired nothing more then warre,and battell; and Moſes thinking good to make vſe of this their forwardneſſe, (hauing ſacrificed to God in way of thankſgiuing; and feaſted the people) he ſent part of them armed to deſtroy the countrey of the Madianites,and to ſpoile the cities of that region: the cauſe of which warre had this originall.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

E VVHen Balac king of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites)ſaw the Iſraelites increaſe to ſuch greatnes,he began to ſuſpect the ſecuritie of his owne fortune and eſtate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrewes to couet to poſſeſſe any other Countrey but the land of Canaan, and therefore more raſhly then prudently he bethought him of new matters; and for that he durſt not aſſaile them in battell, whom he knew to be puffed vp with the ſucceſſe of many victories (yet deſirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he ſendeth Embaſſadours to the Madianites to conſult with them,as concerning their common profit.They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous Diuine called Balaam(who was their eſpeciall friend) ſent ſome of their moſt ho-
F nourable princes together with Balacks Embaſſadours,beſeeching him that he would come vnto them and curſe the Iſraelites.The Prophet intertaining the Embaſſadours with great humanitie, and feaſting them at his owne table, asked counſaile of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands:but ſeeing that God forbad him to obey them, hee returned vnto them,and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withſtood him; to whoſe mercie he aſcribed the glory which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies:for that armie which they deſired ſhould be curſed,was dearely beloued of God. For which cauſe he gaue them counſell,that ſeeking out the Iſraelites, they ſhould make peace with them them vnder whatsoeuer conditions: which said, he dismissed the Embassadours. But the Madianites (beeing instantly requested by Balac) once more sent their Embassadours vnto Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to satisfie them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadours: & he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadours. But as he trauelled vpon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certaine narrow way, betweene two mounds or wals made of stones; which when the Asse perceiued whereon Balaam was mounted, hee started out of the way, and thrust Balaam, and crushed him against one of the wals; and neither by the strokes which his rider gaue him (beeing sore grieued by his bruise) not by any other meanes might he be drawn forward. And when as neither the Angell forsooke the way, neither the Prophet gaue ouer tormenting the Asse, at length the beast falling downe by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice; blaming him, for that hauing neuer before that time receiued domage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten him; considering that he vnderstood not that God did prohibite him from the performance of that which hee desired. Whilest thus hee was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Asse, an Angell appeared vnto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Asse was not in the fault, but that hee hindered his iourney, by reason hee attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the Prophet terrified, addressed himselfe to returne backe againe: but God commanded him to prosecute that iourney which he had intended, charging him to declare and doe that which hee should aduise and instruct him in.

Balaam commeth to Balac

After that God had giuen him this charge, hee went vnto Balaac, who entertained him honourably, and caused him to be brought to a certaine mountaine, from whence he might behold the Hebrewes campe. Balac also himselfe being royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him honourably vnto a certaine mountaine, which ouerhung the Israelites, beeing threescore furlongs from their campe. Which when he perceiued, he caused the king to build seauen Altars, on which he laid seauen Buls, and seauen Rams. All which being readily executed by the king; he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end hee might presage and fore-prophecie the victorie: which done, he spake after this manner. Happy are you, on whom God bestoweth so large a blessing and abundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his prouidence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. Because there is not any sort of men, before whom in innocencie of maners and studie of honestie and vertue, you are not to be preferred: your successours also shall haue a more famous posteritie, because amongst men God onely fauoureth you, and taketh care that no nation vnder the Sunne shall either exceede or equall you in happinesse. You shall likewise possesse that land whereto he hath sent you: and your posteritie shall bee perpetuall Lords thereof; and the glory of your name shall fulfill both the whole earth, and sea; and so shall your nation bee multiplied, that there shall bee no nation of the world that shall not bee intermixed with your blood and line. Blessed are you (most worthy army) and deseruing great admiration, hauing your increase thus multiplied by the meanes of one parent. For the land of Canaan at this present shall entertaine you, but in little number; but know that hereafter the whole world is destinated for your inhabitation: so that both in the Islands, and in the continent you shall liue in so great number, that you shall equall the starres of the firmament. And whereas you are like to growe so innumerable, yet notwithstanding he shall not suffer you to want the vtmost of plentie and abundance; neither in warre shall hee cease to animate and leade you against your enemies. Let your enemies resolue to take armes and to assault you, yet shall there no one returne from them to beare message of the victorie, or to bring glad tidings to their wiues and children. This prudence and prowesse is giuen you by Gods prouidence, who onely can and may abase the power of greatnesse, and repaire the weakenesse of obscuritie. Thus spake the Wizard in his propheticall spirit, being transported beyond himselfe, and rauished with a supernaturall furie. But Balac was sore incensed against him, exclaiming that hee had not kept couenant, although by great rewards he had been by his Confederate drawne thither to curse them, vrging it against him, that in stead of execrations against them, he had published their pietie and praises. To whom the Prophet made this answer: Thinkest thou (said he) that it lieth in our power, as often as destinies are to be discouered, to speake or conceale what we list, at such time as God speaketh in our mouths? No, he himselfe vttereth those words which him listeth, & publisheth those oracles by vs, which neither we know, nor euer thought vpon. Verily I sufficiently remember wherunto I was perswaded by the solicitation of the Madianites, and for that cause came I hither, to execute that which they extorted from my hands; but God is more powerfull then my will, who contrarie to the will

A will of God,and for the particular fauour of men,had purpoſed to ſpeake otherwiſe:but as ſoone as he entreth into our hearts,there remaineth no more of our ſelues in our ſelues. Truly I had determined in my ſelf to ſpeak nothing in their praiſes,neither was it in my mind to reckon vp what God had decreed to beſtow vpon that nation,but the fauorable power which befriendeth them, and ſtudieth nothing more then the felicity & glory of that nation,hath in his preſcience put theſe words into my mouth:now therefore(ſince it is my deſire to gratifie both thee,& the Madianits, whoſe praiers I ought not but admit)go to let vs erect new Altars,and prepare freſh ſacrifice,and make trial if perhaps God wil be moued to grant me licence to curſe theſe kind of men.Hereunto Balac gaue his conſent,yet did not God ratifie thoſe his imprecations made againſt the Iſraelites, notwithſtanding he had ſacrificed twice; ſo that falling on his face, he declared the occurrences B of their kingdomes and common-weales, of moſt eſteeme (of which ſome one were not as yet built) and ſuch things likewiſe as ſhould thereafter happen to thoſe men both by land and ſea, euen to our daies: out of all which things (accompliſhed according to his predictions)we may gather moſt aſſuredly that, which of his prophecie is to be fulfilled, will ſurely take effect, Balac being ſore diſpleaſed,becauſe the Iſraelites could not be curſed, ſent Balaam backe again without honour: who returning homewards (at ſuch time as he came vnto Euphrates)called Balac & the Princes of the Madianites,and ſpake thus vnto them. Balac and you Princes of Madian,it behoo- ueth me to gratifie you (although it be againſt the will of God) for which cauſe giue eare vnto me: All the ſorts of death that may be to the vttermoſt, cannot extinguiſh the race of the Hebrewes:neither by warre or peſtilence,or famine,or any other chance may they be ruinated: for C God hath care to preſerue that nation from all euill, ſo that no ſlaughter can fall vpon them, whereby the whole multitude ſhall be extinguiſhed: yet in the meane while ſome things may not be auoyded,whereby afflicted for a time,they may preſently flouriſh more then they did before,being by ſuch a chaſticement reduced to better health. For which cauſe if you ſeeke to obtaine ſome ſhort victorie ouer them, by this my counſell you ſhall bring your wiſhes to effect. Send me the faireſt of your daughters,as trimly decked and beautified as is poſſible,who by their beautie may conquer, and by their loue allure their hearts; let theſe wander about their campe, and offer themſelues to entertaine a familiar embrace, if by the yong men they ſhall be ſolicited thereunto: and as ſoone as they ſhall eſpie them to be ſurpriſed with deſire, let them ſodainly breake from them; and when as they ſhall be requited by them to ſtay, let them not yeeld, ex- D cept they will be perſwaded to forſake their countrey lawes,and the ſeruice of God from whom they receiued them,and honour the Gods of the Madianites, and Moabites. For by this meanes ſhal they incenſe Gods wrath againſt themſelues. Which when he had certified and admoniſhed them of,he departed.Now whē the Madianits(according as they were counſelled)ſent out their daughters,the yonger ſort of the Hebrewes were intangled with the beautie of the damſels: and growing in talke with them, they prayed them that they would not enuy them the opportunity to reape the pleaſure and inioyment of their beautie, neither that they would diſdaine their intercourſe: they willingly both admit the words, and the embraces of the yong men, and hauing well hette them with daliance, they addreſſed themſelues to leaue them in the heat of their deſires. Whereupon they diſcomforted at the womens departure,did inſtantly intreat them,that E they ſhould not in that ſort forſake them, but that in hope of future marriage and poſſeſſion of their greateſt goods,they ſhould remaine and dwell with them. Theſe promiſes they confirmed with oathes,and ſealed with teares, calling God to witnes (the rather to perſwade and confirme them vnto mercie)whereupon they (after they perceiued that they were ſurpriſed,and beſotted with their companie) anſwered after this manner. Valiant yong men; we want not at home neither ample faculties, or the affections of our parents, and domeſticall friends; neither come we hither vnto you for want of theſe things; neither admit we your prayers, in that we meane to make ſale of our beauties: but being perſwaded that you are honeſt men, we haue not diſdained to entertaine you with this gracious hoſpitalitie, in that we ſee ye had need thereof, and for that cauſe haue we ſhewed our ſelues courteous vnto you: now therefore becauſe you ſay you F loue vs, and that you are ſore aggrieued at this our departure, we haue thought good not to gainſay your intreaties: if therefore you will plight your faith, and promiſe vs marriage (which thing onely is that which muſt ſatisfie vs)we will willingly liue with you as your lawfull wiues; but we feare leaſt when your luſts are ſatisfied, you ſhould with iniurie and contumely, ſend vs backe againe to our parents: to which ſuſpect of ours it becommeth you(if you ſo pleaſe)to giue a lawfull pardon.But they promiſed to giue their faith in what maner ſoeuer,and refuſed no condition(by reaſon of their extreame loue.)Wel then(ſaid the virgins)ſince that you are ſo pleaſed, and that you haue manners ſo different from others, that you alſo vſe your proper meates according to your peculiar manner; neither can you endure that your drinke be common with other mens; it behoooueth you if you will liue with vs, to adore our gods. The Hebrewes blinded with the loue which they bare vnto the virgins, conceiued wel of their words, & conſented to that which they ſaid, ſuffering themſelues to be ſeduced according as they were inuited; ſo that they tranſgreſſed the ordinances of their fathers, in following ſtrange gods; to whom they purpoſed to do ſacrifice according to the maner of the country. They took pleaſure alſo to eat ſtrange kinds of meats which were prohibited them by the law; & addicted themſelus to all kinds of pleaſure, according as the women perſwaded them, ſo that the whole army was infected with a diſſolute diſorder (amongſt the yonger ſort) & a worſe mutiny aroſe therby then the precedent, where through it was to be ſuſpected, leaſt the whole courſe of law and gouernment ſhould be permitted. For the youth hauing once had a touch of theſe forrain and laſciuious faſhions, were vnſatiably tranſported with the ſame: and if there were any more excellent then others in nobility, they together (with the reſt of the multitude) were retchleſly corrupted. During this eſtate of affaires, Moſes being afraid leaſt ſome more grieuous miſchiefe ſhould ſucceed, called the people together, accuſing no man in particular (for that he was vnwilling to draw them into deſperation, who whilſt they thinke they lie hidden may be reduced to a better mind) but he told them that it was a thing vnworthy & ill-beſeeming themſelues or their elders, that they ſhould ſet more by their pleaſures, then by God and their religion. That it behooued them whileſt they had time, to repent themſelues, and that they ſhewed themſelues to be valiant men, not by contempt of lawes, but by appeaſing their diſordinate deſires. Beſides he told them that it was an abſurd thing, that wheras in the deſart they liued modeſtly, they ſhould now in a plentifull countrey grow ſo diſſolute & diſordinate, as to loſe that by affluence which they had got by temperance. Zambrias oration againſt Moſes.

Moſes (ſaith he) vſe thou thine owne lawes (whereunto by long vſe thou haſt added ſtrength and confirmation) which hadſt thou not done, oft times ere this hadſt thou ſuffered puniſhment, and learnt to thine owne miſerie) that the Hebrewes were not to be deluded: for my ſelfe thou ſhalt neuer tie me to thy tyrannicall decrees, for hitherto haſt thou indeuoured nought elſe, but vnder pretext of law and religion to bring vs into ſeruitude and ſubiection; and thy ſelfe by thy ſubtile and miniſter meanes, to honour and ſoueraigntie; taking from vs the pleaſures and libertie of our liues (things that belong to free men, and ſuch as appertaine or liue not vnder any mans gouernment.) For this ſhould be worſe then an Ægyptian thraldome, to puniſh euery man by thy lawes, according to thine owne pleaſure; whereas thou thy ſelfe art more worthy to be puniſhed, in that thou diſannulleſt that thing which is approued by all mens conſent: and deſireſt that thy decrees ſhould be of more force, then all the reſolutions of all other mortall men whatſoeuer. But I (as touching that which I doe) in that I ſuppoſe it to be well done, am not afraid to confeſſe in this aſſembly, namely, that I haue taken a ſtranger to wife: thou heareſt mine actions from mine owne mouth, as from a free and reſolute man, neither doe I deſire that they ſhould be hidden. I likewiſe ſacrifice to the gods contrarie to our cuſtome, becauſe I ſuppoſe it to be both iuſt and neceſſarie, that from many I ſeeke the truth, and not (depending as it were vpon a tyranny, or liuing thereunder) to build my faith vpon one only: for no man ſhall pleaſe me that will haue more intereſt in mine actions then my ſelfe. Whileſt Zambrias alledged this both for himſelfe and other of his faction; the people ſilently expected the iſſue of this audacious boldneſſe, eſpecially for that they ſaw their law-maker would not contend any longer, leaſt he ſhould make an inſolent man more outragious; for he feared leaſt diuers ſuch in imitation of him growing impudent in their ſpeeches, ſhould ſtirre vp tumults amongſt the people: ſo that the aſſembly for this time was after this maner diſſolued, and perhaps this miſchiefe had taken further L M

A head, except Zambrias had beene ſodainly cut off, by ſuch a meanes as enſueth. Phinees (both in reſpect of other things, as alſo the dignitie of his father, the chiefeſt among the youths, and the ſonne of Eleazer the high Prieſt, whoſe great vncle Moſes was) was grieuouſly diſcontented with Zambrias contumacie, and leaſt by his impunitie the law might grow into contempt, he reſolued to be reuenged vpon the tranſgreſſors, being well aſſured how much the example of great men preuaileth on both parts: and whereas he was of ſo much ſtrength of mind and of body, as that he would not attempt any thing raſhly which he would not bring to iſſue, hee repaired to Zambrias tent, and at one ſtroke ſlue both him and Chosbi his wife. By whoſe example the reſt of the youth (beeing exaſperated by this his worthy act) enforced themſelues to doe iuſtice on thoſe that had committed the like offence; ſo that they ſlew a great part of them by the ſword, and the reſt by the peſtilence (which was inflicted by Gods iudgement on them) were vtterly
B rooted out. Neither ſpared he thoſe, who though by reaſon of conſanguinity they ought to haue reſtrained and diſſwaded their kinſmen from lewdnes, yet had rather either diſſemble, or kindle their luſt in them, then counſaile them; neither intermitted he from puniſhing thoſe men till fourteene thouſand of them were done to death by ſicknes. For which cauſe Moſes (being incenſed againſt the Madianites) ſent out an army to deſtroy that nation (of which expedition we will preſently diſcourſe, after that we haue annexed that which was omitted in this hiſtorie.) For reaſon would that we ſhould not pretermit to praiſe the deſeigne of our lawmaker in this behalfe. For
C in regard of Balaam, (ſought out by the Madianites vnder the intent to curſe the Hebrewes, although he could not doe it, being hindred therefro by the prouidence of God, who notwithſtanding gaue that counſell to the enemie, by meanes whereof within a little ſpace a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their courſe of life, and diuerſe haue beene grieuouſly plagued with ſicknes) in regard I ſay of this Balaam, he hath greatly honoured him in chronicling his predictions in his writings. And although it had been eaſie for him to haue depriued him of the glorie, and to haue appropriated it to himſelfe, by reaſon that there was not any witneſſe that might contradict him; yet neglected he not to giue teſtimonie of him, and to make mention of him in his writings: Yet let euery one thinke of this according as it ſhall ſeeme good vnto him. But Moſes (as I began to ſay) ſent an army of twelue thouſand men againſt the Madianites, chuſing out of euery tribe one thouſand ſouldiers, and appointed Phinees, captaine ouer theſe forces, by whoſe induſtry (as a little before I haue declared) both the lawes were ſatisfied, and Zambri (that brake the ſame) was puniſhed.

The Hebrewes fight againſt the Madianites, and ouercome them.

BVT the Madianites (hauing intelligence that their enemies drewe neere vnto them, and that they were not farre off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and beſet all thoſe paſſages of their countrey, by which they thought their enemie might breake in, addreſſing themſelues to repulſe them with force and valour: but no ſooner did Phinees with
E his forces charge them, and ſet vpon them, but that (vpon the firſt encounter) ſo great a multitude of the Madianites was ſlaine, that the number of the carcaſſes might not bee accounted: neither were their kings in like ſort ſaued frō the ſword. Theſe were Og, Sures, Robeas, Vbes, & the fift Recemus (from whom the chiefeſt Citie of the Arabians deriueth his name, and at this day retaineth the ſame, and is called Receme, which the Græcians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrewes hauing thus put their enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and carried and droue away with them a great prey; and killing all the inhabitants therof both men & women, they only ſpared the virgins (for this command had Phinees receiued from Moſes hands) who returning home with his armie in ſafetie, brought with him a memorable and mighty prey; of Oxen, fiftie
F and two thouſand, ſixtie and ſeauen: of Aſſes, ſixtie thouſand: of golden and ſiluer veſſels a great number (which thoſe of that countrey were wont to vſe in their domeſticall affaires.) For by reaſon of their great riches, they liued very delicately: there were alſo led captiue from thence about thirtie thouſand virgins. But Moſes (diuiding the prey) gaue the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Prieſts, and to the Leuites another fiftie: as for the remainder hee diſtributed it amongſt the people. Whence it came to paſſe, that euer afterwards they liued in great ſecurity, hauing gotten riches by their vertue, & peace alſo to enioy the ſame. Now for that Moſes was wel ſtricken in yeeres, he appointed Ieſus (who if need were might ſucceede him in the offices, both of a Prophet and a Prince and Gouernour; for God had ſo commanded that he ſhould make choice of him) to be his ſucceſſor in the principalitie. For he was moſt expert in all diuine and humane knowledge; being therein inſtructed by his maſter Moſes. About that time, the two tribes of Gad and Ruben, with the halfe tribe of Manaſſes (being abundantly ſtored with cattell, and all other manner of riches) by common conſent beſought Moſes that he would giue and aſſigne to them in particular the countrey of the Amorites, which not long ſince they had conquered by the ſword, for that it was full of rich paſtures. But he (ſuſpecting leaſt ſurpriſed with feare, they did detract and withdraw themſelues from the battell of the Chanaanites, and that vnder the pretext of the care of their cattell, they couered their ſloth) highly taunted and controuled them, ſaying that they were fearefull diſſemblers: He accuſed them likewiſe, that their deſire was to poſſeſſe that land, which was conquered by the common valour of the people, to the end they might lead their liues in idleneſſe and pleaſure; and that bearing armes with the reſt of the hoſt, they would not helpe to poſſeſſe the land beyond Iordane which God had promiſed them, by ouercomming thoſe nations which he commanded them to account for their enemies. Who perceiuing that he was diſpleaſed (leaſt he ſhould ſeeme to be deſeruedly incenſed againſt them) anſwered, that neither thorow feare they fled danger, neither by reaſon of ſloth ſhunned labour, but onely ſhot at this, that leauing their prey in commodious places, they might be more fit to enter conflict: ſaying, that they were readie (if ſo be they might receiue Cities for the defence and receit of their wiues, children, and ſubſtance) to follow the reſt of the armie whither ſoeuer they were conducted; and to aduenture their liues with them for the common ſucceſſe. Whereupon Moſes (allowing their forwardneſſe, and aſſembling Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Ieſus, with the reſt of the Magiſtrates) granted them the land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the people ioyned vnto them in conſanguinitie) they ſhould warfare againſt their common enemie, till all things were accompliſhed according to their deſires: and by this meanes hauing receiued that which they demanded, and building them walled Cities, they left their children, wiues, and ſubſtance in the ſame. Moſes alſo builded ten Cities in that Region (which are to be reckoned in the number of thoſe fortie and eight) in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries and places of refuge, which they onely might take benefit of, who fled thither for chance-meddly; and he appointed them their terme of exile till ſuch time as the high Prieſt died, vnder whom the man-ſlaughter was committed: at ſuch time they might ſafely returne into their Countrey. And during the time of their exile, it was lawfull for any of the kinne to take reuenge againſt the offender by his death, onely at ſuch time as he found him without the Citie of refuge: and that right he onely ratified to thoſe that were akinne, but not vnto others. Now the Cities of refuge were theſe: in the confines of Arabia, Boſora: in the Region of Galadena, Arimanum: in the countrey of Bataneades, Gauladeaman: And after the conqueſt of Chanaan ſo many Cities of the Leuites (by the commandement of Moſes) were appointed to that end that they might giue refuge and habitation to ſuch ſort of offenders. At that time when one of the Magiſtrates called Salpades, of the tribe of Manaſſes, was dead (and had onely left behind him children of the worſer ſexe) the gouernours of the tribe came vnto Moſes, and asked his counſell, whether in the diſtribution of the lands, they ſhould leuie out any part or portion for them: who anſwered them, that if they married within their tribe, they ſhould haue their dowrie; but if they made choice to handfaſt themſelues in another tribe, that then they ſhould leeſe their patrimonie in their owne: and for this cauſe made he this ordinance, to the end that euery tribe ſhould continually poſſeſſe his proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but thirtie daies onely, to fulfill the number of thoſe fortie yeeres ſince their departure out of Ægypt, he (ſummoning an aſſembly in that place neere to Iordan, where now the Citie of Abila is ſituate, enuironed with a field beſet with Palme trees) as ſoone as he ſaw the people addreſſed to heare him, ſpake vnto them after this manner.

MOSES Lawes, and how he was taken out of this world from the companie of men.

The yeere of the world, 2492. before Christs Nativity. 1471.

MY deare friends and fellow ſoldiers, companions in my long trauell, ſince it is ſo thought requiſite by God, and mine age (attaining to the full number of one hundreth and twentie yeares) requireth no leſſe, but that I muſt depart out of this life; and ſince it ſeemeth not good in Gods ſight, that either I ſhould bee agent, or aſſiſtant in your affaires beyond Iordan: I haue thought it requiſite that (in as much as appertaineth to your felicitie) I ſhould not now alſo faile or default in my duty towards you; but that according to the grace that is giuē me, I ſhould prouide that by laying open the way vnto you that leadeth to the ſame, I may
B ſeeme worthy amongſt you to merit eternall glory & memorie. Giue therfore eare vnto me, that when as I haue firſt declared vnto you, wherein both your felicitie, and the happines of your poſterity conſiſteth, and haue left this perpetual teſtimony and monument of my entire loue towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: for well I know that I deſerue to be credited by you, both for that before times I haue inceſſantly (in ſtudying for your profites) neuer deceiued you, as alſo for that the ſoule (being ready to bee ſeparated from the body) becommeth more accompliſhed in all vertue and veritie. Ye ſonnes of Iſrael, there is but one onely cauſe whereby men attaine vnto felicitie, to wit, the fauour of God, which he is onely able to giue to thoſe that deſerue it, and to withdraw it from thoſe that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutifull (according as he requireth, and in ſuch manner as I according to his direction, doe inſtitute you)
C you ſhall neuer faile to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happines: and that which is more, thoſe goods which you haue now obtained ſhall be perpetuall, and that which you want ſhall ſhortly be plentifully beſtowed on you. Onely indeuour you your ſelues to be ſubiect to Gods will, and obedient to his commandements: and neither purpoſe vnto your ſelues any other lawes then thoſe I haue giuen you, neither thorow contempt innouate any thing in your religion. Which if you ſhall performe, you ſhall excell all other Nations in warre, and grow inuincible againſt your enemies: for by Gods aſſiſtance all threats are eaſily contemned.
Moreouer, there are great rewards (in all the courſe of life) propoſed vnto vertue, and ſhe her ſelfe to her ſelfe is a chiefe and eſpeciall reward: beſides, by her all other bleſſings are eaſily obtayned, which if you intertaine among your ſelues, you ſhall both leade a bleſſed life, and obtaine immor-
D tall glory, not onely amongſt ſtrangers, but alſo in all poſterities. Theſe things are you to hope vpon, if neither you your ſelues violate thoſe lawes (which by Gods command, and mine induſtry) are ſet downe vnto you, neither ſuffer any other to violate the ſame, but in your ſelues continually meditate vpon the vnderſtanding and vſe thereof. As for my ſelfe, I depart this life in fulnes of ioy, reioycing at theſe your good fortunes, & commending you all to the lawes of pietie and prudence, and the vertue of your guides and magiſtrates, who hereafter are to take care of your ſafetie and felicitie. God likewiſe, vnder whoſe conduct you haue liued (and to whoſe fauour you owe whatſoeuer you haue receiued by mee) will not faile to to take care of you, but as long as you ſhall honour both him and pietie, ſo long ſhall you remaine in ſecuritie vnder his protection: neither ſhall you want ſuch men, who ſhall giue you ghoſtly inſtructions, whoſe counſels if E you obey, you ſhall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Ieſus, with the Senat and Magiſtrates of the tribes) towards whom beware leaſt you grow ſtifnecked, knowing and remembring this, that he that is inſtructed to obey well (when hee ſhall attaine vnto dignitie) will gouerne well. Neither ſuppoſe you that libertie conſiſteth herein, if you mutinie againſt the commandements of your Princes: for hitherto haue you repoſed your libertie in your contumacie towards your benefactors; from which ſinne if hereafter you ſhall bleſſe your ſelues, you ſhall ſee your eſtate waxe ſtill more flouriſhing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you ſhould euer be ſo exaſperated againſt theſe, as you haue beene ſometimes incenſed againſt mee. For if you remember your ſelues, I haue beene more oftentimes in hazzard of my life by your meanes, then by the enemie: Which I ſpeake not therefore vnto you to vpbraid you therewith, F for I would not leaue you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the houre of my death, (who euen at that time entertained the iniurie with a quiet minde) but to the ende that beeing by mee admoniſhed, you ſhould henceforward bee wiſer in thoſe things which hereafter ſhall concerne you; and leaſt you ſhould grow contumelious againſt your gouernours, beeing made proude with affluence of your riches, which you ſhall enioy at ſuch time as you haue ouerpaſſed Iordan, and conquered Chanaan. lamented they both for the losse of their Captaine, as also for that they remembred them how they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recouer so good a Prince: I and they suspected likewise that God would not hereafter bee so fauourable vnto them, in that they had not a Moses to pray for them. Besides, they repented them of those things which (through furie) they committed against him in the desart, and were grieuously sorie: so that all the people (breaking out into teares) would admit no consolation. But Moses recomforted them, and prayed them to giue ouer weeping, & incouraged them to receiue their lawes: and so for this time dissolued the assembly. But now before I addresse my self to manifest the rest, I haue thought we neede not faine or affixe any thing in way of ornament: we haue onely renewed the order, K

haue generally digested into their places: whereof I thought good to admonish the Reader, for feare least hereafter any of our Tribes comming to the view hereof, should rashly accuse me, for that I had not scarce faithfully deliuered the writings and institutions of Moses. Now will I reckon vp those lawes in especiall, which appertaine to the publike institution and rites of our

Let no ſacrifice be made of the hire of an harlot: for neither doth any thing delight God which is annexed with iniurie; neither is there greater vncleanneſſe, then the ſhamefull and vnlawfull mixture of our bodies. The hire of a harlot.

Likewiſe, if any man take reward for couering a bitch (whether ſhe be for the chaſe, or for the flocke) it is not lawfull to make ſacrifice vnto God thereof. Let no man ſpeake ill of thoſe

Euery ſeuenth yeere, when the people ſhall be aſſembled together in the ſacred Citie to ſacrifice vpon the feaſt of Tabernacles, at ſuch time as the feaſt approcheth, the high Prieſt from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) ſhall reade the law vnto all of them: ſo that neither women nor children ſhall be exempted from the hearing of the ſame, no not the very ſlaues and bondmen. For it is requiſite that they retaine the perpetuall memorie thereof, alwaies imprinted in their minds: for ſo ſhall they ſinne the leſſe, in that they vnderſtand what is decreed in the law. The lawes likewiſe ſhall be of more force in the conſciences of thoſe

Let children in eſpeciall learne the lawes, then which diſcipline there is not any more honeſt; neither more conducible vnto felicitie. Twice in the day, in the morning and in the euening about bed time, let God be honoured for his benefit of our deliuerance out of Ægypt. For it is a thing in nature reaſonable, to giue thankes vnto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we haue before time receiued, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chiefe of theſe alſo are to be written ouer our doores, and worne on our armes: and thoſe things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be borne about, written on the head and armes,
D that euery way Gods bountie may be ſeene towards his people. In euery Citie or townſhip let there be ſeuen gouernours, ſuch as are approoued in vertue, and famous for their iuſtice: let each one of theſe Magiſtrates haue two Miniſters of the tribe of Leui. Let thoſe that are appointed Iudges in the Cities be held in high reputation: ſo that in their preſence no man preſume either to vrge contumelies, or iniurious ſpeeches: for ſo ſhall it come to paſſe, that men accuſtomed to doe reuerence, ſhall alſo exerciſe themſelues in pietie, and grow ſo much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatſoeuer ſeemeth good to the Iudges to decree, let that be held inuiolable; except it be apparant that they be corrupted with money, or that they may be manifeſtly conuicted of a wrongfull iudgement. They ought likewiſe to iudge without reſpect of lucre or dignitie, and preferre iuſtice before all other things: for this iniurie ſorteth out to E Gods contumely, as if it were to be ſuppoſed, that he is to be ſuſpected to be weaker then they, for whoſe ſake they wreſt the law contrarie to equitie: for Gods power is iuſtice; he therefore that giueth iudgement in fauour and partialitie of great men, maketh them greater then God himſelfe. And if the Iudges cannot determine of the matter in queſtion (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them referre the cauſe to the ſacred Citie, and then ſhall the high Prieſt and the Prophet, with the aſſiſtance of the Senate, determine that which ſhall be conuenient. The teſtimonie of one witneſſe ſhall not be receiued, but of three, or at leaſtwiſe of two whoſe teſtimonie ſhall be made good by the examination of their behauiour and life. As for women, it is not lawfull for them to beare any witneſſe; by reaſon of the leuitie and temeritie of that ſexe. Deut. 19.

Neither is it lawfull for a man ſeruant to bring in teſtimonie, by reaſon of his degenerate and ig-

Let him not haue diuers wiues, neither let him hunt after huge treaſures, nor multitudes of horſe: for feare leaſt poſſeſſing them, he become ſo inſolent, as that he raiſe his power and will aboue the lawes: and if you ſee him affectioned vnto theſe things, beware leaſt he grow more puiſſant then is expedient for you. Deut. 19. The bounds of lands are not to be remooued.

It is not lawfull for any man to remooue the land markes, neither of his owne land, or any other mans whatſoeuer; for by this meanes is the peace conſerued: Let each one therefore forbeare to remooue them, becauſe they are as the voice of God, aſſured for euer. For warres and ſouldiers are raiſed thereby, when ſuch as would augment their inheritance, ſtriue alwaies to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: And they that are ſo hardie to remooue the ſame, are not farre from contempt of the lawes.

Leuit. 25. The plants that are not of foure yeers growth are prohibited.

He that ſhall plant a peece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth yeere, the firſt fruits thereof ſhall not be offered vnto God, neither ſhall any man eate thereof, by reaſon that the time is inconuenient, and permitteth not that the trees ſhould fructifie as yet; and nature her ſelfe is as it were inforced before her time, wherby the fruit is neither conuenable for God, nor conuenient for the vſe of man. But all that fruit that ſhall grow in the fourth yeere (for then is the time that the trees ſhould beare) ſhall be gathered and brought into the holy Citie (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they ſhall be eaten during the feaſt which the Lord thereof maketh to his friends, and with Orphanes and Widdowes: But in the fift yeere it ſhall be lawfull for him to gather the fruit for himſelfe. Vines to be planted. The law of the plough.

Sow not a field that is planted with vines, for it ſufficeth that it nouriſheth one ſort of plants: ſo that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to be plowed with Oxen: neither are any other ſorts of beaſts to be yoaked with them, but the tillage muſt alwaies be performed by beaſts of the ſame kinde. L

The ſeeds alſo ought to be cleane and without any mixture; ſo that two or three ſorts ought not to be ſowed together: for nature alloweth not a commixtion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull alſo to couer the female with a male of another kinde: for it is to be feared that this filthineſſe ſhould draw men to forget themſelues; and grow in contempt of that ſexe which is appropriate vnto them: for it often falleth out, that from ſmall beginning, things waxe worſer and worſer. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chance to grow any maime in policie: for which cauſe the lawes diſſemble not (no not the lighteſt) things, to the end they may no way ſeeme to be deficient in their nature.

They that mow and reape corne, ought not to gleane, but to leaue ſome eares for thoſe that are in neceſſitie, to the end to ſuccour them. They likewiſe that plant vines, ought to leaue ſome cluſters for the poore, and ſome fruit on the Oliue trees, to the intent that they that haue none of theſe, may gather ſome little thing for their reliefe: for the owners of the field ſhall not reape ſo much profit by the ſparing inning of their corne, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poore ſhall reape by their gleaning: for God will bring to paſſe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but ſhall haue care of the nouriſhment of thoſe that are in neceſſitie) ſhall be farre more fat and fertile to bring forth and nouriſh her fruit. Neither

A Neither is the mouth of the Oxe to be mouzled, at ſuch time as hee treadeth the corne in the mow: for it ſtandeth not with reaſon, that they who haue beene partakers of the labour, and haue trauailed for the increaſe of the fruites, ſhould bee bridled from the vſe and benefite thereof. The yeere of the world, 2493. before Chriſts Nativitie. 1571.

Neither ought the trauailer alſo in his iourney to be denied to gather and taſte the fruites of Autumne; but he is to be permitted to take his fill, as if they were his owne, whether he be of the countrey or a ſtranger, who ſhall depart ioyfully, in that they haue beene made partakers of ſuch fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carry any away with them. Oxen treading or grinding.

They likewiſe that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taſte of them as they beare them to the preſſe: for it is an vniuſt thing, that the goods which are giuen by the will of God for the ſuſtenance of man, ſhould bee denied them that deſire to taſte the fruit which God giueth in Trauellers are not to be driuen away from ripe fruits.

For it is not to be ſuppoſed, that that is ill imployed, which in way of curteſie a man permitteth another man to take, ſince it is God that furniſheth and giueth the abundance and foiſon of all things; not to the end to inioy them in priuate, but alſo to beſtow them willingly; and he it is that by this meanes would declare vnto other people, the good will hee beareth to the people of Iſrael, and the felicitie whereof he maketh them partakers, by reaſon that in that abundance which they haue, his will is Thirtie nine ſtripes.

It ſhall very well become you (ſaid Moſes) ſince you haue taſted miſeries both in Ægypt, and the deſart; that you haue care of thoſe who are in like eſtate; and for that you are made rich by Gods mercie and prouidence, it behoueth and becommeth you to impart ſomewhat to the indigent, who at the preſent are in that eſtate in which you were.

And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to doe (as well the tenths of the Leuites, as alſo thoſe other things which were ordained for the feaſts, and firſt fruits) being readie to returne vnto his home, let him ſtand vpright neere vnto the Temple, and aboue all things giue thankes vnto God, that hauing deliuered them from the grieuous ſeruitude of Ægypt, he hath giuen them a plentifull and ample land to enioy: and making proteſtation that he hath paid the tenths according to Moſes law, let him beſeech God, that he will bee fauourable both to himſelfe in priuate, and the Hebrewes in The firſtfruits Deut. 26.

Whoſoeuer ſhall violate a maiden, being betrothed to another man (if by perſwaſion ſhee hath conſented to lie with him) let her die with him. For they are both of them equally guiltie of ſinne: the man, becauſe he hath perſwaded the maiden to ſuffer an inſufferable diſhonour, and to preferre her luſt before an honeſt marriage: and the maide, for ſuffering her ſelfe to be ouercome, and abandoning her bodie to villanie, either for luſt or lucres ſake: But if meeting her alone he inforce her, and ſhe haue none to ſuccour her hard by; let him die alone.

Furthermore it is allowed for the comfort of afflicted women, that they may be ioyned in marriage with the next akinne of their firſt husbands: but if the brother will not take her to wife, ſhee ſhall repaire vnto the Senate and make this proteſtation, that the brother of her deceaſed husband will not intertaine her (although ſhe had deſired to remaine in that line, and bring forth infants vnto him) proteſting that by him onely the memorie of her deceaſed husband was diſhonoured. And when the Senate ſhall haue examined the cauſe why he eſtrangeth himſelfe from this marriage, his excuſe ſhall be allowed of how great or ſleight conſequence ſoeuer it be; and then ſhall the widdow vnlooſe his ſhoe, and ſpit in his face, and tell him that he hath deſeruedly ſuffered theſe things, in that he hath iniuried the memorie of his dead brother: and thus ſhall he depart out of the court, being defamed for his whole life time, and the woman may marrie whomſoeuer ſhe liſt. For it is a matter both honeſt and iuſt, that he that entertaineth her to haue iſſue by her, ſhould condeſcend vnto her will in all that wherin he might gratifie her, and that he ſhould not onely addict himſelfe to the purſuit of his pleaſure: when as then the thirtie daies of mourning ſhall be expired (for that time is ſufficient for the wife to bewaile her friends in) then may ſhe hearken after marriage: and if after he hath had his pleaſure with her, it fortune that he miſlike her, and will not accept her for his wife, he can no more make her his ſlaue, but ſhe may goe whether ſo euer ſhe pleaſeth, for that ſhe beareth with her, her libertie.

A the offences of the children to bee imputed to the parents, by reason that youth oftentimes engageth it selfe in those follies, which hee neuer learned by examples, not for which hee endureth not to be reprooued. Eunuches are to be detested, and their companies to bee fled, because they depriue themselues of manhood, and the gift of begetting children, which God hath giuen vnto men for the increase of mankinde. Such people therefore are to be driuen farre from vs, and esteemed wholly inexcusable, who kill their children before they be borne. For it is a matter very manifest, that their spirits being effeminate, their bodies also are degenerate. Euch thing also that is monstrous to behold, is to be driuen away: neither is it lawfull to geld either men or beasts. Let this be the disposition of those lawes, wherewith you shall be pollicied and gouerned in time of peace, and God bee fauourable vnto you, and giue you grace to vse them in good order, and
B without confusion. And since it cannot otherwise be, but that humane affaires must sometimes fall into troubles and dangers, somewhiles beyond desire and expectation, and otherwhiles of set purpose: I will briefely set you downe certaine lawes as touching that point, to the intent that being fore-instructed of that which you ought to doe, you may haue aboundance of holsome remedies, and being well prouided and instructed in that which you ought to doe, you may preuent and not fall into any danger and calamitie.

Eunuches.

God grant that you may enioy the countrey (which he hath giuen you) in contempt of trauels and in exercise of vertues: and that you may possesse the same in security and peace, and that strangers may not leuie armies to ouerthrow you, and that no ciuill mutiny may bee raised amongst you, which may bring to passe, that that which hath beene well ordered and decreed by
C your ancestors, doe come to nought, when you shall happen to commit the contrarie. Liue therefore, and persist you to conforme your selues to those lawes, which both God hath approoued for good, and hath also giuen you. But if perhaps your selues at this present, or your successours hereafter, shall fortune to entertaine and vndertake a warre, God grant it may happen without the confines of your countrey: but if the matter must needs be tried out by the sword, you shall send certaine heraulds to your destinated enemies. For before you enter battell, it shall bee requisite first of all to parlee with them, and to declare vnto them that you haue a great armie, and horses, and weapons, and (besides all these) that you haue Gods fauour and assistance: who shall require them therefore that you may not bee inforced to warre against them, nor to make bootie of their goods, and to carry them away in spight of their resist. If they condescend vnto
D any reasonable conditions, then entertaine peace; making your accompt that they are stronger then you be: but if they will needs offer you iniury, you shall lead forth your army against them, hauing God for your Generall and soueraigne Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your selues haue chosen; surpassing all the rest in valour. For whereas there are diuers commanders, it falleth out that that which ought necessarily and readily to be executed, is hindered; and commonly the issue is vnfortunate, where there are diuers commanders. Let your army be generally leuied of men that are strong in body, and hardy in courage, and sequester from your armie him that is fearefull, least such men hapning to flie when they ought to fight, doe giue your enemies the aduantage. Let them also be free from warre, who hauing built them a new house, haue not enioyed the same for a yeeres space; as also he, that hath planted a vineyard and hath not
E gathered the fruite thereof; and besides these, hee that hath wedded a wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his house: least being transported with the desire of these things, and reseruing themselues to their forsaken pleasures, in the behalfe of their wiues, they fight but faintly and coldly.

But when you haue brought your armie into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you shall assault any Cities, if you fortune to haue any neede of matter to make engins of, grub not the land, neither see you cut downe the fruitfull trees, but spare them; remembring you that they are planted for the good of men, and that if they could speake they would accuse you, alledging that without cause of war they are ill intreated against all right: and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would dislodge and remoue into another countrey.

F But when the battell is ended, and the day is yours, kill all those enemies that resisted you in the skirmish, the rest reserue as your tributaries (except the people of the land of Chanaan, for they with all their families are to be ruinated.) against those which should not liue according to his lawes, but should transgresse the determinations thereof: Hee read also vnto them a Poeme of sixe measures (which he had enregistred in the holy booke) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which all things haue and doe fall out, without varying any waies from the truth and verity. These volumes and the Arke, gaue he vnto the Priests; in which he also placed the ten commandements written in the two tables. Hee committed also vnto them the custodie of the Tabernacle. He likewise exhorted the people that (at such time as by force they had conquered the promised countrey, and were plinted therein) they should not forget the iniury which the Amalechites had done vnto them, but that they should lead forth their army against them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at such time, as they were in the desart. And commanded them that as soone as they had taken the countrey of Chanaan, they should exterminate and extinguish all the people. G

The Amalechites to be punished. H

He willed them also to erect an Altar toward the rising of the sunne (not farre from the Citie of Sichem, betweene two mountaines, the one Garizim, on the right hand; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that distributing the people into two parts (sixe tribes in euery part) they should plant them on the mountaines. And he commanded that the Leuites, and Priests should be with them, to the intent that they first of all that were vpon the mountaine of Garizim, should beseech God that hee would multiply his blessings vpon them that should bee zealous of his seruice, and carefull of the conseruation of his lawes, without diuerting from that which Moses had commanded. The sixe other also were appointed to answer the like: and when as likewise these sixe last had praied, the sixe first were to answer them, and confirme that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions against the transgressors (each one answering other (in ratification of that which had beene spoken. He reduced also vnder writing these blessings and curses, to the intent that the memorie thereof might neuer bee suppressed or extinguished by time: which he also (being neere vnto his death) caused to be written in the Altar on the one side thereof, in that part which extended it selfe toward the place where the people stood, at such time as they sacrificed and offered burnt offerings. Since which day there were no more sacrifices offered in that place: because it was contrary to law. Thus did Moses establish, and these the Hebrew nation obserue continually and inuiolably, euen vnto this day. I

Moses bindeth the Hebrewes by an oath to keepe the law.

On the next morrow, he reassembled all the people, themselues, their wiues, and children: he likewise commanded that the slaues should be there present, binding them by an oath that they should maintaine and keepe the lawes, and that diligently tying themselues to the will of God, they should not so much esteeme either their kinred, or means, or perils, or any other cause whatsoeuer, as that thereby they should be driuen to neglect their lawes, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether it were any one of their kindred, or any City whatsoeuer, that would seeke to altar and disturbe the same, or striue to weaken the estate thereof, that both in particular and in publike, they should expose themselues and endeuour to punish them: and if they should fortune to take such a City, that they should rase and vtterly deface the same; and if it were possible not to leaue one stone vpon another, but to destroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take such a reuenge, yet that they should make it knowne that they were not consenting to their impietie. Hereunto the whole people subscribed and sealed it with an oath. K

He afterwards tolde them, how the people should know when the sacrifices were agreeable vnto God, and how they ought to march out to battell, taking a signe of the stones of which I haue foretold.

Iosuah likewise, during the life and in the presence of Moses, foreprophecied whatsoeuer he intended to performe for the profit of the people, either abroad in the administration of war, or at home in prescribing lawes; and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly prescribed them) he told them, that by instructions from God he foreprophecied, that if they violated their country religion, they should not escape their destruction; for that both their countrey should be filled with forraine armes, and their Cities sackt, and their Temple burnt, and that they themselues should be sold vnder the speare, and that they should serue a nation which would not be mooued or touched with commiseration of their afflictions and miseries; and that at length they should too lately and vnprofitably repent them of their errour: yet that God their establisher should restore Cities to the Citizens, and a Temple to his people: And that it should come to passe, that they should not lose this only one time, but also very many times. Then did Moses also exhort Iesus that he should lead his army against the Chanaanites, promising him that God would be assistant in his actions, prophecying besides much good hap vnto the people. Moses exhorteth Iosuah.

Since

A Since that (ſaith he) I goe vnto mine anceſtors,and that God hath prefixed this day and time of my departure, I proteſt before you, that liuing as yet and ſtanding in your preſence, I giue him thanks for the care and prouidence, which he hath hitherto had of your affaires, not onely in propulſing your aduerſaries, but alſo in largely imparting his bleſſings vnto you, and for that he hath alwaies fauourably helpt me whilſt I endeuoured by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better ſtate: And that which is more, it is he which hath giuen both the entrance & the iſſue; making vſe of me but as his committee and ſeruant in all that good, which hee would ſhould be done vnto his people. For all which things I haue thought it requiſite, that (in departing from you) I ſhould bleſſe the power of God, who in time to come ſhall haue the care and charge of you: and to acquit my ſelfe of that debt, I leaue you this in remembrance, which is, B that you ought to ſerue and honour him,and reuerence the ordinances which he hath giuen you, whereby (continuing his fauour towards you) hee will grant you grace to conſerue and keepe this excellent gift. Truely that law-maker(that were no more then a man)would be greatly diſpleaſed and highly diſcontented with thoſe men, who ſhould violate his ordinances, and ſhould ſet them at noughts: doe not you therefore tempt God,who is prouoked vnto anger,when thoſe lawes which he himſelfe hath eſtabliſhed and giuen you,ſhall be contemned and neglected.

Deut. 31.

Deut. 33. 34.

Whileſt Moſes pronounced theſe his laſt words, and diſcourſed vnto the tribes their ſeuerall deſtinies, the whole multitude brake into teares; and the women beating their breaſts, ſhewed and expreſſed the ſorrow they had conceiued at his death. The children likewiſe lamented,making it knowne that they could not bee maſters of their owne ſorrow, becauſe that in their tender yeares they had vnderſtood the vertue and famous actes of Moſes; and betwixt the elder and C younger ſort, there was as it were a conflict who ſhould weepe more bitterly: for the one vnderſtanding of how worthy a Gouernour they were depriued, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, becauſe they ſhould then forſake him, before they had ſufficiently taſted and made triall how great his vertue was. But how great the compaſſion and complaint of the people was, a man may make coniecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For, although he were aſſuredly perſwaded,that a man was not to lament vpon the inſtant of his death (in that it chanced vnto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and reſtraine himſelfe from teares: And whileſt he was born thither where he vaniſhed out of their ſight, all of them followed him,wetting their D faces and boſomes with flowing teares. Then did Moſes (beckening with his hand) warne them from a far off,that they ſhould ſtand ſtil and keep their places,and exhorted them that were neereſt him,by word of mouth,that they ſhould not follow nor proſecute him any further with teares, for feare leaſt they ſhould make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth,and Eleazar the high Prieſt,and the chiefetaine Ieſus. And when hee was arriued vpon the mountaine called Abarim (which is very high, and ſituate neere vnto Iericho, and from whence he might diſcouer the greater part of the land of Chanaan) hee diſmiſſed the elders: and whileſt with mutuall embraces he tooke his laſt leaue of Eleazar and Ieſus, and diſcourſed with them,a cloud ſodainly enuironed him,and hee was taken away into a certaine valley: but in the ſcripture he writeth that he died,fearing leaſt for the excellency of his vertue,they E might report that he was rauiſhed and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundreth and twenty yeares,the third part whereof he ſpent in gouernment (one month onely exempted.)He died the laſt month of the yeare,and the firſt day of that month which the Macedonians call Dyſtrus; and our countrimen Adar. Of all men the wiſeſt that euer was, and who in execution of his good counſells had no man to equall him.Moreouer in eloquence he was incomparable,and in dexterity and grace to entertaine and perſwade the people,he had no ſecond: and ſo were his affections alwaies leuelled and limitted by his wiſedome,that hee ſeemed vtterly to want them,and that onely he knew the names of thoſe paſſions which hee perceiued to be too actiue in other men. In his gouernment he was matchleſſe,in his prophecies peereleſſe, ſo that all the orations that he made ſeemed to be Oracles. For which cauſe the whole multitude mourF ned for him during the terme of thirty daies: neither were the Hebrewes euer ſeized with ſo extreame griefe,as they were at that time when the Prophet died; neither did he only leaue behind him a preſent deſire of him, but a great eſtimation amongſt all men, who haue euer chanced to reade and examine his writings,whilſt by them they make eſtimate of his vertues. And theſe are thoſe things which I thought good to be ſpoken of the death of Moſes.

The Hebrews lamentation at Moſes death.

Moſes when he died was 120. yeares old.

Amongſt the Hebrewes, Adar is the 12. month,but amongſt vs it is called March.

Moſes was a good gouernour,and a great prophet.

CHAP. I.

How IESVS, Generall of the Hebrewes, hauing ouercome and ſlaine the Chanaanites, diuided their land amongſt the tribes by lot.

The yeare of the world, 2494. before Chriſts birth, 1470.

AFTER that Moſes had bin taken from amongſt men (after the maner as I haue declared) and that all whatſoeuer he had ordained, was duly performed, and his funerall obſequies were at an end: Ieſus commanded the people to prepare themſelues, and to march forward into battell. He ſent eſpials likewiſe into Iericho, who might both ſound their minds, and diſcouer their forces: presently after he diſlodged, and incamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to paſſe the riuer of Iordan, as ſoone as any opportunity offered it ſelfe. Then aſſembled he together the Princes of the tribes of Ruben and Gad, and the halfe tribe of Manaſſes (for to this halfe tribe the countrey of the Amorites was giuen for an habitation, which was the ſeuenth part of Chanaan) and remembred them of that which they had promiſed vnto Moſes, entreating them (in memory and fauour of him, who in the laſt period of his life was not wearied to take care of their common-weale, and publike profit) ſpeedily and willingly to performe that which they had promiſed vnto him: who ſhewing themſelues ready and willing, to performe that which he commanded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thouſand men, that were his followers, and afterwards (departing from the City of Abila) he drew towards Iordan, and marched forward ſome ſixtie furlongs. As ſoone as he was encamped, the ſpies returned againe and preſented themſelues vnto him, certifying him of the whole eſtate of the Chanaanites. For being vnknowne and vnſuſpected, vpon the firſt arriuall they obſerued and viewed the wals and ſtrength of the Citie at their pleaſure, ſearching which of them were more or leſſe defenſed, and which of the gates were eaſieſt or hardeſt to aſſault; neither did any of thoſe that met them, offer any offence vnto them: whileſt they thus pried into, and viewed euery place

A place,the Citizens interpreted their diligence to bee rather an accuſtomed curioſity of ſtrangers, then ſuſpected them that they intended any hoſtile ſtratageme. The yeare of the world, 2494. before Chriſts birth, 1470.

About the ſhutting in of the euening, they retyred themſelues into a certaine hoſtrie that adioyned the walles,into which they had beene directed to take their repaſt; and whileſt after ſupper time they conſulted vpon their returne,the king was giuen to vnderſtand(as he ſate at his ſupper) that certaine Spies ſent out of the Hebrewes campe, had ſuruayed the Citie, and taken vp their lodging in Rahabs houſe,where they ſuppoſed to conceale themſelues till they might gaine them opportunity to depart. Whereupon the King ſent a ſpeedy commandement and officers to apprehend them, to the end that beeing brought before him, hee might by torture extort from them the cauſe and reaſon why they came into his Citie. Of whoſe approach, when Rahab had gotten ſome priuate intelligence, ſhee hid the Spies vnder certaine packes of linnen, Rahab hideth the Spies.
B which ſhee dryed neere vnto the walles, and told them that were ſent by the King, that certaine ſtrange gueſts a little before Sunne-ſet had ſupt in her houſe, but that they were departed; who if they were ſuſpected by the King, as ſuch as intended any detriment to the common-weale, they might with little labour and purſuite be eaſily ſurpriſed in their way. They hearing the woman ſpeake after this manner, and imagining no ſubtilty or deceit in her, returned backe againe without ſearching the hoſtrie. But after they were buſied and trauelled in the purſuit and ſearch after them euery way, and tracting of euery path, whereby they might bee ſuſpected to trauell towards Iordan, and perceiuing no ſigne of their flight,they deſiſted any further to purſue them. No ſooner was the tumult appeaſed, but Rahab calleth forth the Spies,and told them the dangers to which ſhe had expoſed her ſelfe for their ſecurity ſake (for had ſhe bin conuinced to haue con-
C cealed them,ſhe might by no meanes haue eſcaped the puniſhment of the King,but that both ſhe and all her family had miſerably periſhed:) She therfore required them,that at ſuch time as they ſhould bee Lords of the countrey of Chanaan,and had both the occaſion and power to requite her curteſies, that they would haue her in remembrance. This ſaide, ſhee diſmiſſed them (to the end they might returne home againe.) But before their departure ſhe tooke an oath of them, to warrantize both her ſelfe and all that which appertained vnto her, at ſuch time as they ſhould become maſters of the Citie, and had deſtroyed all the Citizens thereof, according to the arreſt and ſentence giuen againſt them; which ſhee knew ſhould come to paſſe, hauing certaine apprehenſion of the ſame, by certaine ſignes and tokens from God: whereupon for the preſent with many thankeſgiuings they proteſted, and for the future avowed and ſwore vnto her, to acknow-
D ledge her kindneſſe not in words, but in deedes. At ſuch time therefore as ſhee ſhould perceiue that the Citie was ready to bee ſurpriſed, they counſelled her that ſhee ſhould retyre all her ſubſtance, and all thoſe that appertained vnto her,into her houſe; and that before the doore thereof, ſhee ſhould ſpread ſome crimſen garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiuing the ſame, might inhibite the ſouldiours from pillaging and ſpoiling her houſe: For (ſaid they) wee will giue him notice herof(by reaſon of that willing forwardnes that hath bin in thee to ſaue our liues) and if by misfortune any of thy friends die in the combate, doe not impute the fault vnto vs; and wee beſeech God (by whom wee haue ſworne) that hee be not diſpleaſed againſt any of vs; except againſt ſuch as falſifie their oathes. Hauing after this manner accorded vpon the couenant, they let downe one another from the wall; and when they were arriued in ſafety among E their nation, they recounted vnto them all that which had happened ſince their arriuall in the Citie. Ioſuah hereupon declared vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt and the reſt of the Elders, what Ioſuah 3. oath his Spies had ſworne vnto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promiſe they had made. Ieſus paſſeth Iordan with his Armie. But the Generall was penſiue and ſore troubled,for that he knewe not which way he might paſſe the riuer of Iordan, by reaſon that for the preſent it was very deepe and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon; and if they would haue built one,the enemy would haue interrupted them: and further beſides that, there were not any places conuenient to ſtay in. But God made him a promiſe that hee would make the waters fall, and giue them paſſage there-through. Ioſuah therefore encamped his hoſte for the terme of two daies (to the end hee might paſſe ouer his whole Armie, and the reſt of the people, after this manner fol-F lowing.) The Prieſts marched before with the Arke. After them went the Leuites bearing the Tabernacle, and thoſe veſſells which were deſtinated for ſacrifice. Then followed the whole Ioſuah 4. multitude, diſtinguiſhed in their Tribes, hauing incloſed within their battells the women and children whereby they might bee the more ſecure from the force of the flood. But when as the Prieſts had marched formoſt, and found the riuer paſſable, and that the water was decreaſed,and that the current thereof was not ſo violent, neither the billowes ſo incenſed, but that in the bottome there was good footing (for that the grauell and ſand was not quicke but ſetled) then G all of them without feare paſſed ouer the foord, finding al things aſſuredly performed vnto them, which God had forepropheſied, and promiſed vnto them: but the Prieſts kept them in the midſt of the channell vntill the multitude were paſt ouer, and were in ſecuritie; and when as e-uery one had gotten the other banke, the Prieſts iſſued out, permitting the riuer to flow according to his free and ordinary courſe: which pleaſantly flowing grew to that greatneſſe and ſwift-neſſe which it retained at the firſt. Now when the Hebrewes had marched fiftie furlongs, they incamped themſelues ſome tenne furlongs from Iericho. But Ieſus builded an altar of ſtones (which euery one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Iordan, according as the Prophet had commanded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigious reſtrainment of the floud, and on the ſame he ſacrificed vnto God, and the ſolemnitie of the H Paſchal was celebrated in that place; and at that time they, who in times paſt were in great neceſſitie, were largely furniſhed with all plentie and aboundance: for they did reape the corne of the Canaanites (which at that time was ripe) and carried away the reſt for a prey. In the ſame ſeaſon likewiſe their nouriſhment of Manna failed them, wheron they had fed for the ſpace of 40. yeers.

And whereas the Iſraelites did all theſe things with ſecuritie and freely, and the Chanaanites neuer ſallied out againſt them, but appauled with feare, ſhut themſelues vp within their wals; Ieſus decreed & reſolued to beſiege them in their Cities: ſo that on the firſt day of the feaſt, the Prieſts bearing the Arke, and guarded on euery ſide with troups of armed men drew neere vnto the Ci-tie, ſounding their ſeuen hornes: and exhorting their ſouldiers to behaue themſelues manfully, they walked about and inuironed the wals round about, being attended both by the Senate and I Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their hornes, and ſo returned backe into their campe. Which when they had done for the ſpace of ſixe dayes, on the ſeauenth Ioſuah aſſembled the armie and all the people, bringing them ioyfull newes of the Citie, which that day ſhould be ſurpriſed without labour (the wals falling downe of their owne accord, and without mans hand, and yeelding them free paſſage and entrance into the Citie) and he encouraged them to kill all thoſe whom they met withall, and not to giue ouer the ſlaughter of their enemies, although they were wearie, neither to be mooued with compaſſion, nor allured from the ſlaughter and execution by deſire of prey, or to permit the enemie in any ſort to flie, but that they ſhould extinguiſh and roote out all that which breathed and had life, reſeruing nothing for prey or priuate profite.
He commanded likewiſe that all that which was found (either of golde or ſiluer) ſhould bee K brought into one place, & reſerued to be the firſt fruits of the happy works of God; and after the ſurpriſall firſt of the Citie, that onely Rahab with her kindred ſhould be ſaued, by reaſon of the othes which the ſpies had ſworn vnto her. This ſaid, he arranged his hoſt, & made them approch the City, then did they once more walke round about the City, the Arke marching before them, and encouraging the army to valour by the ſound of their Cornets. And after they had enuironed the walls ſeuen times, and had a little repoſed themſelues, the walles fell (wheras then neither the Hebrewes had enforced any engine againſt them, or vſed any other violence.) So that they entring into the City ſlue all thoſe that were therein, who were already diſcomforted by the ſo-daine and vnexpected ouerthrow of their walles, and thorow their ſodaine feare made vnapt to fight, ſo that they were ſlaine amidſt their ſtreets, finding neither refuge nor reliefe to ſuccour L them: yea ſo were they fleſhed in the ſlaughter, that they neither ſpared women nor children, but filled the City with dead carcaſſes, which at length being ſet on fire, ſerued them for a funerall flame to conſume them in, and with equall furie rauaged and burnt the fields. Only Rahab & her houſhold (who kept themſelues within her hoſtrie) were ſaued by the ſpies: who brought to Ioſuahs preſence, he gaue her thankes for ſauing his ſpies, and promiſed her that he would reward her courteſies, and anone after gaue her poſſeſſions, and euer after held her in great honour. All that of the City which the fire ſpared, the ſword conſumed. And Ioſuah pronounced curſes a-gainſt thoſe, who ſhould afterward endeuour to erect that which he had ruinated: namely that he that ſhould lay the firſt foundation, ſhould be depriued of his firſt begotten ſonne, and he that M ſhould finiſh the wo.ke might loſe his yongeſt ſonne; neither pleaſed it God that this impreca-tion of ſhould be fruſtrate, as hereafter it ſhall bee ſpoken. At the ſurpriſe and ſacke of this ci-tie, there was gathered an infinite quantitie of gold, ſiluer, and braſſe; ſo that no man brake the Edict, or ſought any prey or lucre thereby for himſelfe. Theſe ſpoiles Ieſus deliuered vnto the Prieſts, to be laid vp in the treaſurie, and after this manner was the Citie of Iericho deſtroied. But Achar the ſonne of Zebel of the tribe of Iuda, hauing gotten a royall pall altogether embrode-red with golde, with an ingot of gold of three hundreth ſicles in waight, and thinking in himſelfe that

Ieſus commandeth that none but Rahab and hers ſhould be ſaued.

The wals of Iericho fall downe of themſelues.

Iericho is taken, the men ſlaine, and the citie deſtroyed and burnt: Rahab and hers reſerued.

A that it were a very fond thing, that the profit he had made by the hazzard of his life, ſhould be taken from him and preſented vnto God, who had no neede thereof, digged a deepe pit in his tent, and buried his ſpoiles therein, thinking by this meanes to defraud God, and deceiue his companions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal (which ſignifieth Enfranchized, becauſe that hauing paſt the riuer Iordan they knew that they ſhould be deliuered from the affliction of Ægypt, and the penurie of the deſart.) But ſome few daies after the deſtruction of Iericho. Ioſuah ſent out three thouſand armed men againſt Ainan (a Citie ſituate a little aboue Iericho) who encountering with the Ainites in battell and by them put to flight, loſt thirty and ſixe of their company. The newes of which diſaſter beeing brought into the campe, the Iſraelites were ſeized with exceeding griefe, not onely for the men they had loſt (which were all of them valiant men and worthy of honour) but alſo by reaſon of the deſpaire they conceiued
B of their future ſucceſſe. For being already perſwaded that they were maſters of the field, and that their army ſhould be alwaies warranted and ſafe at ſuch time as they ſhould fight (according as before times God had promiſed them) they ſaw (contrary to their opinion) that their aduerſaries had taken heart; inſomuch as clothing themſelues in ſackcloth vpon their raiments, they ſpent all the day in teares & lamentations without taſting any meat; ſo grieuouſly were they afflicted with the inconuenient that had hapned. But Ioſuah perceiuing the army diſcomfited after this maner, and conceiuing ſome ſiniſter hope of their eſtates, boldly addreſſed himſelfe vnto God ſaying:
C We haue not beene induced by our own temerity to attempt the conqueſt of this land by force, but we haue beene hereunto incouraged by thy ſeruant Moſes, to whom thou haſt promiſed by diuers ſignes that thou wouldſt giue vs this country to inhabit in, and that our army ſhould haue alwaies the vpper hand in battell, and of theſe thy promiſes wee haue oftentimes experimented the euent. But now beyond all expectation (hauing receiued an ouerthrow and loſt ſome of our ſoldiers) being terrified by this accident, and ſuſpicious of thy promiſes to Moſes, we both abſtain from war, and (after ſo many enterpriſes and entrances of war) we cannot hope of any fortunate or ſucceſsfull proceedings. Be thou therfore aſſiſtant vnto vs, O Lord (for it lieth in thy power) & by thy mercy relieue our preſent ſorrow with a largeſſe of victory, & take from vs the thought
D of deſpaire wherein wee are too farre plunged. Ioſuah lying proſtrate on his face made this praier vnto God, who preſently anſwered him, that he ſhould ariſe; commanding him to purge the armie of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude, who was ſo hardy as to violate and conceale thoſe things which were conſecrated vnto him, aſſuring him that that cauſe was the meanes of the preſent calamitie: but that as ſoone as he had ſearched out, and puniſhed the ſacriledge, the Iſraelites ſhould become fortunate and obtaine the victorie. This Oracle Ioſuah declared vnto the people, and calling for the high Prieſt and the Magiſtrates, he caſt lots vpon the tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Iuda, it was againe caſt by kinreds; and when againe the ſacriledge was found to bee committed in Zacharias kinred, they examined the ſame once more man by man, and found out Achar: who hauing no meanes to deny the ſame, and being diſcouered by God himſelfe, confeſſed the fact, and brought forth thoſe things, which he had concealed: Whereupon being preſently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deſerued it. But Ioſuah hauing purified the people, led them foorth againſt Ainan, and laying an Ambuſcado by night
E time aboue the Citie, early in the morning hee drew the enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being incouraged by their former victory) but Ioſuah making a ſhew of retreat, drew them farther off from their Citie (forming in them an imaginarie hope that the Iſraelites fled, and that they ſhould gaine a ſecond victory ouer them.) But when Ioſuah ſodainly made a ſtand, and freſhly charged them, and gaue a ſignall vnto thoſe that lay in ambuſh, they were incontinently addreſſed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entred the gates of the Citie, on the walles whereof there ſtood diuers of the inhabitants, beeing eye-witneſſes (as they thought) of their atchieued victorie. In this manner was the Citie taken, and all they that were therein, were ſlaine: and Ioſuah on the other ſide inforced thoſe in ſuch manner (with whom he maintained skirmiſh) that they turned their backs, and fled towards the Citie, as if it had beene in F the ſame eſtate as they left it: but when they perceiued that it was ſurpriſed, and ſaw both it, their wiues, and children conſumed with fire, they ſcattered themſelues about the fieldes, not beeing able to rally themſelues, by reaſon of their diſturbance and diſorder. After this ouerthrow of the Ainites, there were a great number of women, children, and bondſlaues taken captiue, and ſtore of all ſorts of mooueables. The Hebrewes alſo became Lords of much cattell, and gathered a great quantitie of ſiluer (for the countrey was rich.) All which Ioſuah (vpon his returne to Galgal) offer treaties of peace to Iosuah, supposing they should find no tolerable conditions at his hands, because they knew that he warred vnder that resolution, vtterly to roote out and extinguish the nation of the Chanaanites from off the earth. They therefore made a league with the Cephe-

but that they dwelled far off from them; told Iosuah, that (being incited by his fame) they had vn-

of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principall and princes among them, and complai- K

were in, and how the enemie was prepared to assault them (and how to that intent they had pit- L such time as he intended his assault) and hauing put them to flight, he pursued them by a steepie

the speedy approch of the night the enemy should escape from the victor: whereupon it came to passe that Iesus tooke all those fiue Kings in a certaine caue neere Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to the death. And that the day at that time encreased aboue

A ter of men, and taken a rich bootie, hee brought backe his armie into Galgal. Now when the renowne of the Hebrewes valiant acts, and the admirable number of thoſe that were ſlaughtered, were bruited and ſcattered farre and neere amongſt the neighbour nations; they were ſurpriſed with a ſodaine feare: ſo that the Kings of the Chanaanites that bordered vpon Libanus, and they alſo of the plaine of Chanaan, ioyned themſelues confederates with the Paleſtines, and all of them were incenſed againſt them, and incamped neere vnto Berotha (a Citie of the higher Galilee, not farre from Cedeſa, which is alſo ſituate in the land of Chanaan.) The whole armie of them conſiſted of three hundreth thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſemen, and twenty thouſand charriots. This great multitude of the enemie aſtoniſhed Ioſuah, and the Iſraelites, and (by reaſon of the aſſured feare wherewith they were ſeiſed) they conceiued but little hope of B obtaining the vpper hand: but God reproched him, and vpbraided him of that his timiditie; and for that they ſuſpected themſelues to be ſcarcely ſecured vnder his protection, he promiſed them likewiſe that he would ouercome their enemies, and make their horſes vnprofitable, and would conſume their charriots by fire. Ioſuah therefore was emboldened by theſe promiſes from God, and marched out againſt his enemies, whom hee ſurpriſed on the fift day. The incounter was ſtrong, & the ſlaughter ſo great, that they who ſhould but heare the ſame would ſcarcely beleeue it: many alſo were ſlaine in the purſuite; ſo that (a few onely excepted) the whole army was put to the ſword. The Kings alſo were all of them ſlaine, and of their men there remained not any one aliue. Ioſuah alſo commanded that their horſes ſhould be ſlaine, and hee burned their charriots, and ſecurely marched thorow the whole countrey: ſo that no man durſt ſally out, or make
C head againſt him. He beſiedged likewiſe their ſtrong places, and killed all thoſe whom he might apprehend. Now when the fift yeere was fully finiſhed, and not any one of the Chanaanites were left aliue (except ſuch as were fled into their Cities and forts of defences) Ioſuah once more retired his campe toward the mountaines, and placed the ſacred tabernacle in the Citie of Siloe; which ſeemed to bee a very conuenient place, by reaſon of the beautie of the ſame, where the arke might remaine till ſuch time as their affaires of eſtate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence hee departed with all the people to repaire vnto Sichem, and there builded hee an Altar in that place (according as before time Moſes had commanded and enioyned) and hauing diuided his army, hee planted the halfe of them on the mountaine of Garizim, and the other halfe on the mountaine of Gebal (on which alſo there is an Altar) with the Leuites and the Prieſts:
D and after they had ſacrificed and done their execrations, and ingrauen them on the Altars, they returned into Siloe. Now inſomuch as Ioſuah was well ſtrooken in yeeres, and very well perceiued that the cities of the Chanaanits were hardly to be aſſaulted (both in reſpect of the places wherin they were ſituate, as alſo for the munitions, wherwith (beſides other aduantages of nature) their walles were ſtrengthned and fortified: for the Chanaanites hauing intelligence of the departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt, and how they haſtned thitherward, to the intent vtterly to extinguiſh and ouerthrow that nation, ſpent all that time in defencing and fortifying their Cities) hee aſſembled all the people in Siloe, where when (with mutuall and frequent concourſe) they were aſſembled, hee declared vnto them the happy ſucceſſe which (till that time) had befallen them, E and the braue executions worthy in their euents to challenge God for their author; furthermore the excellency of the ordinances vnder which they liued, alledging that the thirty one kings which had beene ſo hardy as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them beene ouercome: that all the army that had vndertaken to ouerthrow them in battell, was wholly diſcomfited, ſo that there remained not any memory of them. But for that certaine of the Cities were taken, and the reſt better defenced (and for this cauſe more obſtinate) had need of a longer aſſault and expugnation, hee thought good that they (who had beene drawne from out the countrey ſituate beyond Iordan to bee aſſociates in this common cauſe of conqueſt, and by reaſon of affinity had made themſelues copartners and companions in their perils) ſhould bee ſent backe into their owne countrey with all complement of thankes, and gratuitie. Afterwards, that ſome one of each tribe of approued vprightnes and loyaltie, ſhould be pickt out, who leuying out and ſuruay-
F ing the countrey, might faithfully and without fraud report the greatneſſe thereof. This ſentence was approued by the whole multitude, and thereupon diuers men were ſent (accompanied with ſuch as were skilfull in Geometry, who in reſpect of their ſcience could neither erre, nor be deceiued) to meaſure out the land, according to the goodnes thereof. For the nature of the land of Chanaan is ſuch, that there are great plaines very fruitfull, and which (beeing compared with other places) might be eſteemed happy and fruitfull in all ſorts of fruite: but if they be compared with the other countries of Iericho, and the land about Ieruſalem, they ſeeme to bee nothing worth.

Ioſuah 9.

Ioſuah diuideth the Region of Chanaan to the nine tribes and the halfe tribe of Manaſſes.

Then Ioſuah (taking vnto him Eleazar with the Elders, and Princes of the tribes) diuided the Region amongſt nine tribes, and the halfe part of the tribe of Manaſſes (hauing an vnpartiall reſpect of the greatneſſe of euery tribe) and when as each mans lot was caſt, there fell to Iudahs part all the higher Iudæa (which extendeth it ſelfe in length euen vnto Ieruſalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodome; to which likewiſe were annexed the cities of Aſcalon and Gaza.) The tribe of Simeon (which was the ſecond) obtained a part of Idumæa, confining vpon Ægypt and Arabia. The Beniamites had that countrey which extendeth from Iordan vnto the ſea in length, and in breadth vnto Ieruſalem and Bethel: and this portion was very ſmall (by reaſon that the countrey was good) for it contained the Cities of Iericho and Ieruſalem. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted his portion in length, from Iordan vnto Gadera; and in bredth from Bethel vnto the great plaine. The halfe tribe of the Manaſſites was valued from Iordan to the city of Dor in length and in breadth vnto Bethſan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Iſachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Iordan, for the limits and termes of his length, and the mountaine Itobir for the bounds of his bredth. The Zabulonites were allowed that countrey, which ſtretcheth out as farre as Genazereth, and that abutteth on the mountaine Carmel, and the ſea. The countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adiudged to the Aſſerites, in which portion was compriſed the Citie of Arce, which is alſo called Actipus. The Nephthalites poſſeſſed that quarter that ſtretcheth out from the Eaſt vnto the Citie of Damaſcus, and the lower Galilee as farre as the mountaine of Libanus, and the head of Iordan, that iſſueth from the ſame, on that ſide where are the borders of the Citie of Arce on the North ſide. To them of Dan was aſſigned the valley that is extended to the Weſtward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the countrey of Iamnia and Gitta, from Abaron euen vnto that mountaine where beginneth the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did Ieſus diuide the countrey of the ſixe nations (bearing the name of Chanaan) and gaue it in poſſeſſion to nine tribes and a halfe. For Ammorrhæa (ſo called by one of the ſonnes of Chanaan) had beene already taken by Moſes, and aſſigned by him to two tribes and a halfe, as I haue already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Aritheans were not compriſed in this diuiſion, neither was it tilled. But Ieſus (ſeeing himſelfe ouerburdened with yeeres, and vnfit to execute in his owne perſon thoſe counſels, which hee had concluded vpon; and foreſeeing that the Gouernours of the people which ſhould ſucceed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commanded euery ſeuerall tribe in particular, that (when they ſhould poſſeſſe the countrey thus diſtributed amongſt them) they ſhould not ſuffer any one of the race of the Chanaanites to liue. For Moſes had before time tolde and perſwaded them, that their ſecuritie and the maintenance of the cuſtomes of their forefathers conſiſted in that one point) which he had likewiſe learned by his owne experience. Further, that they ſhould deliuer vnto the Leuites thirty and eight Cities, becauſe they had already ten in their poſſeſſion, within the land of Amorrhea: three of which were ordained for cities of refuge to thoſe that fled: (for hee aduiſed them with all conſideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moſes had commanded them) of the tribe of Iuda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nepthali, Cedeſa: which is a place in higher Galilee. Moreouer he diſtributed vnto them the ſurpluſage of the prey which was very great: ſo that not onely in publike, but in priuate, they got no ſmall quantity of ſubſtance, for there was ſo much gold and rayment, and houſhold-ſtuffe, and ſo great ſtore of cattell and horſes, as the number may not bee comprehended. After which hee aſſembled the whole armie, and to thoſe that were planted on the other ſide of Iordan (who had borne armes with the reſt, and were in number no leſſe then fiftie thouſand) hee ſpake after this manner:

Since God (the father and maſter of our Hebrew nation) hath giuen this countrey into our poſſeſſion, and hath promiſed, that (at ſuch time as it ſhall bee conquered) hee will continue and conſerue the ſame in our poſſeſſion, and ſince likewiſe you haue willingly and forwardly aſſiſted vs in all our neceſſities and dangers (according to Gods command and direction) it

A is requisite at this present (since there remaines not any further matter wherein wee haue neede to imploy you) that we dismisse you, and abuse not your forwardnesse and readinesse any further, (by reason we are assured that if hereafter we shall haue neede of you, you will with no lesse endeauour and willingnes be as industrious to do vs kindnes. We therefore yeeld you hearty thanks for that you haue vouchsafed to be companions in our perils: and we require you, that you will persеuere in this your mutuall beneuolence, remembring you of your friends, and how you haue gotten your possessions by our helpe, as wee (by Gods fauour and your assistance) haue attained to this our present felicie. Neither haue you aduentured without some reward of your trauels: for in this your warfare you are inriched, and shal beare away with you a great prey both of gold and siluer: and besides all these, our beneuolence and loue, tied vnto you with all alacrity and rea-
B dinesse whensoeuer you shall haue cause to vse vs. For we haue neither forgot nor set light by Moses command before he departed out of this life, and haue spared no endeauour, whereby you might allie and tie our affections to you: wee therefore dismisse you to your owne possessions in complete fulnes of your delight, praying you to remember your selues onely of these things, that you will suppose that no terme can terminate our kinred: Neither (by reason of the entercourse of the riuer Iordan betwixt you and vs) suppose you vs to bee any others then Hebrewes. For all of vs (both those that dwell on this side, and on the other side of Iordan) are the posteritie of Abraham: and one and the same God hath brought to light both yours and our progenitors; whose lawes and religion (instituted by Moses) are diligently to be obserued: for by this meanes, hee will become our helper and fauourer; as on the contrary side (if we shall dege-
C nerate from his statutes) he will be an enemie against vs. After hee had spoken vnto them after this manner, he embraced in particular all those that were in dignitie, and in generall the whole people. This done, he stayed in that place, but the rest of the whole people conueyed them onward with teares, and they departed the one from the other with great griefe and remorse. But after that the tribe of Ruben and of Gad, and the rest of the Manassites had passed ouer Iordan, they builded an Altar vpon the banke of the riuer, that might serue for a memoriall to posteritie, and a token for the present of the coniunction, which they had with those that dwelt on the other side of Iordan. But when the tidings hereof came vnto their eares that dwelt on the further side of the riuer, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar, but notwithstanding were ignorant of the respect and cause they had in building it, they supposed that seeking to innouate
D their religion, they would introduce the seruice of forraine and false gods: and being rashly stirred vp with this suspicion of the violation of their religion, they put themselues in armes with this resolution, to reuenge themselues of those who had builded that Altar, and to take punishment of them for that they had forsaken the lawes and ordinances of their forefathers. For they supposed that they were not so farre to respect their parentage or dignitie (who were accused) as to forget the will of God, and that seruice which was agreeable in his sight: for which cause (being in this manner incensed) they prepared themselues to the expedition. But Iosuah and the high Priest Eleazar, with the rest of the Elders restrained them, counselling them first of all to sound their deliberation, and afterward (if it should be apparant vnto them that they did it vnder a sinister intent) at that time they might lawfully inuade them by the sword. Hereupon they
E sent Phinees the sonne of Eleazar, and ten other of the most noblest among the Hebrewes, as Embassadours vnto them, to know what the intent and reason was, why they had builded that Altar on the banke of Iordan.

You haue committed so hainous an offence (saith he) as there is no question either to reproue or punish the same hence forward in words: yet notwithstanding we haue not vpon the instant taken armes, neither assaulted you in battell, or had reference or regard to the hainousnesse of your crime, to the intent to punish you, but we haue beene sent to you as Embassadours (in consideration of our alliance) & for that (as we suppose) you may be drawn by good perswasions to the ac-F knowledgement and detestation of your misdeeds, to the end that when we are informed of the cause that hath induced you to erect this Altar, it might not be thought that we haue headlong thrust our selues into armes against you, if vnder an holy affection you haue builded the same: and if it appeareth otherwise, that the offence is iustly imputed and grounded against you, we may take reuenge of the same, according as reason requireth. For scarcely could we beleeue that you (who are inwardly grounded in the knowledge of God, and who are hearers of those lawes which he himselfe hath giuen you) should (since your departure from vs, and vpon your arriuall in

B How the Iſraelites after the death of their Emperour, forgetting the religion of their forefathers, fell into extreame calamities: and how through a ciuill warre raiſed amongſt them, there were onely 600. of the tribe of BENIAMIN left aliue.

BVT the Chanaanites (whoſe eſtate at that time was in ſufficient ſecurity) expected them with a great hoſt about the Citie of Bezeca, hauing their army conducted by the King of that place called Adoni-Bezec, which name ſignifieth Lord of the Bezecenites: (for, Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to ſay as Lord) now theſe men promiſed vnto themſelues the vpper hand, by reaſon that Ioſuah was deceaſed. Againſt theſe (of whom I haue foreſpoken) the two tribes fought very valiantly, and ſlaying tenne thouſand of them (whileſt they

In this plight they conducted him neere vnto Ieruſalem, where departing out of this life they buried him. Then ouerranne they the countty, ſacking and taking the Cities, and after they had diuers of them in their poſſeſſion they beſieged Ieruſalem, and entring the lower Citie thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the ſword. But the higher towne was very hard to be aſſaulted (by reaſon of the fortreſſes and ſtrength of the walles, and the naturall and ſtrong ſituation of the place) which was the cauſe that they leuied their campe to goe and beſiege Hebron, which they tooke, and ſlew all thoſe that were therein. In that time there were

D ſome remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in ſtature, and vnlike vnto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be ſeene as yet at this day, which for their hugeneſſe ſurpaſſe all credulity or conceit. This Citie was giuen in way of honour to the Leuites with two thouſand cubits of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the reſt of the countrey it was freely giuen to Caleb, according as Moſes had commanded it (this was one of thoſe ſpies which Moſes ſent to ouerlooke the land of Chanaan.) They gaue lands and poſſeſſions likewiſe to Iethro the Madianites poſterity (who was father in law to Moſes) for that they had forſaken their owne territories, and annexed themſelues to the Iſraelites, and had beene with them in the deſart. The tribe of Iuda and Simeon tooke thoſe Cities of the mountaynous countrey of Chanaan, and thoſe that were in the Plaine neere vnto the ſea coaſt (namely Aſcalon and Azoth.) But as touching Gaza and Accaron, they eſcaped: for theſe Cities being in the Plaine,

As touching the Beniamites to whom Ieruſalem appertained, they receiued the inhabitants thereof as their tributaries, ſo that all of them being in peace, and the one ceaſing from ſlaughter, and the other aſſured from danger, both of them imployed themſelues in manuring the countrey. The reſt of the tribes did the like, conforming themſelues according to the example of the Beniamites, and contenting themſelues to receiue their tributes, they ſuffred the Chanaanites to liue in peace. The tribe of Ephraim (beſieging the Citie of Bethel) could not ſee ſuch an ende of their deſſeigne, as the length of time and the trauels they had taken in the ſiege required: and

F although they were very much toyled and wearied with the ſame, yet deſiſted they not the continuance of the ſiege. At laſt they tooke one of the City (who iſſued forth to find out certaine neceſſary things that he wanted) whom they aſſured that if he would deliuer them the Citie, they would ſaue him, and grant life and libertie likewiſe to all them that were of his linage; who ſware vnto them that he would deliuer the Citie into their hand: which when he had performed, both he and his were wholly warranted; but all the reſt of the inhabitants were put to the ſword. ployed them in tillage of their lands, and husbanding their fruits : and being growne in riches they followed the delights and pleaſures of the world, yea in ſuch ſort grew they diſſolute, that they had no minde neither of their policy, nor the lawes of their forefathers. Whereupon God was grieuouſly incenſed againſt them, who gaue them to vnderſtand firſt of all, that contrary to his commaund they had ſpared the Chanaanites : and afterwards, that thoſe Chanaanites in time to come ſhould exerciſe great cruelties againſt them. And although they were aſtoniſhed at that which was declared vnto them, yet notwithſtanding they toke no pleaſure in feats of armes, both for that they had receiued many profits by the Chanaanits, as alſo for that (being effeminate thorow delights) they were vnapt for labour. It hapned them at ſuch time as their Ariſtocraticall gouernment was corrupted, and that they reſpected not their elders, or any other magiſtrates before time ordained, and were extreamly addicted vnto gaine, and infinitely tooke pleaſure therein; that amidſt their greateſt ſecurity, a grieuous mutiny and commotion was once more raiſed amongſt them, ſo that at length they fell at oddes one with another, on that occaſion which enſueth. Iudg. 19. The hiſtory of the Leuites wife.

A certaine Leuite and one of them of the common ſort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephraimites, tooke a wife that was borne in the Citie of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Iuda, whom (by reaſon of her incomparable beautie) he moſt intirely loued ; and found himſelfe much aggrieued, for that he found not her affection anſwerable to his loue : at laſt his paſſion ſo much preuailed with him, as they grewe at oddes, and fell into contentious miſlikes, whence at laſt it fell out that the woman (tired with diſquiet) forſooke her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband ſore aggrieued thereat (by reaſon of the loue which he bare her) came vnto her fathers houſe and appeaſed the differents, and was reconciled vnto her : There abode hee for the ſpace of foure dayes, being friendly intreated and intertained by his wiues father and mother. On the fift day, he thought good to returne to his owne dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reaſon that the father and the mother gaue them a loth farewell, and conſumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a ſeruant which followed them, and an aſſe likewiſe, on which the woman was mounted. Now when they had trauelled the ſpace of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew neere the Citie of Ieruſalem : their ſeruant counſelled them to take vp their lodging in ſome place, for feare leaſt by their late trauell they might fall into ſome diſaſter, the rather for that they were not farre from the enemies countrey, and that the preſent time was ſuch, as might make thoſe things that were moſt aſſured, ſuſpected. But this opinion of his pleaſed not his maſter, who would not lodge amongſt thoſe of a forraine nation (for the citie pertained to the Chanaanites) but his intent was to paſſe further, and trauell yet twenty furlongs more, to take vp his lodging in one of their cities. This aduiſe of his beeing allowed, they came to Gaba of the Tribe of Beniamin, when it was late : and whereas they found no man in the market place that might lodge them ; at length a certaine old man, returning out of the countrey to his houſe (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting with him, asked him what he was, and for what cauſe ſo late as it was hee ſought for his ſupper ? He anſwered, that he was a Leuite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, and was returning to his houſe, which was amongſt the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man hauing regard vnto parentage (by reaſon that he was of the ſame tribe, and that by good hap they had after that manner met the one with the other) lodged him in his owne houſe. But certaine yong men amongſt the Gabeonites, perceiuing the woman in that place, were rauiſhed in admiration of her beauty and good graces, and getting ſome notice afterwards that ſhee had beene brought thither as a gueſt, they ſet light by him (by reaſon of his weaknes and age, and the ſmall retinue that he had in his houſe) and came and knockt at his doore. The olde man required them to depart, and that they ſhould offer him no violence, nor to her, outrage. But contrariwiſe they importuned him to deliuer them his gueſt, and that done they promiſed him in no ſort to procure his further moleſtation. But although that the olde man alleadged that ſhee was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Leuite, and that they ſhould commit an hainous offence, in ſinning for their corrupt pleaſures ſake againſt the lawes : yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, menacing him likewiſe to murther him, becauſe he hindred them from ſatisfying their luſt. Finally, he was driuen to that exigent, that (to the intent they ſhould not offer violence to his gueſt, and a ſtranger) he abandoned and proſtituted vnto them his owne daughter, ſuppoſing it to be a leſſe inconuenient to let them ſatisfie their vnbridled concupiſcence on her, then that his gueſt ſhould ſuffer any villany ; at leaſtwiſe he made this account, that by this meanes he ſhould not be guilty of any iniury done vnto them. Notwithſtanding all this, they intermitted not to ſolicite and vrge the deliuery of the woman (being incenſed I K L M

Contrariwiſe he beſought them that they would not be ſo audacious as to violate the lawes: but they ſeconded their diſordinate deſires with extreme violence,and rauiſhed her perforce, and led her to their owne lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lewdly appeaſed their luſts on her) they thruſt her out of doores from them vpon the breake of day. But ſhe being wholly deſolate,and diſcomforted by this diſaſter,returned to her lodging, and both by reaſon of the agonie which ſhee had ſuffered, as alſo for the ſhame that hindered her from appearing before her husband, who would be incredibly and extreamly tormented with that accident,ſhe fell downe and gaue vp the Ghoſt. Her husband ſuppoſing that ſhee was onely ſeiſed with ſome ſound ſleepe (not ſuſpecting any other inconuenient) thought to awake her, with that deliberation to comfort her, becauſe ſhee had not wil-
B lingly condeſcended to their violences and luſts, but maugre her reſiſt was rauiſhed by them,and taken out of his lodging. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued that ſhe was dead, he moderated his affections, conſidering the extreamitie of his euils, and laying the dead body vpon his Aſſe,he carried it to his houſe; where he no ſooner arriued,but that he diuided and cut the ſame into twelue pieces, which he ſent to the twelue tribes of Iſrael; commanding them that bare the ſame to tell euery tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife,and that villany they had practiſed againſt her. The tribes were very much diſcontented at that which they both ſaw, and heard (hauing neuer before that time heard of any the like aduenture) and incenſed with extreame diſpleaſure(and yet iuſt) they aſſembled themſelues in Siloe: and being arranged be-
C fore the Arke, they reſolued ſodainly to take armes, and to aſſaile the Gabeonites as their capitall and mortall enemies. But the elders with-held them, declaring vnto them that they ought not after that manner enterpriſe a headlong warre againſt their brethren,before they had conferred and debated the cauſe with them, and examined the crimes whereof they were accuſed; the rather, for that the law permitteth not any warre(no not amongſt ſtrangers)before an enterparle and embaſſage,which might reclaim thoſe that were held culpable & reduce them to reaſon. For which cauſe they tolde them that they ſhould conforme themſelues,both according to the letter of the law, and the bond of brotherhood, to ſend certaine meſſengers to the Gabeonites to demand at their hands the authors of that villany, to the end that when they were deliuered, they might take their ſatisfaction by their puniſhment: but if they ſhould not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to aſſaile them with open warre. Hereupon they
D ſent certaine meſſengers to the Gabeonites to accuſe thoſe yong men that had perpetrated that indignity againſt the woman,to demand them at their hands,to the intent they might ſuffer condigne puniſhment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yeeld vp the yong men, ſuppoſing it to be an indignity for them for feare of war to be obedient to other mens commandements, by reaſon that they thought themſelues no waies inferiour vnto others in feates of warre, both in reſpect of their number, and the courage both in the one and the other. The reſt of the tribe alſo made great preparation, by reaſon they were all of them reſolued, & vnited together,mutually to defend thēſelues againſt whoſoeuer ſhould aſſaile them. After that the report of the Gabeonites anſwer was brought vnto the Iſraelites,they ſware an oth the one vnto the other,that none of them would giue their daughters in mariage to a Beniamite,
E promiſing each of them to iſſue and make war againſt them: againſt whom they were more incenſed,then our predeceſſors haue bin animated againſt the Chanaanites, as we haue bin giuen to vnderſtand. They ſpeedily therefore leuied and led into the field an army of 400000.men againſt them. The Beniamits hoſts conſiſted of 26000.armed men, and 600. others, 50. of which were expert in ſhooting, and fighting with the left hand. The field was fought neere to Gaba, wherein the Beniamites put the Iſraelites to flight,who were ſlaine to the number of 22000. and more of them had beene ſlaughtered that day, had not the night ſodainly ouertaken them and ended the skirmiſh. Thus did the Beniamites ioyfully returne vnto their Cities,and the Iſraelites were diſcomforted thorow their vnexpected calamitie. The next day they once more renewed the battell,and the Beniamites had the vpper hand once again: ſo that the Iſraelites loſt eighteene
F thouſand men more, and by that meane forſooke their campe thorow feare, & retired to Bethel, which was not farre off from the place. The day after they faſted, and beſought God (by the mediation of Phinees the high Prieſt) that it would pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath againſt them, and that contenting himſelfe with the two ouerthrowes which he had ſent them,he would now at laſt both giue them victory and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promiſed them by the prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they diuided their army into two parts,and laid the one thereof in ambuſh neere vnto the Citie. In the meane time (whileſt the other halfe that made head against the Beniamites retired themselues, to the intent their enemies should assault them) the Beniamites sodainly issued, and set vpon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (vnder purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemy insisted: so that all they likewise, who through age and weaknes were left in the City, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawne far enough from the City, the Hebrewes staied, made head, and fought against them. Then gaue they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who sodainly issuing out together, rushed in vpon their enemies with a huge crie. Who seeing themselues so sodainly surprised knew not what to doe, but retiring themselues into certaine Baricadoes, they defended themselues with arrowes, but all of them were slaine, except it were sixe hundreth: who making head, and closely filletted and embattelled together, thrust themselues desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this meanes escaped they into the mountaines hard by, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of twenty fiue thousand or thereabouts were slaine. And the Israelites burned Gaba vtterly, and slew both the women and children. They exercised no lesse iustice on the other cities of Beniamin (so much were they fleshed and transported with fury.) And for that Iabes (a Citie of Galaad) would not ioyne with them in battell against the Beniamites, they sent twelue thousand chosen men out of their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might beare armes, with their wiues and children, except foure hundreth virgins. So much griefe and fury had they conceiued through the accident that chanced to this woman, and the despight they had conceiued against the Beniamities for prouoking them vnto armes: which furie when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselues, reputing themselues to be depriued of one tribe: And although they thought them iustly oppressed in battell (by reason they had offended against the lawes of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalfe of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and reuoked those sixe hundreth that were fled, and held a certaine rocke in the desart which is called Rhoa. The Embassadours complained not onely for that the warre had extinguished them, but also for the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they preuailed so much, that they bare their crosse and losse with lesse griefe, and they came vnto them and besought them that they would not giue sentence of the totall extinction of the tribe of Beniamin. We grant you (said they) the reuenues of your whole tribe, and as much bootie as you may driue away. But they acknowledging their iniustice, and that they were condemned by the iust iudgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe, and the Israelites gaue them in marriage those foure hundreth virgins of Iabes: and for the rest (which were two hundreth) they deliberated with themselues how they might prouide them of wiues, to the intent they might haue issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their warre it was decreed by an oath, that none of them might match his daughter with any of the tribe of Beniamin; there were some of them that thought good that the oath might be suspensed withall (by reason it was grounded vpon wrath, and not on iudgement) alleadging further, that they should doe nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might saue a tribe which was in danger vtterly to be extinct: That periuries were dangerous and noysome, not at such time as they are inforced by constraint, but when they are practised with an intent to doe euill. But when as the Elders reclaimed here-against (abhorring the mention of periury) there arose vp a certaine man amongst them, that said he had a policie, whereby without breach of oath the Beniamites might light vpon wiues. And being commanded by the Senate to expresse the same, we haue a custome euery yeere (said he) to assemble and keepe a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we haue both our wiues and daughters: as many of these as they can rauish, let the Beniamites lay hold of, without reproofe (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by vs) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require reuenge, we will say that they are in the fault who haue negligently kept their daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Beniamites, for that we had too much already vsed and abused the same towards them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Beniamites to rauish and violently take to themselues wiues amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Beniamites (of whom we haue spoken (came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush neere vnto the Citie (amongst the vines and other thickets, and close places, in which they might hide themselues to surprise the Damsels.) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wantoned on their way: but the yong men breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (beeing scattered and diuided here and there) and after they had married them they departed home to labour their land, and began to studie anew

A anew how to recouer their former good hap. Thus the tribe of Beniamin (which was wel-nigh vtterly exterminated) was restored to his former dignity after this manner, by the wisedome of the Israelites: and it incontinently flourished and encreased in a little time, as well in number of men as in all other things. The like accident hapned to the Tribe of Dan, which fell into the like incombrance for this cause which ensueth. Hedio & Ruffinus, hap. 7. al. 4.

The Israelites about this time hauing forgotten the exercise of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Chanaanites (in contempt of that nation) raised forces, not for that they were affraide of their owne estates, but to the intent that ouerlopping the Hebrewes with some memorable ouerthrow, they might more securely inhabite their Cities thereafter: and conspiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and ioyning to B them certaine chariots) they drew Ascalon and Acharon (two cities within the lot of Iuda) into their confederacie, and diuers other Cities of the champaine countrey: so as they of Dan were driuen into the mountaines, hauing no place in the champaine where they might peaceably inhabite; who (for that neither in warre they were able to confront them, neither had sufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) sent fiue men of their tribe into the champaine countrey and Midland, to spie if they could finde any place that were fit and conuenient for them to establish and fixe their colonies in. These trauelled a daies iourney not farre from the mountaine of Libanus, and more lower then are the sources of Iordan, bordering vpon the great plaine of the citie of Sidon. In which place (hauing obserued that the land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made it knowne vnto their people, who trauelling thither with C their army, builded a citie in that place called Dan (by the name of the sonne of Iacob so called, and in honour of the tribe of Dan.) Many aduersities befell the Israelites from that time forwards, both for that they were vnexercised in trauell, and for that they contemned piety. For hauing once forsaken the obseruation of their ordinances, they suffered themselues to be deuoured in pleasures, liuing according to their owne appetites: so that they gorged and glutted themselues with those vices, which were most of all accustomed and vsuall amongst the Chanaanites. Iudg. 18. The tribe of Dan oppressed by the Chanaanites. FOR this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort, as (through their negligence) they lost the good which they had gotten by infinite trauell. For Schisart king of the Assyrians leuied an army against them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or composition, tooke diuers of them prisoners; and brought their city vnder his subiection. A Certaine man of the tribe of Iuda called Cenizus, a man of execution and of braue courage, was aduertised by a voice from heauen, that he should not permit the Israelites in that sort to be reduced into so extreame necessity, without taking care for them, but that he ought to aduenture himselfe to set them at liberty. For which cause, calling vnto him some few companions of his perils, who were discontented with their present estate, and desired a change, he first of all discomfited the garrison which Schisart had placed ouer them: and so much F was he furthered with his first successe, that the number of his followers increased more & more, so that they seemed sufficient to equall the enemy in open field: whereupon encountring him in one battaile, they ouercame him, and recouered their libertie; and the rest of the scattered and confused army retired themselues toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect giuen proofe of his valour, he receiued the gouernment at the peoples hands, and exercised the office of iudge fortie yeeres, at the end whereof he died. How the people were againe made ſubiect to the Moabites, and how by IODES they were exempt from ſeruitude.

The yeere of the world, 2526. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 1438.

AFTER whoſe death (the gouernment and ſeat being voide) the affaires of the Iſraelites began againe to fall to ruine, and the rather for that they neither yeeled due honour vnto God, neither obedience to the lawes: whence it came to paſſe, that Eglon king of the Moabites (ſeeing the diſorder of their policy) ſet them at nought, ſo that he waged war againſt them, and ouercame them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater forecaſt then any of his predeceſſors, he fought againſt them and weakned their forces, and conſtrained them to pay tribute.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Iudg. 3. Eglon king of the Moabites conquereth the Iſraelites.

This man (tranſlating his court to Iericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no meanes whereby he might vexe and moleſt the people: ſo that they liued for the ſpace of 18. yeeres in great miſerie. But God (being mooued with their calamities, and ſupplications) deliuered them from their intollerable thraldome after this manner. Iodes the ſonne of Gera of the tribe of Beniamin (a yong man, both addreſſed by valour of minde, and ſtrength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Iericho. This man inſinuated himſelfe into Eglons familiaritie, and by preſents and gifts entertained and courted him in ſuch ſort, as he was well beloued and eſteemed amongſt all thoſe courtiers that were neereſt about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certaine preſents vnto the king (attended by two of his houſhold ſeruants) he ſecretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at ſuch time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid-ſommer and mid-day likewiſe; whereby the watch was growne the more careleſſe and ſlothfull, partly by reaſon of the heate, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The yong man therefore offering his preſents vnto Eglon (who at that time diſported himſelfe in a certaine ſommer chamber) began to diſcourſe with him. Now they were both alone (by reaſon that the king reſoluing to talke familiarly with Iodes, had ſent away his guard, and ſate him downe in a ſeate:) but Iodes fearing, leaſt falling to ſtab home enough, he ſhould not giue him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to riſe, telling him that he had a dreame to report vnto him by the commandement of God. Whereat he reioycing very much, leapt from his ſeate; whereupon Iodes ſtabd him to the heart: and leauing the poynard ſticking in his wound, he eſcaped and locked the doore after him; the guard making no noiſe at all, ſuppoſing that the king had laid him downe to reſt. But Iodes giuing priuate notice hereof to them of Iericho, offered himſelfe to be their leader in the recouery of their former liberty: who (willingly accepting thereof) preſently tooke armes, & ſent trumpets to publiſh the ſame thorow the whole country: (for after that maner were they wont to aſſemble the people.) They that were about Eglon were wholly ignorant of that which hapned: but about the euen-tide (fearing leaſt ſome miſhap had befalne him) they entred into the place where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly aſtoniſhed, ſo as they knew not what to doe. For before they had aſſembled their forces together, the Iſraelites fiercely charged them, and ſome they killed inſtantly; the reſt that were ten thouſand in number, betooke themſelues to flie, vnder hope to recouer their countrey of Moab: but the Iſraelites (hauing before that, laide and fortified the paſſages of Iordan) purſued them and ſlew them: ſo that diuers of them periſhed in the Ferry, and not one of them remained that eſcaped their hands. By this meanes the Iſraelites were deliuered from the ſeruitude of the Moabites: and for this cauſe Iodes was aduanced to the gouernment of the people. Finally, after he had liued for the ſpace of foureſcore yeeres, he died. A man (beſides the act of late rehearſed) worthy of praiſe in all other things. How the Iſraelites were brought vnder the ſubiection of the Chanaanites, and ranſommed from ſeruitude by BARAC.

Hedio & Ruffinus. c. 9. Iudg. 4. Iabin king of the Chanaanites, ſubdueth the Iſraelites.

BVT the Iſraelites (in no ſort reclaimed or reconciled by their forepaſſed calamities) fell againe into their former impietie and diſobedience: and before they had ſufficiently ſhaken off the ſeruitude of the Moabites, were ſubiected vnto Iabin king of the Chanaanites. This man kept his reſidence imperiall at Aſor (a Citie ſituate on the lake of Sachonites) he

A he had in pay thirty thouſand foote, and ten thouſand horſe: and beſides theſe, hee had three thouſand warlike Charriots. Ouer all this huge army commanded Siſares (an eſpeciall man amongſt the kings fauourites) who encountring with the Iſraelites, brought their affaires into ſo deſperate an eſtate, that they willingly (for their owne ſecuritie ſake) accepted ſeruitude, and paied tribute (whereunto they were inforced through the auſteritie of their ſubiection, almoſt for the ſpace of twenty yeares, not daring to lift vp their heads) all which fell vpon them by the will of God, to the end he might puniſh the too great contumacy and ingratitude of that nation. Who at length repenting themſelues, and acknowledging the cauſe of their calamities (namely that it proceeded from the contempt of their lawes) they repaired to a certaine Propheteſſe called Debora (which name in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth a Bee) beſeeching her that by her prayers ſhe would endeuour to prouoke God vnto mercy (to the intent hee ſhould not ſuffer

B them ſo to be oppreſſed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (beeing inclined to take compaſſion on them granted them helpe, and appointed Barac to bee their gouernour (a man of the tribe of Nepthali, whoſe name ſignifieth lightning. Debora therefore ſending for Barac commandeth him to picke out, and muſter ten thouſand choſen men, and leade them foorth againſt the enemy: alleadging that they were ſufficient to obtaine the victory which God had promiſed by the Oracle. But Barac denying to vndertake the gouernment, except ſhee alſo would adminiſter the ſame with him, ſhe mooued therewith, ſpake thus: Wilt thou (ſaid ſhe) ſurrender the "
dignity which God hath giuen thee, to a woman? well I will not refuſe it. Whereupon leuying " tenne thouſand men, they pitched their tents neere to the mountaine of Itabyr. Siſara at that time (according as the king had commanded him) preſently marched out to meete them, and

C encamped himſelfe not farre from the enemy. But Barac and the reſt of the Iſraelites (beeing terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Debora, who commanded them that very day to enter and vndertake the battell, aſſuring them that the victorie ſhould be theirs, and that God would both aſſiſt and helpe them: whereupon they charged the enemy, and there ſodainly fell a ſtorme of raine mixed with haile, which the winde droue againſt the faces of the Chanaanites, and tooke away their ſight, making thoſe that carried dartes, and ſuch as ſerued with the ſling, vnprofitable in their ſeruice; the Targetiers likewiſe hauing their hands benummed with colde, could ſcarcely wield their ſwords. But the tempeſt beating on the backes of the Iſraelites, not onely wrought them leſſe offence, but made them alſo more forward (being whetted therunto by the manifeſt ſigne of Gods fauour and preſence.) Whereupon diſarraying and

D breaking thorow their enemies battell, they made a great ſlaughter of them, ſo as part of them fell by the weapons of the Iſraelites: the reſt were ouerrunne by their owne horſemen and chariots. Siſara alſo as ſoone as he ſaw his ſouldiers turne their backes leaping from his charriot, fled away haſtily, till at laſt he arriued in the tent of a woman of Cenetis called Iael, who being deſired by him to conceale and hide him, entertained him: and whereas he required drinke ſhe gaue him ſowre milke, which when he had ouergreedily drunke, he fell aſleepe: and whileſt he ſo lay buried in his ſlumbers, Iael tooke a mallet and droue an yron nayle thorow his temples, and faſtned him to the pauement: and anon after, when Baracs ſouldiers came vnto her, ſhe ſhewed him vnto them, in ſuch manner as he was nailed. And thus a woman according as Debora had foretolde was the author of this victory. But Barac leauing his army to Aſor, ſlew Iabin that came out a-

How GEDEON deliuered the Iſraelites.

God cõmandeth Gedeon to deliuer the Iſraelits from the Madianits. Iudg. 7.

ABOVT that time,Gedeon(the ſonne of Iaſus, one of the chiefeſt of the tribe of Manaſſes) ground certaine ſheaues of corne,which he had ſecretly conueied into his preſſe: for hee durſt not bring them openly, for feare the enemy ſhould haue eſpied him. To him appeared there a viſion in the forme of a young man, which ſaid vnto him,that hee was happy and beloued of God: and that a certaine ſigne of his good happe ſhould bee, that hee ſhould vſe his preſſe in ſteed of his grange; willing him to be of good courage, and to endeuour himſelfe to recouer his countries libertie. Gedeon anſwered, that it was impoſſible, by reaſon that the tribe whereof hee was deſcended, had very few men in it; and that hee was too young and feeble to thinke on affaires of ſo great conſequence: but God promiſed him to ſupply his neceſſities in whatſoeuer he held himſelfe deficient; and aſſured him(vnder his conduct)that hee would giue the Iſraelites the victorie. Theſe things Gedeon communicated with certaine young men, who willingly beleeuing the Oracle,anſwered, that for the preſent they had ten thouſand ſouldiers in a readineſſe, moſt ready to attempt any thing in regard of their libertie. But God appeared to Gedeon in a dreame,and tolde him that men naturally were louers of themſelues, and haters of thoſe who were excellent in vertues: ſo that if there grow any queſtion of victorie, they forget God,and appropriate the ſame vnto themſelues, ſaying; that they are many, and all valiant men at armes. To the end therefore that they may conceiue his handie worke in their deliuerance, hee counſelled him that about the mid-time of the day, at ſuch time as the heate was moſt vehement, hee ſhould conduct his armie to the riuer; and that beeing there; hee ſhould diligently obſerue thoſe that bowed themſelues to drinke, which hee might eſteeme for men of valour: but all thoſe that dranke haſtily and with noiſe, ſhould bee marked as men fearefull and affraide of the enemie. Gedeon did according as God had commaunded him, and there were found three hundreth men that lifted water to their mouthes with their hands, with feare and trouble: God willed him that he ſhould aſſaile the enemy with thoſe three hundred, promiſing that hee would giue him the victorie. About this time were they incamped vpon the banke of Iordan, ready to paſſe the foord the next morrow. But Gedeon was ſore troubled, by reaſon that God had before times tolde him that he ſhould aſſaile the enemy by night: but God willing to deliuer him of his feare, commanded him to take one of his ſouldiers with him, and enter the campe of the Madianites, aſſuring him that he ſhould be both aduiſed and encouraged by themſelues: whereunto hee obeyed, and for his better aſſurance, hee tooke with him one of his ſeruants. Now as hee drew nie a certaine tent, hee perceiued that they that were within the ſame were awake,and that one of them with a loud voice,tolde his companion the dreame which that night he had had; which Gedeon ouer-heard,and thus it was. Him ſeemed that hee ſaw a barly cake(ſo loathſome as no man would feed vpon the ſame)which rowled thorow the camp,which firſt ouerthrew the kings tent,& afterwards the tents of all his ſoldiers: alleadging that this viſion ſignified the loſſe of the whole army. Annexing to this his allegation the reaſons that induced him thereunto; namely that of all ſorts of corne,barley is moſt contemptible; and amongſt all the nations of Aſia, there were not this day any people to bee found more diſgraced and contemned then the Iſraelites,and that in this reſpect they reſembled barley. That which at this day ſeemeth to encourage them is Gedeon,and the army that is with him:and whereas this cake turned to ouerthrow our tents, I feare me leaſt God hath giuen ſome ſigne of victorie vnto Gedeon. Gedeon(hauing ouerheard all theſe things) conceiued good hope, and tempted with a valiant heart,and preſently commanded his domeſticall ſeruants to arme themſelues, diſcourſing vnto them the viſion which appeared to their enemy: whereupon they ſpeedily prepared themſelues at his commaundement, ruminating and hammering in their mindes vpon that diſcourſe which hee had declared vnto them. About the latter watch of the night, Gedeon led foorth his army,and diuided them into three bands, and in euery band he put a hundreth men: all of theſe bare in their hands empty pots, in which were hidden burning torches, in ſuch ſort as the enemy might not diſcouer them when they ſallied out: Moreouer they bare rams hornes in their right hands,which they vſed in ſtead of trumpets. The aduerſe army tooke vp much ground(by reaſon H I K L M

The Hebrewes hauing had inſtructions from their captaine what they ought to doe, at ſuch time as they approched neere vnto their enemies, and the ſigne of the battell was giuen, they ſounded their hornes, and brake their pots, and with their flaming lights brake into the enemies campe; crying victorie, victorie, by the aſſiſtance of God, and the ſtrength of Gedeon. Hereupon ſuch a trouble and feare ſurpriſed the enemy, as they lay aſleepe (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue) that few of them fell by the Hebrews ſword, but they themſelues ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in language.) For confuſedly encountring one another, they maſſacred all thoſe that encountred B them, ſuppoſing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this ſlaughter, and Gedeons victorie came vnto the eares of the reſt of the Iſraelites, they armed themſelues, and purſued and ouertooke the enemie (being intangled and circumuented in certaine places made vnpaſſable thorow many running brookes) ſo that being inuironed on euery ſide, they were all of them put to the ſword, amongſt which were their two kings Oreb and Zeb. The reſt of the chieftaines trouping onward with their ſouldiers to the number of eighteene thouſand or thereabouts, encamped not farre from the Iſraelites: But Gedeon was no waies aſtoniſhed hereat, but purſuing them valiantly with his whole armie, and charging them deſperately, he diſcomfited all the reſt of the enemies, and led away captiues thoſe chieftaines which remained, namely, Zeeb and Ezarbon. There died in this battell of the Madianites and Arabians their allies to the number almoſt of ſixeſcore C thouſand: beſides that the Hebrewes tooke an ineſtimable prey of gold, ſiluer, apparell, Camels and other horſes. But Gedeon returning into his countrey, Ephraim ſlue the reſt of the kings of the Madianites: neuertheleſſe the tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with his happy execution, reſolued to make warre againſt him, accuſing him for that he had not made them priuy of his ſtratageme intended againſt the enemy. But Gedeon being a temperate man, and endowed with all kinde of vertue, gaue them this modeſt anſwer, that it was not he that by his owne direction had ſet vpon the enemie, but that it was Gods onely handie worke: notwithſtanding that the victorie was no leſſe theirs, then his or thoſe his followers that atchieued the enterpriſe. And with theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he no leſſe profited the Hebrewes thereby, then by his valiant actions, by reaſon that he deliuered them from a ciuill warre, whereinto they had D fallen, if his diſcretion had not preuented it. This tribe was puniſhed for this outrage offered to ſo noble a perſonage, as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon labouring to diſmiſſe himſelfe of the gouernment, was forced to continue the ſame, and ruled the Iſraelites for the ſpace of fortie yeeres, doing iuſtice to euery one that required the ſame at his hands, and deciding their controuerſies (ſo irreuocable and certaine was that eſteemed which he had decreed.) Finally he died when he was very old, and was buried in the countrey of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

E

GEDEON had ſeuenty lawfull ſons begotten on diuers lawfull wiues: he had likewiſe one baſtard by his concubine Druma, which he called Abimelech, who after the deceaſe of his father, retired himſelfe to Sichem (where his mother was borne) there (aſſiſted with money by his mothers kinred, and backed by them who were men reſolute and addreſſed to all facinorous actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlew al his brethren (except Iothan, who by good hap ſaued himſelfe by flight) now when as Abimelech had once obtained the tyranny, he ruled all things according to his luſt, and neglected the ordinances and preſcript of law, hating all thoſe that in any ſort were maintainers of equity. One day therfore whileſt there was a ſolemne feaſt held at Sichem (whereunto the whole people were vſually wont to reſort) Iothan F his brother (who as we ſaid, ſaued himſelfe by flight) climing the mountaine of Garizim, which ouerhangeth the Citie of Sichem, with a loud voice (which might eaſily be ouerheard by the people, and in a generall ſilence of the whole multitude) hee beſought them that they would heare him in a few words, and when as they intentiuely liſtned with a greater and more reuerend ſilence; hee told them in times paſt the trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeake after the manner of men, and that (in a certaine aſſembly wherein they were to conſult of their gouernment) they beſought the fig-tree to accept the ſoueraigntie ouer them, which when ſhe refuſed, and

and pleaded in his own behalfe that he was contented with that honour which he reaped by the meanes of the fruit which he bare, & sought not further. The trees surceased not to seeke an other prince, resoluing with themselues to ascribe that honour to the Vine, which in as many words as the Fig-tree refused the same, and no lesse did the Oliue tree: At last they preferred their humble protestation of election to the great Bramble (whose wood is good for firing) hee answered if » you doe vnfainedly require me for your king, repose your selues vnder my shadow; but if you in- » tend treasons against me, there shall a fire issue from me and consume you. These things, said Iothan, I report vnto you not to mooue you to laughter, but for that you) hauing receiued many » benefits at the hands of Gedeon) suffer Abimelech, who in spirit differeth nothing from the fire, to » vsurpe the Princedome after the slaughter of my brethren. When he had spoken after this manner hee departed, and for three yeares space liued hidden amongst the mountaines, flying the power of Abimelech. Neither did there many daies ouerpasse, but that the Sichemites (beeing moued with compassion and iust reuenge in respect of the murther which was committed vpon the sonnes of Gedeon) banished Abimelech out of their Citie, and the whole tribe. Whereupon he resolued to do some mischiefe to both the Citie & Citizens: and for that their vintage was at hand, & they durst not gather the fruit, fearing least they should receiue some iniury at the hands of Abimelech. By good happe about that time a certaine Prince called Gaal retired thither with a troupe of souldiers and his kinred: him did the Sichemites beseech that he would grant them a conuoy, whilest they had gathered in their haruest: which request of theirs beeing accepted by Gaal; they issued out with their forces, being seconded by him and his, and securely brought in their fruits, and feasting one with another in companies, they were so bold as to scoffe at Abimelech, and the chiefest of his followers: and the chiefest of those strangers among them that came into their city to their assistance, surprised by Ambuscado diuers of Abimelechs people and slew them. But Zebel one of the Sichemites and Abimelechs host signified vnto him by a messenger, how Gaal incited the people against him, inuiting him to lye in wait for him neere about the Citie, promising him that he would bring Gaal thither, to the end that hee might easily reuenge him of that iniurie which his enemy had offered him. Which done, hee promised to worke so wisely that he would reconcile him to the peoples fauour againe: & when as Abimelech had chosen a place fit to lie in ambush, and Gaal with Zebel too carelesly liued and walked in the suburbes, at length he sodainly espying certaine armed men, cried out to Zebel, that he had discouered the enemie, whereunto Zebel replied that they were the shadow of rockes: but Gaal drawing more neere vnto them and perceiuing apparantly who they were, answered Zebel, that they were no shadowes, but ambushes of men. Whereunto Zebel replied, Doest thou not obiect cowardise to Abimelech, why therefore shewest thou not thy great valour in fighting with him? Gaal confusedly amazed, assailed the souldiers of Abimelech, in which conflict certaine of his followers were slaine, and he himselfe fled into the Citie (giuing example vnto the rest to follow him.) Hereupon Zebel laboured that Gaal might be expulsed out of the Citie, accusing him of his cowardly encountry with the souldiers of Abimelech. Now when as the same Abimelech had afterwards gotten certen intelligence, that the Sichemites would issue anew to gather their vintage, he laid an ambush neere vnto the Citie. And no sooner were they issued, but that the third part of his troopes surprised and seised the gates to cut them off from their returne, that thought to reenter; the rest ranne after those that were scattered here and there: so that there was a great slaughter on euery side, and the Citie was ruinated euen vnto the very foundations (for they could not withstand the siege) and they sowed salt vpon the ruines thereof. Thus perished all they that were in the Citie of Sichem. But they that escaped thorow the countrey, and had auoided the danger, assembled and fortified themselues vpon a strong rocke, and there incamped and began to defence the same. But as soone as Abimelech had notice of their intention, he hasted thither with his forces, and inuironed the place with fagots of drie wood (carrying them thither in his owne person, and encouraging thereby those of his armie to doe the like) so that the rocke was incontinently compassed with wood. Whereunto he set fire round about, and in an instant it flamed and burned vehemently, so as none of them were saued, but all of them perished with their wiues and children, to the number of fifteene hundred men, besides many other of the weaker sort. This calamitie hapned to the Sichemites (in so grieuous a measure that there is not any griefe sufficient to deplore it) were it not that that so horrible misfortune fel vpon them, by reason of their ingratitude they had shewed to so vpright a iudge, and so gracious a benefactor. Abimelech alaid the courage of the Israelites by this encounter and conquest of the Sichemites, and gaue sufficient testimonie that he aspired more higher, and that he would neuer

A terminate his violence vntill he had vtterly extinguiſhed them. He therefore led foorth his army againſt the Tibeans and their Citie, which he tooke: but in that towne there was a great tower, whither all the people had retired themſelues, and whileſt he prepared himſelfe to beſiege the ſame, and approched likewiſe neere vnto the gates, a certaine woman caſt a peece of a milſtone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cauſe that Abimelech called at that time for his ſquier, commanding him to diſpatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that hee died by the hands of a woman. His ſquier did according as hee had commanded him, and reuenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the cruelty he had committed againſt his brethren, and the tyranny executed vpon the Sichemites; on whom all theſe misfortunes fell according as Iothan had foretold them. As ſoone as Abimelech was ſlaine, all the armie was diſperſed,
B and euery one returned vnto his dwelling place: and Iair the Galeadite of the tribe of Manaſſes tooke vpon him the gouernment. Amongſt other conditions of this man, theſe were of the greateſt note, that he was rich, and had thirty worthy ſonnes, all expert vpon horſe backe, and exerciſed the magiſtracie in the countrey of Galaad: hee (after hee had gouerned the people for the ſpace of twenty yeares) died, when he was very olde, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a Citie of Galaad. From this time forward the policy and eſtate of the Hebrewes grew more and more diſordered, and the lawes began to be neglected: Whence it came to paſſe that the Ammonites and Philiſtines (ſetting light by them) deſtroyed all their countrey with a great army, during which time they occupied all the land on this ſide Iordan, and ſo much were they heartned, as that they preſſed further, and poſſeſſed the better part on the other ſide of the riuer,
C and conquered the ſame. Wherupon the Hebrewes being brought to more moderation by theſe their aduerſities, had their recourſe vnto God by prayers and ſacrifices, requiring him that it might pleaſe him to moderate his wrath, and that hauing regard and reſpect to their ſupplication, he would be pleaſed to ſtay his heauy hand ouer them. This ſubmiſſion of theirs preuailed with God, who inclined himſelfe to aſſiſt them. Whileſt therefore the Ammonites led their armie into Galaad, they of the countrey aroſe to meete and fight with them, beeing diſfurniſhed of a gouernour to conduct them. Now there was a certaine man called Ieptha, of great eſtimation, as well for the vertue of his anceſtors, as his owne particular valour (the rather for that he had beene trained and maintained in warlike ſeruice.) To him they ſent a meſſenger, requiring him that he would aſſiſt them; promiſing him, that he ſhould continue in the gouernment during D the terme of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their requeſt, but reprochfully obiected againſt them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reaſon he was not their brother by the ſame mother, but a ſtranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his paramour, they had driuen him out of their family, ſetting light by him, by reaſon of his baſe birth) yet notwithſtanding he had liued in Galaad, receiuing all thoſe into wages which came vnto him, of what place ſoeuer they were. But after they had beſought him, and ſworne vnto him that he ſhould continue in the gouernment, hee became their generall in warre, and ſpeedily (prouiding and foreſeeing whatſoeuer was neceſſary, he encamped himſelfe neere vnto Maſpha, and ſent Embaſſadours to the Am-
E monites, accuſing them for inuading a countrey that belonged not vnto them. They contrariwiſe blamed the Iſraelites, for that they were fled like fugitiues from Ægypt, and commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their ancient patrimony.) Ieptha anſwered that they had no reaſon to accuſe their anceſtors, in reſpect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to giue them thanks, for that they had permitted them to enioy the countrey of Ammon, by reaſon it was in Moſes power to haue commanded the ſame. In a word, they were reſolued not to forſake the countrey which God had both giuen and purchaſed for them, and which they had held in their poſſeſſion for the ſpace of three hundred yeares, alledging that hee would defend the ſame againſt them by dint of ſword: with theſe words diſmiſſed he the Embaſſadours of the Ammonites. Then beſought he God that it might pleaſe him to grant him victo-
F ry: and he made a vow that if hee returned vnto his houſe whole and in ſafetie, hee would offer vp in ſacrifice, that of his which he ſhould firſt meete withall in his returne: whereupon encountring the enemie he defeated him, and purſued him, killing thoſe that fled continually till he came to the Citie of Maniathen. Then entring the countrey of the Ammonites; hee deſtroyed diuers Cities, and led away a great prey, and deliuered and ranſomed diuers ſlaues of that nation, who had endured that ſeruitude for the ſpace of eighteene yeares. But as he returned homeward, hee fell into ſuch an inconuenient, as was no waies anſwerable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eighteene yeares) came out to meete him: whereupon reſoluing and melting himselfe into teares, he began to check her for that so hastily she had issued forth to meet him, by reason he had consecrated the first thing he met withal to God. But this accident was no waies displeasant vnto the Damsel, but that she willingly died, both for the victorie of her father, and the deliuerance of her brethren: shee therefore besought her father that it would please him to grant her two moneths before she should be sacrificed, to the end she might lament her youth with her companions: and that after that terme, her father might acquit himselfe of that vowe which he had made. Ieptha granted her the terme and time she had limited, which being expired, he sacrificed his daughter for a burnt offering: which oblation of his was neither conformable to the law, nor agreeable vnto God (by reason he examined not in his vnderstanding before he committed the act, how it would be taken by those that should heare the report thereof.)

Iептha sacrificeth his daughter.

The tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would haue sent out men of warre against him (by reason he had not communicated his enterprise against the Ammonites with them, but had onely reserued the prey, and vsurped the honour of the execution to himselfe) whereunto he answered first of all, that being of his kinred, they could not be ignorant that both hee and his were assailed by warre; and had besides that also beene required to giue them their assistance, whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Secondly, he told them that that which they vndertooke was both vnlawfull and most wicked, in that not daring to confront or assaile the enemie, they made no bones to set vpon and assault their owne brothers and familiars, threatning them that if they gouerned not themselues, he would (by the assistance of God) be reuenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected & despised, so that he was forced to arme himselfe against them, and with an host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preuenting their passage who fled vnto Iordan: and the number of those that were slaine amounted to forty thousand or thereabouts. But after that Iephta had gouerned sixe yeeres he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was borne, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his decease, Apsan tooke vpon him the gouernment. He was of the tribe of Iuda, of the citie of Bethleem, and had sixtie children, thirty males and thirty females, which he left all aliue and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy either recitall or memory, during the space of his seuen yeares gouernment: he was buried in his country. Elon a Zabulonite his successor differed nothing from him in the same, and during the terme of ten yeeres wherein he gouerned, he atchieued nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the sonne of Elon (of the tribe of Ephraim of the Citie of Pharathon) was declared soueraigne Iudge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicity in his children (by reason that the estate was in peace and security, and that hee exploited nothing worthy glory) hee had fortie sonnes, who had thirty other children, and he rode accompanied with these seuentie, who were all of them expert on horseback. Hee left them all aliue, and died when he was very old, and was magnifically buried in Pharathon.

Of SAMPSONS valour, and how many mischiefes he did vnto the Philistines.

The Israelites are ouercome by the Palestines. Hedio & Rufinus. chap. 13. al. 10.

AFTER his death, the Philistines had the vpper hand ouer the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of forty yeares. From that misery were they ransomed after this manner: Manoach an excellent man, and one of the chiefest of the tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely esteemed Prince amongst them had a wife most famous for her beautie, and excellent amongst all other of that time; yet had hee no children by her; whereat he was very sore displeased: and for this cause hee made his continuall prayers vnto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farme) beseeching him that it might please his maiesty, to grant him some lawfull heire and successour (now the place whither they resorted was situate in a broad Plaine.) Furthermore he loued his wife so exceedingly, that hee almost doted on her, and for this occasion he was extreamely iealous of her. Whilest thus the woman liued solitarily by her selfe, an angell of God appeared vnto her in a vision, promising her a goodly, faire and puissant sonne, who denounced vnto her the pleasant message of the birth of her child, which God by his prouidence would bestow vpon her, who should be goodly and admirable in his forces, and vnder whom also (as soone as hee should attaine to mans estate) the Philistines should endure many ouerthrowes: exhorting her not to cut his haire, commanding likewise

A likewiſe that he ſhould taſte no other drink but water (becauſe that God had ſo commanded it:) and after he had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he departed according to the pleaſure of God. As ſoone as her husband returned home againe, ſhe told him all that which the Angell had ſaid vnto her, who was amazed at the beauty and greatneſſe of the yong meſſenger, who appeared vnto her after ſo ſtrange a manner, as Manoach was almoſt ſpent with iealouſie and ſuſpicion (which ſuch a paſſion is woont to engender.) But ſhee deſirous to mittigate his diſcontent, and that diſtruſt which he had vainely and vnaduiſedly conceiued; Beſought God that it might pleaſe him once more to ſend his Angell vnto her, to the intent that her husband might ſee him. Whileſt therefore they liued in this ſort out of towne, the Angell preſented himſelfe againe (through the grace of God) and appeared vnto the woman (being apart from her husband.) But ſhe beſought him to abide vntill ſuch time as ſhe had called her husband: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe went B and fetcht Manoach, who notwithſtanding was not deliuered of his ſuſpicion: but required him that he would againe relate vnto him all that which he had ſignified to his wife. The Angell anſwered him, that it ſufficed that ſhe onely knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his ſonne ſhould bee borne, hee might both giue him preſents, and preſent him thankes. The Angell anſwered, that he had no neede thereof, by reaſon that he had not brought the good newes of the birth of his ſonne for any neceſſity that he had: Manoach beſought him to ſtay and receiue ſome token of kindneſſe: but he would not conſent. Finally, being inſtantly preſſed to abide and receiue ſome gift: Manoach killed a kid, and commanded his wife to roſte the ſame. And when as all things were in readineſſe, the Angell commanded them to lay the bread and fleſh vpon a rocke without diſhes: which being done, he touched the fleſh with a wand C which he bare in his hand, and ſodainly a flaming fire conſumed both the bread, and fleſh; and the Angell was ſeene to aſcend vp into heauen in the ſmoake as it were in a chariot. Manoach was affraid leaſt ſome inconuenient ſhould happen vnto him, by reaſon that they had in that ſort ſeene God: but his wife recomforted him, by reaſon that God had appeared vnto them for their profit ſake. Anon after ſhe became big with childe, and obſerued all that which had beene commanded her, and when the infant was borne ſhe called his name Sampſon (which is as much to ſay, as ſtrong) who preſently endowed with an excellent beauty both of mind and body, vſing his haire vnſhorne, and ſobriety in his diet, he ſeemed to make ſhew in himſelfe of ſome propheticall and more then humane forwardneſſe.

It hapned on a day that there was a ſolemnity celebrated in Thamna a Citie of the Phili- D ſtines, whither Sampſon reſorted with his father and mother, and was ſurpriſed with the loue of one of the damſels of that place, requiring his father and mother that this maiden might be giuen him in marriage: which they refuſed to doe, alleadging that ſhe was not of the ſame linage that he was of, and that God would prouide him of a match to the good and profit of thoſe of his nation: but in the end he preuailed ſo much, that he eſpouſed the maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her parents, it hapned one day, that beeing diſarmed, hee met with a Lyon vpon the way, whom he graſped and ſtrangled with his hands; and hauing ſlaine him, hee caſt the bo- dy of the beaſt into a wood not far diſtant from the high way. Another day, and at another time, returning in like ſort to the damſell, hee found a ſwarme of Bees which went and made their hony and habitation in the breaſt of the ſame beaſt, and hee tooke three hony combes which hee E carried with other preſents vnto his betrothed. After this hee inuited the Thamnites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they ſuſpected his forces) vnder colour to doe him honour, choſe out thirty of their ſtrongeſt and valianteſt yong men, whom in words they aſſigned for his companions, but in effect appointed for his guardians; to the end hee might not attempt any commotion at ſuch time as he had drunke deepely: and there was nothing intended but ſport, according as it is the cuſtome in other ſuch like occaſions. To whom Sampſon ſaide, I wil propoſe a queſtion vnto you, which if any one of you can reſolue, I wil giue each of you a fine linnen ſhirt, and other veſtments in reward of your prudence. They being very deſirous both to be reputed wiſe, as alſo to gaine the reward which was propoſed, willed him to propound his que- ſtion: which he did in theſe tearmes. He that deuoureth all, and that of himſelfe is vnpleaſant to F be fed vpon, hath brought forth a moſt pleaſant kinde of fruite. They trauelled for the ſpace of three dayes to finde out the ſenſe thereof, but they could not: and therefore they required Sampſons beſt beloued, that ſhee would ſound the ſecrets thereof, and diſcloſe the ſame vnto them; which if ſhee failed to performe, they threatned to burne her to death. Sampſon at the firſt (notwithſtanding all her flatteries and ſolicitations) denyed to tell it her: at laſt ſhe vrged him ſo inſtantly, and ſhed ſo many teares (telling him that if hee did not expound the queſtion vnto her, that ſhe would take it for a certaine ſigne that he hated her: that at laſt he told her what hapned with the Lyon which he had ſlaine, and how in him hee had the three hony combes which hee brought vnto her: and (ſuſpectleſſe of either fraud or guile) he deciphered the whole ſtory vnto her, and ſhee afterwards reported the ſame to thoſe that had beſought her in that behalfe. When as therefore the ſeuenth day was come wherein the queſtion was to bee decided, they aſſembled themſelues together about ſunne-ſet, and ſaid: There is nothing more irkſome to meete withall then a Lyon, neither any thing more pleaſant to taſte, then hony: Whereunto Sampſon replyed, that there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for ſhee it is that hath reported my words vnto you. Notwithſtanding all this, he deliuered that which he had promiſed them out of that booty, which he had taken from certaine Aſcalonites, whom he encountred vpon the way. From that time forward hee forſooke this marriage, and the woman (the more to deſpite him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalfe firſt ſollicited the marriage. Sampſon (beeing the more incenſed by this iniury) reſolued to reuenge himſelfe both on her, and the whole nation: For which cauſe in the ſommer ſeaſon (when the corne was ready to be reapt) hee tooke three hundreth foxes, to whoſe tayles he faſtned flaming torches, and droue them into the Philiſtines fields of corne, conſuming by this meanes all their harueſt hope. The Philiſtines vnderſtanding that Sampſon had done this, and conceiuing the reaſon that induced him to execute this action, ſent their garriſon to Thamna, and burnt this woman aliue with all her kinred, as the authors of that loſſe that had hapned vnto them. After that Sampſon had ſlaine diuers Philiſtines in the countrey, hee went and dwelt at Etam (which is a ſtrong rocke in the tribe of Iuda.) For which cauſe the Philiſtines aſſailed that tribe, who certified them that there was no reaſon why they ſhould ſuffer for thoſe offences which were committed by Sampſon, and that in eſpeciall, becauſe they paied them tribute. The Philiſtines replied, that except they would not be maintainers of this act of iniuſtice, they ſhould deliuer Sampſon vnto them. They therefore (deſirous that the Philiſtines ſhould haue no cauſe of quarrell againſt them) came vnto the rocke to the number of three thouſand men, or thereabouts, and blamed Sampſon for thoſe actions which hee dared to commit againſt the Philiſtines (a people that might endomage all the nation of the Hebrewes) alledging further that they came to the end to take, ſurpriſe and deliuer him into the Philiſtines hands, praying him to ſubmit himſelfe voluntarily to that their reſolution. Sampſon made them ſweare that they would doe him no further iniury, but deliuer him onely vnto their enemies, and that done he deſcended from the rocke, ſurrendring himſelfe to the hands of thoſe of Iuda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliuer him to the Philiſtines. Now being arriued in a certaine place, which before that time had no name, and at this preſent is called the Maxilla, that is to ſay a Iawe (by reaſon of the valour which Sampſon ſhewed in that place) and approaching neere the Philiſtines campe; ſhouting and reioycing in their preſence, by reaſon that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them) Sampſon brake his bonds, and catching vp the iawe of an Aſſe which hee found at his feete, and marching foorth againſt the Philiſtines, he ſlewe and beate downe to the number almoſt of two thouſand of them, putting all the reſt to flight and confuſion. Sampſon (becomming more elate after this execution then he ought to haue beene, and confeſſing not that it was done by the aſſiſtance of God, but attributing the ſame to his owne vertue) gloried, that with the iawe of an Aſſe he had partly ſlaine, and partly conſtrained the enemies both to feare and flie. But being ſeiſed with an exceeding thirſt, hee acknowledged and confeſſed that mans force is of no force, and proteſted that all ought to be aſcribed to God, whom he beſought that he would not be diſpleaſed with that which he had ſpoken, but that it might bee remitted, and himſelfe deliuered from the preſent danger. Whereupon God heard his praiers, and cauſed a pleaſant and aboundant fountaine to iſſue and ſpring from the foote of a rocke: for which cauſe Sampſon called the place Maxilla or Iaw, which name continueth euen vnto this day. After this battaile Sampſon ſet light by the Philiſtines, and went to Gaza where he ſoiourned in an Inne. The gouernours of the Citie vnderſtanding of his arriuall, ſet men to keepe the gates, to the end hee might not depart without their knowledge. But Sampſon (beeing no waies ignorant of that which they intended againſt him) aroſe about midnight and carried away the gates, with the hinges and lockes and all the furniture of the ſame; and laying them on his ſhoulders, carried and caſt them on the mountaine Hebron. Not long after that hee tranſgreſſed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domeſticall manner of liuing, conforming himſelfe to the faſhions of the Gentiles, which was the ſource and of-ſpring of all his ruine. For hee was ſurpriſed and intangled with the loue of one that was called Dalila (which was a common ſtrumpet amongſt the Philiſtines.) To her reſorted the gouernours of the Philiſtines,

A Philiſtines, and by promiſes wrought ſo much with her, that they wrought her to worke out of him wherein his force conſiſted, and what the cauſe was that he might not bee apprehended by his enemies. Shee (conuerſing with him in drinking and keeping him company) tolde him that ſhee maruailed at his actions, and by ſubtill inſinuations practiſed to vnderſtand the manner and cauſe that made him ſo excellent in vertue. But Sampſon (that as yet was ſubtill, ſtaied and well gouerned) in countercheck of her craft anſwered her: that if he were tyed with ſeuen vine branches that were yong and pliant, hee ſhould become the moſt feebleſt amongſt men. Whereupon for that time ſhee contented her ſelfe; and hauing giuen notice thereof to the gouernours of the Philiſtines, ſhee had in her houſe certaine men of warre: then when he was drunke and aſleepe, ſhee bound him as ſtrongly faſt as might bee poſſible, and ſodainly waking him tolde him
B that certaine ſouldiers were at hand to aſſaile him: but Sampſon brake the bonds of the vine branches, and addreſſed himſelfe to repulſe the aſſaults of thoſe that lay in waight to offend him. The woman fruſtrate of that hope which ſhe expected, not long time after that (getting a fit opportunitie, in that Sampſon conuerſed continually) began grieuouſly to complaine againſt him, for that diſtruſting her loue and conſtancy, hee had concealed that from her which ſhee moſt of all deſired to know, as if ſhe had beene inſufficient to conceale that which might any waies concerne the fortune and ſafety of her beloued: But he deceiued her the ſecond time, and ſaide vnto her, that if hee were tyed with ſeuen cords, hee ſhould loſe his force. Which when ſhee had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Sampſon told her, that if ſhee pleighted his haire with a fillet, hee ſhould be weakned: and hauing experimented that alſo, ſhee found
C that it was falſe. Finally (for that a great misfortune attended vpon him) ſhee beſought him ſo much, that at laſt hee condeſcended to gratifie her, and ſpake to her after this manner. God hath care ouer mee, and I am by his eſpeciall prouidence bred and brought vp: for this cauſe I nouriſh this haire, for that God hath commanded me not to cut the ſame, becauſe my force ſhall endure and augment as long as theſe lockes ſhall endure and grow. Which when ſhee vnderſtood, ſhee ſhaued off his haire and betraied him to his enemies, whoſe forces at that time he was too feeble to reſiſt, who plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound: but in ſpace of time his haire grewe againe, and at ſuch time as the Philiſtines celebrated a publique feaſt (wherein the Princes and Peeres banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a houſe, the couer whereof was ſuſtained with two pillars) Sampſon was ſent for, and brought to the feaſt, to D the end they might mocke at him in the midſt of their feaſts and drunkenneſſe. But hee taking it more grieuouſly then all other the euils which hee indured, that hee might not reuenge himſelfe on thoſe that thus iniuriouſly did iniure him: hee wrought ſo much with the boy that led him, that he approched and tooke hold of the foreſaid pillars, telling him that hee had great neede to repoſe himſelfe, conſidering the trauell that he had ſuſtained. As ſoone therefore as he got holde on them, he ſhooke them in ſuch a ſort, as they were ouerturned, and the houſe fel vpon thoſe that were therein, who died to the number of three thouſand men, with theſe alſo died Sampſon, who finiſhed his daies in this ſort, after he had commanded ouer Iſrael for the ſpace of twenty yeeres. He was a man of great vertue, force and magnanimitie: and eſpecially in that which concerneth his end, he meriteth to be admired at, becauſe that euen vnto his latter houre hee was animated a-E gainſt the Philiſtines. And whereas hee was allured and beſotted by a woman, it ought to bee attributed to humane nature, which is ſo weake that it cannot reſiſt ſinne: otherwiſe in all other things, we ought to yeeld teſtimony of his vertue. How the ſonnes of ELI the high Prieſt were ſlaine in battell by the Paleſtines.

F AFTER the deceaſe of Sampſon, Eli the high Prieſt tooke vpon him the gouernment ouer the Iſraelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech vnable to endure the miſerie thereof, came from Bethleem a Citie of the tribe of Iuda to inhabite in the countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife, and Chelion and Maalon his ſons, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate ſucceſſe as might be deſired, he married his ſonnes to certaine daughters of the Moabites, Chelion vnto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten yeares after, Elimelech and his ſonnes dyed, the one after the other. By which miſhappe Naomi being caſt into great ſorrowe and deſtitute of their companie, whoſe deare familiaritie ſhee had preferred before the loue of her countrey: changing her reſolution

(according to those occurrences that had happened her) shee determined to returne vnto her friends, by reason shee had receiued intelligence that her countrey at that time was in good estate. But her daughters in lawe could no wayes endure to bee separated from her, and will shee nill shee, they would needes accompany her: but shee willing them a more happy marriage then that which they enioyed with her sonnes, and in all other things prosperity, and protesting vnto them that there was no ability in her to doe them good; shee besought them that they would stay in that place, and not (desiring to follow their wretched mother in lawe in an vncertaine euent) to lose the certaine pleasure and peaceable fruition of their countrey. These her perswasions tooke effect with Orpha: but Ruth (resolued in no sort to forsake her) attended on her mother in law (as an assured and future companion of whatsoeuer fortune should fal vpon her.) Now when as both of them were arriued in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinsman) entertained them in his house: and whereas the Citizens called her by the name of Naamis, she said vnto them, that it was more seemely for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue signifieth good hap, and Mara is as much to say as bitternesse.) Whereas then it was haruest time, Ruth by the permission of her mother, went out into the fields to gleane, and gather corne for her sustenance: and it fortuned that shee met by good hap in the fields with Boos, who came thither likewise not long after; who beholding her, inquired and questioned with the chiefe reaper as touching the woman. Now hee had a little before that time vnderstood by her, her whole estate; which he declared vnto his master, who gaue her thankes for the good affection which shee bare vnto her mother in lawe, and of the care shee had of her deceased sonne, whom Ruth had married, wishing her in effect all good fortune: and not suffering her to gleane, he permitted her to reape and to gather all that which shee might, commanding his master-reaper that he should no waies let her from taking whatsoeuer shee pleased: giuing order likewise that when the reapers should take their refection, they should giue her both meate and drinke. Now when as Ruth had receiued graine at their hands, shee reserued it for her mother in lawe, and came home at night and brought her the sheaues. In like manner Naomi had reserued a portion of certaine victualls for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had sent her. Vpon her returne Ruth reported vnto her all those words that Boos had said vnto her: and Naomi gaue her to vnderstand that Boos was of her kin, and that it might be that he was mooued by deuotion towards God to haue care of her. Some other daies after, Ruth issued againe with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings. And certaine dayes after (and about that time that they threshed barley) Boos came and slept on the floore: which when Naomi vnderstood, shee bethought her selfe of some subtill practise, whereby shee might make Ruth lie with him (presuming that it would bee a very good fortune for the yong woman if they might growe in acquaintance together) for which cause she sent her to sleepe at his feete. Ruth (that made it a conscience to contradict her mother in lawe in whatsoeuer shee commanded her) repaired thither, and vpon her first arriuall Boos perceiued nothing (because he was fast asleepe:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was some body that lay fast by him, hee demanded what shee was: whereupon shee told him her name, requesting him as her master, that hee would permit her to repose in that place for that time. But early in the morning before the seruants began to fall to their worke, hee commanded her to arise, and to take as much barley with her as shee could beare, to the end she might returne vnto her mother in lawe, before that any man might perceiue that shee had slept in that place (because it is wisedome to auoide slander, especially at such time when there is occasion offered for a man to speake ill.) Touching the rest (said hee) the matter standeth thus: Thou hast a kinsman (said hee) that is more neere thee in blood then I am; thou must enquire of him, if it bee his pleasure to take thee to his wife: and if hee saith that hee liketh thee, thou must then necessarily submit vnto him: but if hee refuse thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the lawe intendeth. Now when she had reported these newes vnto her mother in law, shee gathered courage and conceiued hope that Boos would take care of her. Thereupon Boos came into the Citie about noone-daies, and called a councell of the elders, and sent for Ruth and his kinsman, to whom in person hee spake thus: Doest thou possesse the heritage of Abimelech and his successors? Who when he had publikely declared that hee was seised thereof in right of proximity, according to the ordinance of the lawe: Boos replyed. Thou must not (saith hee) onely obserue the lawes in part; but thou must precisely execute them according as they are. For, behold heere a yong woman, whom it behoooueth thee to marry according to the lawe, if thou wilt bee inheritor of his possessions. But hee surrendred vnto Boos, not onely the possessions, but also the woman; by reason that Boos was allied also to those that were dead, and especially for that the said kinsman had already both wife and children.

The high Prieſt Eli had two ſonnes, Ophni and Phinees. They againſt all right and law (offering outrages to men, and vrging impieties againſt God) ſuffered no ſinne to ouer-ſlip them which they committed not: for they tooke preſents (partly in way of honour, partly rauiſhed by force and rapine.) And as touching thoſe women that came vnto the Tabernacle in way of deuotion, they abuſed them, and rauiſhing ſome againſt their wils; and corrupting ſome other by preſents, they ſo lewdly liued, that their life ſeemed to be a true and licentious tyranny: for this cauſe their father was ſore diſpleaſed with them, bnt the people were ſo much the more ouer-burdened with griefe, becauſe as yet they perceiued not that Gods puniſhment ſhould ſo ſodainly fall vpon them. But incontinently after that God had declared to Eli and the Prophet Samuel (who about that time C was very yong) what miſhappe ſhould fall vpon Elies children, hee mourned ouer them, as if they had beene already dead. (But I will firſt of all declare ſomewhat vnto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards will I ſpeake of the children of Eli, and what inconuenient fell vpon all the Hebrew nation.) Elcana was a Leuite of baſe condition, liuing in Ramatha a part of Ephraim: he had married two wiues, the one called Anna, the other Phenanna: by Phenanna he had children; yet notwithſtanding loued he Anna very intirely, although ſhee were barren. Now as Elcana with his wiues repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was reſident (as we haue before declared) to the intent to offer ſacrifice in that place: whileſt I ſay, during the feſtiuall he diſtributed the portion of his meate to his wiues and children, Anna (beholding the children of his other wife ſitting round about their mother) began to weepe and D lament with her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe was without iſſue and alone. And after that by her griefe ſhee had ouercome all that conſolation which her husband could giue her, ſhee went vnto the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it might pleaſe him to giue her a ſonne, and make her a mother; promiſing that her firſt begotten ſonne ſhould be dedicated vnto the ſeruice of God, and ſhould lead a particular life farre differing from that of other liuing men. And for that ſhee employed long time in making her prayers, the high Prieſt Eli, who ſate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, ſuppoſing that ſhee had taſted too much wine: but after that ſhe had tolde him that ſhee drunke nothing but water, and that (being oppreſſed with griefe) ſhee was come into the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it might pleaſe him to grant her children; he exhorted her to be of good courage, promiſing that God had heard her prayers: whereupon E ſhee returned to her husband repleniſhed with good hope, and tooke her repaſt with ioy and gladneſſe. When as then they returned to their owne houſe, ſhe began to waxe big with childe, and at laſt ſhe bare a little yong ſonne, whom ſhe called Samuel (that is to ſay, Requeſted at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer ſacrifice and giue thankes vnto God for the birth of the childe, which God had giuen them, and to bring their tenths; whereupon the woman (remembring her of the vow ſhee had made in his behalfe) deliuered him into the hands of Eli, and conſecrated him vnto God to be his Prophet. For which cauſe they ſuffered his haire to grow, and he dranke nothing but water, and Samuel was nouriſhed and brought vp in the Temple: Elcana had by Anna other ſonnes and three daughters. But as touching Samuel (incontinently after he had attained to the age of twelue yeeres) he prophecied. On a certaine night therefore F whileſt he ſlept, God called him by his name: and he ſuppoſing that the high Prieſt had wakened him; came vnto him: but he told him that he had not called him. This notwithſtanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being ſore amazed, he ſaid vnto him, Samuel, I neither now at this preſent, nor before his time haue ſpoken vnto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, anſwer him therefore, and ſay here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more; and he required him that it might pleaſe him to ſpeake, and he would anſwer, not

Eli inforced the Prophet by imprecations to declare vnto him that, which he had heard. But Samuel (for feare he ſhould diſcomfort him) would not diſcloſe the ſame vnto him, which made him the more aſſured of the intended and imminent death of his ſonnes. paſſed further into the countries thereabout: ſo that in fighting with their enemies, the Philiſtines at laſt got the vpper hand, and ſlew the Hebrewes, and had them in chace for the ſpace of foure miles, purſuing the reſt of thoſe that fled euen vnto their owne tents. Whereupon the Hebrewes grew iealous and affraid of their whole eſtate: and therefore ſent they to the councell of the Elders and the high Prieſt, praying them to bring the Arke of God with them, to the end that hauing it in preſence with them they might ſtrike the battell and ouercome their enemies. But they bethought them not, that he that had pronounced the ſentence of their calamitie againſt them was greater then the Arke which was made for him. The Arke then was brought, and the

The Hebrewes becauſe of the preſence of the Arke conceiued very great hope and aſſurance, that they ſhould haue the vpper hand of their enemies, The Philiſtines likewiſe were ſore amazed, fearing the preſence of the ſame: but the iſſues were not anſwerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they ioyned battell, the victory which the Hebrewes hoped ſhould be theirs, fell vnto the Philiſtines; and the loſſe which the Philiſtines feared, fell vpon the Hebrewes, who at laſt perceiued that they had repoſed their confidence on the Arke all in vaine. For as ſoone as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned their backes, and loſt about thirtie thonſand men, amongſt whom the ſonnes of the high Prieſt were ſlaine, and the Arke was taken and carried away by the enemie. AS ſoone as the newes of this ouerthrow was brought into Silo, and that it was certainly knowne that the Arke was taken (for a yong Beniamite, who was at the execution, was come to bring tidings thereof) all the Citie was filled with ſorrow: and Eli the high Prieſt (who ſate in one of the gates on a high throne) vnderſtanding the lamentation, and iudge- L

CHAP. I.

How the Palestines compelled by pestilence and famine, sent backe the Arke of couenant vnto the Hebrewes.

E

AFTER that the Philistines had gotten the victory ouer the Hebrewes, and taken the sacred Arke (as we haue before this declared) they brought it with other their spoiles vnto the City of Azot, and placed it in maner of a trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idoll. But on the next day after (when early in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their god) they found him fallen from that base or pillar that sustained him, and lay along vpon the ground, his face vpward before the Arke; whereat being sore mooued, they tooke and fastned him in his former place: and when as they came very oftentimes thither, and alwaies found him prostrate, and adoring before the Arke, a great feare and perturF bation inuaded the whole people. At length a grieuous plague, not onely ranged in the Citie of Azot, but also seised on all the inhabitants of the countrey. For the people beeing sodainly taken with the flixe, died in great torment, and some of them vomited vp their bowels, beeing corrupted and corroded with the disease. Besides this, the whole land swarmed with mice, who destroying all things, neither spared the corne, nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus ouerpressed with these calamities, & vnable any longer to indure the same, vnderstood that the Arke was the cauſe thereof, and that neither the victorie, neither the ſurpriſall of the ſame, had any wayes procured either their good or profit. They therefore ſent vnto the Aſcalonites, requiring them that they would receiue the Arke into their Citie, who (willingly condeſcending to their embaſſage and demand) receiued the Arke, and were preſently plagued with the ſame ſickneſſes and miſhaps which the Azotians had ſuffered. For together with the Arke the calamities alſo were tranſlated, for which cauſe it was likewiſe ſent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while: for the inhabitants of that place beeing afflicted by the ſame grieuances which the other indured, ſent it to the neighbour Cities, ſo that after this ſort the Arke was conuaied to fiue Cities of the Paleſtines: (exacting as it were by thoſe plagues a tribute in euery one of them of violated religion) who wearied with ſo many euils, and made examples vnto others not to entertaine the Arke, which ſo grieuouſly recompenced thoſe that receiued the ſame, perceiued that there was no other way left them but to finde out ſome good meanes to rid themſelues of the ſame. When as therefore the Princes of the fiue Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Azot, were aſſembled, they conſulted amongſt themſelues what were beſt to be done, and firſt of all they reſolued to ſend backe the Arke vnto thoſe to whom it appertained, whoſe captiuitie God did reuenge in that with it many plagues entred into the ſame Region, and ceaſed not to waſte both their men and their countrey. There were ſome that ſaid that this reſolution was vnſeemely to be executed, denying that theſe things ſhould be imputed to the captiuitie of the Arke (whoſe power if it were ſo great as they intended, or if God had any wayes care of the ſame; hee would neuer haue permitted it to haue fallen into the hands of men of a contrarie religion) perſwading them to digeſt theſe misfortunes with an equall minde, and ſo to thinke that all theſe things were nothing elſe but the effects of nature, which in certaine periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants, (and in other things ſubiect to her power) theſe kinds of alterations and mutations. But the counſell of thoſe men, that had approoued their vnderſtanding and wiſedome in times paſt, was preferred before their opinion. For the aſſiſtants ſuppoſed that in this, deliberation, as alſo their opinion and counſell was moſt conuenient. They therefore aduiſed that the Arke ſhould be ſent backe and not retained, and that the fiue Cities ſhould dedicate fiue golden ſtatuaes in teſtimonie of their gratitude, becauſe they had beene preſerued by his fauour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impoſſible to eſcape: they annexed alſo ſo many golden mice vnto them, like vnto thoſe that ſpoiled their country. All theſe locked in a cheſt and laid vpon the Arke, they commanded that a new Cart ſhould be built, and that they ſhould yoake and tie to the ſame certaine kine that had new calued, locking vp their calues from them, leaſt they ſhould be an impediment to their dammes, and (to the intent that through the deſire to ſee their yong) they ſhould haſte the faſter. That done, that driuing the charriot and them, they ſhould leaue them in a place that had three waies, and ſuffer them to draw that way that them liſted: and if they tooke the way of the Hebrewes, and ſhould trauell towards their countrey, they then ſhould aſſure themſelues that it was the Arke which was the cauſe of their euils; but if they drew another way, let them (ſaid they) be driuen backe againe, being moſt aſſured that the Arke hath no ſuch vertue in it. This counſell was approoued by euery one of the aſſembly, and preſently effected: ſo hauing prepared all thoſe things whereof we haue ſpoken, they brought the chariot into a high way that extended three waies, and leauing it in that place they returned backe againe.

The victorie of the Hebrewes vnder the conduct of SAMVEL.

The yeere of the world, 2851. before the birth of Chriſt, 1113.

NOW when the kine entred and kept the right beaten way, and trauailed therein no otherwaies then if ſome men had led them, the gouernours of the Philiſtines followed after them, deſirous to vnderſtād whither they would trauel, and in what place they would reſt both themſelues and the charriot. There is a borough in the tribe of Iuda called Bethſama, towards which they drew: and although they had a very faire Plaine before them, yet would they not trauell any further, but reſted the charriot in that place. The inhabitants came vnto this ſpectacle, and greatly reioyced thereat: for although it was ſommer time (wherein euery one buſied himſelfe in gathering in the fruits of the field) yet ſo it was, that whē they perceiued the Ark, they were ſo tranſported with the pleaſure that they had, that they laid aſide the work which they had in hand, and ran preſently vnto the chariot. Then taking downe the Arke and the Cofer (wherein the

Which when the Princes of the Paleſtines perceiued, they returned backe againe into their owne countrey. But Gods indignation and diſpleaſure was whetted againſt the Bethſamites: ſo that ſeauentie of them were ſlaine, by reaſon they had touched the Arke, & with prophane hands (not being Prieſts) attempted to ſuſtaine it. For which cauſe the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their loſſe, and mourned for that their countrimen were extinguiſhed by no fatall death, but by a puniſhment and plague ſent from God, lamenting in particular euery one of their alliance. And ſuppoſing that they were vnworthy that the Arke ſhould remaine with them, they ſent meſſengers to the gouernours and the reſt of the He-

B brewes, to let them vnderſtand that they had recouered the Arke out of the hands of the Philiſtines; who being made priuy to euery accident, placed the ſame in Cariathiarim a Citie bordering vpon the Bethſamites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Leuites called Aminidab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life) to his houſe directed they the Arke, as to a place agreeable vnto God, becauſe there dwelled in the ſame a man of ſo much vertue. His ſonnes had the charge of the Arke, and continued in that ſeruice for the ſpace of twenty yeares; during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had onely remained 4. moneths with the Philiſtines. During the time that the Arke was in the Citie of Cariathiarim, all the people conuerted themſelues vnto God with prayers and ſacrifices, ſhewing great deuotion and forwardneſſe in his ſeruice. The Prophet

C Samuel perceiuing this their readines in courage, and ſuppoſing he had got a fit occaſion to exhort them vnto libertie, and thoſe profits which conſequently follow the ſame; and applying his ſpeech vnto the opportunitie, time & affaires, ſpake vnto thē ſuch words as ſounded to this effect. Yee men of Iſrael, ſince at this preſent the Philiſtines ceaſe not to moleſt you, and God beginneth to ſhew himſelfe merciful and fauourable vnto you: it behooueth you, not onely to be touched with a deſire to recouer your liberty, but alſo to endeuour your ſelues to purchaſe the ſame in effect. Beware therefore leaſt thorow your owne manners you make your ſelues vnworthie therof, and let each one of you endeuour to follow iuſtice; and expulſing all ſinne out of your mindes, conuert your ſelues in all puritie vnto God, and perſeuere conſtantly in his ſeruice. For in doing theſe things, you ſhall ſhortly obtaine all fēlicitie, and eſpecially purchaſe vnto your

D ſelues a new libertie, and an aſſured victory againſt your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the ſtrength of your bodies, neither by the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtaine: for God hath not propoſed rewards for theſe things, but for vertue and iuſtice, who (truſt me) will not deceiue your expectation, nor faile in the execution of his promiſes. When he had ſpoken after this manner, all the people teſtified their conſent in good words, ſhewing the pleaſure they had conceiued by his diſcourſe, promiſing to doe that which ſhould be well liking and agreeable vnto God. Whereupon Samuel aſſembled them the ſecond time in the city of Maſpha (which word ſignifieth conſpicuous) there erected they an altar and ſacrificed vnto God, and after they had faſted for a daies ſpace, they publikely addreſſed them to call vpon the name of God. The Philiſtines in the mean ſpace, who were aſſembled together in the ſame place,

E had an inkling of that which the Hebrewes did, and being certified of this aſſembly came with a great armie and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrewes, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This ſodaine attempt of theirs ſore diſmaied and troubled the Hebrewes: ſo that they repairing and running vnto Samuel, tolde him that their hearts failed them thorow feare, and their minds were troubled thorow the remembrance of thoſe precedent loſſes which they had receiued: For which cauſe they ought to hold themſelues in quiet, for feare leaſt the enemy ſhould inforce his power againſt them. Whileſt (ſaid they) thou haſt led vs hither to pray, ſacrifice, & offer vp our vowes vnto God, they are encamped neer vnto vs, being ready to ſurpriſe vs that are naked and diſarmed: we haue no other hope therfore of our ſecuritie, but that proceedeth from thee and God; who being moued by thy prayer, may giue vs meanes to eſcape from

F their hands. Samuel in way of anſwer wiſhed them to be of good cheere, promiſing them that God would yeeld them ſome teſtimonie of his aſſiſtance: whereupon ſacrificing a ſucking lambe for the people, he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to ſtretch forth his right hand for them in this battell againſt the Philiſtines, and that he would not permit them to fall this ſecond time into the enemies hands. To theſe prayers of his, God liſtned with intentiue eares, and accepted their humble hearts and dutifull obſeruance, ſmiling vpon their offering, and promiſing them both force, and victorie. remonies performed; the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites sight, supposing that the day was already theirs, in that they had intercepted the Iewes who were vnprepared for the fight (who were not onely disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they beene foretold the same, they had scarcely beleeued it.) For first of all by Gods commandement the earth trembled vnder their feete, and with vncertaine pase they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were sodainly swallowed vp by the earth-quake: at length astonished by often flashes, and hauing both their eyes and hands halfe blasted and burned by the fierie lightnings that fell (so that they could not wield nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismaied, sodainly set vpon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as farre as a place called Corræus, where he fixed and erected a stone or trophee, as a marke both of his owne victorie, and the enemies flight, and called the same the strong rocke; as a witnesse of the force that God had giuen him against the Philistines: who after they had receiued this ouerthrow, sallied not out any more against the Israelites. But remembring themselues of their feare and those accidents that fell vpon them, they remained in peace, offering no further inuasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceiued and gotten against the Hebrewes, transiated it selfe and remained with the Hebrewes euer after this victorie. And Samuel led forth his armie against them, and slew a great number of them, and for euer abased their pride, taking from them that countrey which before times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Iewes, which countrey extendeth it selfe from the frontire of Geth, to the Citie of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

SAMVEL weakned by reason of his olde age cannot any longer gouerne the estate, and committeth it to the administration of his sonnes.

NOVV when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good forme of gouernment, he assigned them a Citie whither they might appeale, and decide those differents that might fall out amongst them: and as touching himselfe, he trauelled twice euery yeere from citie to citie, to administer iustice vnto them, and continued the maintenance of this policie for a long time. But as soone as he perceiued himselfe to be ouerburdened with yeeres, and vnapt to execute his ordinary offices, he reserued the gouernment and superintendence of the people to his sonnes, the elder of whom was called Ioel and the yonger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seate of iustice in Bethel, and that the other should giue audience at Bersaba, diuiding the people, and attributing each part to his particular Iudge. In these was there a manifest example and infallible testimonie, that children are not alwaies borne like vnto their fathers: but that sometimes of euill parents there are good children bred, as contrariwise at that time of a good father there were euill sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father, they followed a quite contrarie course, and oppressed iustice thorow corruptions and rewards; and, swallowed vp and surfeited in delights and pleasures, they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should studie to liue well, and vprightly.

CHAP. IIII.

How the people being displeased with the manners and gouernment of the sonnes of SAMVEL demanded a King.

VVHEN as therefore the people perceiued, that the sonnes of the Prophet had committed so many outrages against their lawes and policie, they were verie sore displeased, and had recourse vnto their father where he dwelled in the Citie of Ramatha; where reckoning vp vnto him the misdemeanors of his sonnes, and how thorow the multitude of his yeares, he was vnfit according to his accustomed manner to administer the affaires of the common weale, they earnestly intreated and besought him, that hee would nominate and elect some King ouer them, who might both command their nation and Empire, and exact due punish-

This reſolution of the people grieuouſly tormented Samuels minde, who by reaſon of his innated and vpright iuſtice miſliked of the kingly authority, as a ſtile and ſtate too imperious: for he greatly delighted himſelfe in the Ariſtocracie or gouernment of the elders, deeming no eſtate more conducible, or auailable for the ſecuritie and proſperitie of the people, then that was. And ſo did this matter diſtemper and diſtract this man, as by reaſon of his care he could neither taſte food, nor entertaine ſleep: but all the night long toſſed and tumbled in his bed, during thoſe times complotting and imagining many things in his mind. Whileſt theſe his indiſpoſitions continued, God appeared vnto him and comforted him, willing him not to be aggrieued at that which the people had required: but that he ſhould ſuppoſe that this iniurie, not onely concerned him, but God himſelfe whom they diſclaimed alſo for their king and ſole gouernour ouer them. The effect wherof they
B had complotted, from the day that they departed out of Ægypt: but ere it be long (ſaid he) they ſhall repent themſelues, yet ſhall not their repentance vndoe that which ſhall be done; and it ſhall appeare by thoſe counſailes they haue taken, that they haue bin contemners & ingrateful toward me by their owne confeſſion, and towards thee alſo which haſt beene their Prophet. I will therefore that you chooſe them a king, and ſuch a one as I ſhall nominate vnto thee, after thou haſt aduertiſed them what euils they ſhall endure (at ſuch time as they ſhall haue a King) & haſt publikely declared vnto them, what inconuenients follow the change which ſo vehemently and vnhappily they purſue. Whē Samuel vnderſtood theſe ſayings, he aſſembled the people about the break of day, and proteſted publikely vnto them, that he would eſtabliſh them a King. But ſaith he, before I ſhall effect that which you requeſt, I muſt expoſe and declare vnto you what eſtate you ſhal
C liue in, being vnder the ſubiection of royaltie; and how many and grieuous euils you ſhall be preſſed withall, by thoſe Kings that ſhall gouerne you. Know therefore firſt of all, that they will take your children from you, and make ſome of them coachmen, and otherſome their horſemen and archers of their guard, others their poſts and tribunes and centurions; ſome likewiſe their handicraftſmen, and armorers, and chariot-makers, and ſmiths, and forgers of other ſorts of weapons, beſides husbandmen of his fields, and plowers, and diggers of his vineyards: neither is there any thing which they ſhal not be compelled to do after the maner of bondſlaues, that are bought with money. They ſhall take your daughters alſo, and make them their perfumers, cookes and bakers; and they ſhall employ them in all ſeruile offices, wherunto their chambermaides are to be imploied either by ſtripes or torture. They ſhall take from you your ſubſtance, and giue it to their Eu-
D nuches, and guard. They ſhall take your flocks, and diſtribute them amongſt their ſeruants: In a word, you & all yours ſhall ſerue one king, and ſhal be of no better reckoning then the ſlaues of his houſhold. When you ſhall endure theſe paines, then ſhall you call to remembrance al theſe things which I haue told you, and with repentance you ſhal beſeech God, that he will haue mercy vpon you, and giue you a ſpeedy deliuerance from the ſeruitude of your kings: but he ſhall not reſpect your prayers, but neglecting and repulſing them, ſhal ſuffer you to beare the penalty of your euill counſell. Although theſe future inconueniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect and ſet light by them: and not ſuffering that ſiniſter opinion which before that time they had conceiued in their minds, to be altred or fruſtrated in them, they inſiſted with all obſtinacy; requiring (without any care of future miſhaps) that they might haue a king created ouer them, be-
E cauſe (as they ſaid) it was neceſſarie that they ſhould haue a king that might wage warre with them, to reuenge them on their enemies, and repreſſe their aduerſaries forces, and that there was no abſurditie in it, but that they might be gouerned in the ſame ſort as their neighbours were. Samuel perceiuing that his perſwaſions could preuaile nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diuerted from that reſolution wherein they perſiſted, he ſpake thus: Goe your waies for this time euery one of you vnto your houſes, and I will cauſe you to be aſſembled when the cauſe requireth, and when God ſhall haue informed me what king he will giue you.

SAVL by the commandement of God is declared King.

The yeere of the world, 2880. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 1804.

THERE was a certaine man of the tribe of Beniamin, noble in birth, and commendable in manners called Cis, who had a yõng ſonne faire in face, great in body; hauing a ſpirit and iudgement farre more excellent then were the lineaments and perfections of his body, whoſe name was Saul. in any other kinde of cattell, had loſt certaine of them which were ſtraied from the reſt of his flocke: whereupon he ſent his ſon accompanied with a ſeruant to ſearch and ſeeke them out; who hauing trauerſed and trauelled in queſt of them thorow all his fathers tribe, iourned thorow the reſt of the tribes, without any hope or inkling of them: for which cauſe hee determined to returne home againe, for feare leaſt his father ſhould conceiue ſome care and griefe in his abſence. Whileſt then he arriued neere vnto the Citie of Ramatha, the ſeruant that followed him, certified him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whoſe foreſight the knowledge of the truth was ſubiect, towards whom hee counſailed him to addreſſe himſelfe, with aſſurance and confidence, that by him hee ſhould vnderſtand what was become of his Aſſes. Saul replied, that he had no meanes left to recompence the Prophet, by reaſon they had conſumed all the money they had brought foorth with them in their iourney. His ſeruant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a ſicle, which they might giue him: but they were both of them deceiued, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew neere vnto the gates of the Citie, they met with certen maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gaue them directions, telling them that they were to make haſte before that he were ſet downe to ſupper, by reaſon he at that time entertained diuers gueſts, and he himſelfe was firſt wont to ſit downe at the vpper end of the table. Samuel had inuited this company, by reaſon that all the day long hee had inſtantly beſought God, that hee would declare vnto him, who it was that ſhould bee eſtabliſhed, and God alſo gaue him to vnderſtand that he would informe him the next day after, and that about the ſame houre he would ſend a young man vnto him of the tribe of Beniamin. For this cauſe Samuel ſat in his houſe expecting the aſſignation: which being come, he came downe vnder pretence to go to ſupper, and in the way he met with Saul. At that very inſtant God ſignified vnto Samuel, that it was he whom he ſhould elect Prince and gouernour ouer the people.

God certifieth Samuel whom he ſhould create king.

Saul addreſſing himſelfe vnto Samuel, beſought him that he would ſhew him the Prophets lodging, by reaſon that he was a ſtranger and knew it not. Samuel told him that he himſelfe was the man to whom hee ſpake, and led him to the banquet; aſſuring him that his Aſſes (in ſearch of whom he had trauelled ſo long) were in ſafetie, and that all mens goods were at his command. Saul anſwered: My Lord, I am too baſe to hope or expect ſo much; and further, my familie is the leaſt of all the families: you therefore ieſt and mocke at me, in ſpeaking of ſuch things as ſurpaſſe my condition. The Prophet tooke him by the hand, and brought both him and his ſeruant to the table, and placed him aboue all thoſe that were inuited, who were to the number of ſeuentie. Samuel commanded that the royall portion ſhould bee ſet before Saul: and when the houre of bed time came, all the reſt aroſe and departed to their houſes, but Saul and his ſeruant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as ſoone as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and departing with him out of towne, he commanded him to ſend his ſeruant before, and to remaine himſelfe with him behind, becauſe he had certaine things to impart vnto him in priuate. Hereupon Saul ſent away his ſeruant, and Samuel taking a cruet with oyle, poured the ſame vpon the young mans head, and embracing him ſaid: Bee thou king elected by God againſt the Philiſtines, and for the defence of the Hebrewes. Thou ſhalt haue this ſigne which I now ſhall informe thee of, of thy future honour. When thou ſhalt be parted from hence, thou ſhalt ouertake three men in the way, who trauell to Bethel to adore and ſacrifice vnto God: the firſt of which, thou ſhalt ſee bearing three loaues, the ſecond ſhall beare a goate, and the third ſhall follow carrying a glaſſe of wine. Theſe ſhall embrace thee and careſſe thee: they ſhall giue thee two loaues, and thou ſhalt receiue them. And from thence ſhalt thou depart vnto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou ſhalt meete with a meſſenger, that ſhall certifie thee that the Aſſes are found. From thence comming vnto Gabatha, thou ſhalt finde the Prophets aſſembled in their congregation, and being rauiſhed by the Spirit of God, thou ſhalt prophecy amongſt them: ſo that whoſoeuer ſhall behold thee, ſhall be rauiſhed in admiration, and ſhall ſay: Whence commeth it to paſſe, that the ſonne of Cis hath attained to ſo good fortune? and when thou haſt had theſe ſignes, know that God ſhall be with thee: ſalute thy father and thy kinſmen in my behalfe. Hereafter thou ſhalt repaire and be ſent vnto me vnto Galgal, to offer ſacrifices of thankeſgiuing vnto God. Hauing in this manner told and foretold him that which is foreſpoken, he gaue him licence to depart, and all theſe things hapned vnto Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had prophecied vnto him. When Saul was arriued at Abners houſe, who was his vncle (whom he loued aboue all the reſt of his other familiars:) Abner queſtioned with him about his voiage, and as touching thoſe things which had chanced vnto him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but

For although he were both his friend and coozen; yet thought he it more secure and conuenient for him to burie the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himselfe the infirmitie of mans nature, that no man is constant in loue, but although by manifest assistance from God, felicitie fall vpon any man, yet other men doe grieue and repine that any one should be preferred before them.

After this, Samuel assembled the people in the Citie of Maspha, where he framed his speech in such sort, as he certified of those things which he had receiued from God, namely, that he ha-

Notwithstanding (saith he) since you haue thus determined, and are after this manner resolued, and that the outrage which you haue enterprised against God, preuaileth with you, set your selues all of you in order according

C to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots. To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Beniamin, which being cast the second time, light on the family of Metri, and afterwards being approoued by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Cis, to haue the kingdome. The yong man, who before that time knew what should happen, had stept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seeme that he had desired this dignity; and such moderation and temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out; that diuers cannot conceale the ioy they conceiue, if any face of felicitie smile vpon them; but manifest the same vnto all men: yet notwithstanding he not onely was voide of vaine appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many worthy people) but that which is more, he stole away from the presence of those men ouer whom he should command, and so handled all things

Whilest therefore they carefully sought, & knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet praied God that he would shew them where he was, & that he would bring him into their presence: when as therfore he was enformed by God in what place he remained; Samuel sent out certaine messengers to conduct him thither, and assoone as he came amongst them, Samuel set & placed him in the midst of the people: now was hee more high then any of the companie by the shoulders; and had a kingly and goodly shape and appearance: then spake the Prophet after this manner. God hath giuen you this man to be your king, behold how he surpasseth you all, and shewes himself worthy to be your Prince. But as soone as the people had cried God saue the king; the Prophet, who had reduced into wri-

But Saul departing vnto Gabatha, diuers worthy men gaue their attendance on him, and did him the honor that appertained vnto a king. But diuers seditious and loose companions, who set him at noughts, both mocked them, and those things which they did, neither brought they any presents vnto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, any waies to respect their King. A moneth after his instalment, there fell a war betwixt him and Naas King of the Ammonites, which was the originall of that honour which was generally attributed vnto him by the whole multitude: this Naas had offered diuers outrages vnto those Iewes that dwell on the other

F side of Iordan. For he had trauersed the riuer with a great & huge army leuied against them; and had ouercome diuers of their Cities. For at that time he vsed force & violence against them: and to the intent that they might not rebell, neither deliuer thēselues from his subiection, he vsed this subtilty & preuention to cut of all colour & occasion from them, of opposition. For to those that surrendred themselues, and subscribed to his mercy, and to those that were taken captiues, or conquered in the wars, he plucked out their right eyes: and this did he to that intent, that when they should defend themselues, they should haue their left eyes couered with their bucklers, and by that meanes be made vnapt to enter battell. The king of the Ammonites hauing after this manner dealt with those on the other side of Iordan, he led his armie towards the Galaadites, and encamped neere vnto their chiefe Citie called Iabes, to which he sent Heraulds to summon the inhabitants to surrender the same, vnder these conditions: either to suffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or else by enduring the siege, to see the finall ouerthrow both of themselues, and of their City: wishing them to make choice of which they list, whether they would lose a little part of their bodie, or hazard both their fortunes and liues at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this so doubtfull and dreadfull an election, neither durst returne an hostile or peaceable answer, but asked truce for seuen daies, to the end that sending their messengers to their kinsfolke, they might craue their aide: which if they could obtaine they would warre; and otherwise they promised to submit themselues vnto the enemy, vnder what condition soeuer were best pleasing vnto him. Naas, that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their answer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewise to craue assistance at all their hands, who were their associates. Whereupon they presently sent messengers from citie to citie, and certified the Israelites of all that which Naas had done vnto them, and the extremitie whereunto they were reduced. The Israelites hauing before time vnderstood in what estate they of Iabes were, had grieuously lamented and conceiued great displeasure thereat; but the feare that afflicted them, suffered them to assist their friends in no other manner then by commiseration: yet as soone as their messengers arriued in the Citie where Saul was, and that they had recounted vnto him the dangers wherewith the Iabesites were oppressed; the people were as in times past mooued with compassion. For they lamented the miserie of their Parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the Citie, perceiued the inhabitants drowned in their teares, and enquiring of them for what cause they were so confused and abashed, hee was certified of that, which the messengers had reported: and on the instant he was rauished by a diuine motion, and sent the Embassadours backe againe to those that sent them, promising that within three daies he would come and succour them, and that he would haue the vpper hand of the enemie before sunne-rise, to the end that the rising sunne might behold them victorious, and deliuered from all feare. Meane while he commanded some of them to make stay with him, to the intent they might guide and direct him in his way.

Sauls serious exhortation & command for warre.

SAVL desirous to incite the people to issue out and make warre vpon the Ammonites, to the intent vnder a penaltie he might assemble them with more readinesse, he houghed his owne oxen, and threatned all those whom he met withall to doe the like vnto theirs, except the next day they presented themselues with their armes vpon the banke of Iordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march vnto the place whither by them they should be conducted.

Saul is praised by the people.

The feare of this penaltie published among the tribes, made them gather to head about the same time, so that all the assemblies of the people were mustered in the Citie of Bala. In this suruey besides those of the tribe of Iuda, there were numbred seuen hundreth thousand men, and of the tribe of Iuda in particular, there were seuentie thousand. Hauing therefore passed Iordan and marched some ten cables length of Nilus (which is about some three leagues) all the night time, before the sunne rise, he attained the place whither he intented to conduct them, and diuiding his armie into three parts, he assailed the enemie on euery side, that suspected no such encounter: and fighting valiantly against them, he slew diuers, and amongst the rest Nahas King of the Ammonites. This victorie made Sauls name famous amongst all the Hebrewes, so that he was wonderfully praised and honoured for his valour: so that if before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they changed their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worthiest of them all. For he was not satisfied to redeeme and deliuer those of Iabes, but he entred the Countrey of the Ammonites also, and forraged the same with his armie, and vtterly ouerthrew them: and after he had obtained a great booty and prey, both he and his victoriously and magnifically returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleased with this noble action atchieued by Saul, reioyced because they had chosen them so noble a King, and exclaimed against those that said, that it would be discommodious and vnprofitable for their

A common-weale, saying, Where are now these murmurers, let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people besotted with some good successe, is wont to speake and inforce against them that set light by the authors and inducers of the same. Saul receiued great content and comfort through this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithstanding he swore that no one of their tribe should be put to death that day, because it would not seeme conuenient nor agreeable, that the victorie which was giuen them by God, should be mixed with the blood of their brethren; but rather that it was more decent and comely that the time should be spent in feast and iollitie. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behooued them to confirme the kingdome to Saul by a second election: and to that end, they assembled together in the Citie of Galgal, according as he had commanded them: and there in the sight of all the people Samuel annointed Saul the second time with the consecrated oyle, and proclaimed him king

B anew. Thus was the Aristocracie and gouernment of the better sort amongst the Hebrewes, turned into a Monarchie. For vnder Moses and his disciple Iesus, who gouerned the Empyre, and armie at that time, the nobilitie and elected worthy men ruled the State. After whose death for the space of eighteene whole yeeres, the people was without gouernment, the common-weale not long after reassumed her pristine policie, and the gouernment was giuen vnto him, which was esteemed the most valiant in warre, and the most vpright in doing of Iustice. After this the Prophet Samuel assembled the people, and spake vnto them after this manner: I coniure you by that great God that hath giuen life to those two brothers (I meane Moses and Aaron) and that hath deliuered your forefathers from the Ægyptians, & their tyranny, that with-

C out any affection either of feare or shame, or instigation of any other passion, you truely testifie whether I haue committed any sinister or wicked act, either for profit sake, or for auarice, or fauor. Reproue me, If I haue taken away any mans calfe, or sheepe, or any other thing whatsoeuer, but that which I might lawfully take for my reliefe and sustenance, and at such hands as willingly offered me the same; or if I haue drawn any mans beasts to my vse, or vsed his cattell to my profit and his hinderance: in these and such like, if I haue offended any man, let him now accuse me in the presence of the King. All of them cryed out with one voyce, that no such default had beene committed by him, but that he had gouerned their nation in holinesse and iustice. After that the people had thus publikely testified in the behalfe of Samuel; hee said vnto them: Since you haue liberally and freely protested, that you haue no cause of wrong to vrge or inforce against me, heare

D I pray you, that wherewith I can iustly accuse you. You haue grieuously offended against the maiestie of God, in that you haue required a King at his hands: you should haue rather remembred, that your old father Iacob accompanied onely with his 70. sons came into Ægypt, constrained thereunto by famine, and that in that countrey diuers thousands of persons issued from his loynes, whom the Ægyptians kept in captiuity, offering them extreame outrages: And when as your fathers called vpon God, how he wonderfully deliuered thē from the necessities wherin they were, without giuing them any king, contenting themselues with two brothers Moses and Aaron; who brought and conducted you into this countrey which you possesse at this present. And although you participated these benefits by the hands of God, yet notwithstanding you haue not forborne both to forget religion, and neglect pietie. This notwithstanding, at such time as you

E haue bin conquered by your enemies, he hath set you free; gracing you first of all with the ouerthrow of the Assyrians and their forces: secondly, giuing you victory ouer the Ammonites, and Moabites: and finally ouer the Philistines. Now these great exploits were performed by you, not vnder the conduct of a king, but by the direction of Ieptha and Gedeon: what folly therefore hath bewitched you to make you flie from God, and to seeke to liue vnder the subiection of a King? But I haue named such a one vnto you, whom God hath chosen to be your gouernour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I may giue you a manifest testimony, that Gods wrath is whetted against you, because you haue desired to haue a king; I will striue to expresse it vnto you, by visible signes done by God himselfe, I will therfore require of God, that he will make you see in this place, and in the heart of sommer such a storme, that there is not any one of you, that hath euer seene the foretold them that both themselues and their kings should be grieuously punished. Samuel ha-

The Palestines,assailing the Hebrewes,are ouercome in battell.

Hedio & Ruffinus. cap. 6.

BVT when the king had mustered his men, and chosen out three thousand of the choisest souldiers,he appointed two thousand of them for the guard of his Person, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The rest he gaue in charge to his sonne Ionathan,and sent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there; who,followed by them,valiantly ouercame a garrison of the Philistines neere vnto Gebal. For the Philistines of Gaba hauing gotten the vpper hand ouer the Iewes, had taken their armes from them, and seised and fortified both with men and munition the strongest Cities of their countrey; prohibiting them to beare armes, and in gene- I rall from the vse of any yron: by reason of which inhibition,if their husbandmen had at any time neede of any yron worke, as of plough-shares, mattockes, or any such other instrument fit for manuring or tillage of their lands, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongst the Philistines.

Saul elected two thousand for his owne guard & one thousand for Ionathans.

Saul ouercommeth the Philistines.

Now when the Philistines had gotten some intelligence that their garrison was after this manner defeated,they were wonderfully mooued, and supposing amongst themselues that the iniurie and outrage was in no sort to be suffered,they armed themselues against the Iewes,and went out embattailed with three hundreth thousand footmen,thirty thousand charriots,and sixe thousand horse,encamping with their whole host neere vnto the Citie of Machmas.Which when Saul the king of the Hebrewes vnderstood,he marched toward the Citie of Galgal: and as hee trauailed K thorow the countrey, he animated and encouraged the people to recouer their libertie, proclaiming warre against the Philistines; whose forces he so little feared,as he mocked thereat,saying, that they deserued not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrew by their encountry.But when Sauls souldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly discomforted,so that some of them hid themselues in dennes and places vnder the earth,othersome fled on the other side of Iordan into the countrey of the Gadites and Rubenites.But Saul sent for the Prophet,resoluing to consult with him vpon the estate of the war,who gaue him answer, that he should attend in the same place where he was, and that he should prepare beasts for sacrifice, because that within seuen dayes he would come vnto him & sacrifice on the seuenth day: which done,he might encounter the enemie.According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet obserued he not intirely all that which Samuel had inioyned him. For L when he perceiued that he was somewhat slacke in comming,and that his souldiers waxed weary, he tooke the beasts that were prepared for the sacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards vnderstanding that Samuel was arriued, hee went out to meete him,and doe him honour.
Samuel told him,that he had done amisse, by reason he had neglected that which was commanded him,presuming before his arriuall (who was sent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer praiers and sacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both discouered his rashnes, and disorder in sacrificing. Saul excused himselfe, alledging that he had staied during the terme of seuen dayes which were appointed him: vrging further, that necessitie, and the depart of his souldiours, together with the feare of the aduerse army which were in Machmas, and the intel- M ligence hee had receiued that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer sacrifice:
Samuel replyed,saying, Thou hadst done more aduisedly, if thou hadst obeyed, and not contemned God by thine ouerhaste,whose minister and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mightest both haue gotten an assurance and continuance of thy kingdome to thy selfe, and suc-

A to his owne houſe, and Saul with ſixe hundreth ſouldiers (onely accompanied with his ſonne Ionathan) came vnto the Citie of Gabeon. The greater part of theſe men were diſarmed, by reaſon that the countrey was intirely deſtitute of iron; and workmen that were expert and skilfull in forging and making armour: for the Philiſtines permitted them not to haue any, as wee haue declared a little before. Theſe diuiding their army into three battels, inuaded the countrey of the Hebrewes by ſo many wayes, deſtroying and forraging all things, both in the ſight of King Saul, and of his ſonne, who neither could inhibite their incurſions, nor by reaſon of their multitudes make head againſt them. Both he therefore and his ſonne, and Achias the high Prieſt, ſate them downe vpon a hillocke, and ſeeing the countrey ſpoyled round about them, they were much diſmaied. But Sauls ſonne conſpired and concluded with his eſquire and harneſſe-bearer, to enter ſecretly
B into the enemies campe, and raiſe an vprore and alarum in the ſame; who willingly promiſing and offering him his ſeruice to aduenture with him in all occaſions and places, with the hazzard of his life: they both of them deſcended from the mountaine, and marched directly towards the enemies campe, who had pitched their tents on a high pointed rocke, which extended it ſelfe in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a banke, as it were a wall and fortification againſt the incurſion of their enemies. For which cauſe they kept their watch ſomewhat too careleſly, becauſe the place was fortified by nature: ſo that no man might aſcend, or aſſaile them, but with diſaduantage. When as therefore they had gotten neere vnto the campe, Ionathan incouraged his companion, and animated him to aſſaile the enemy after this manner. If (ſaith he)
C they eſpie vs, and will vs to aſcend, let vs take this ſummons of theirs for an aſſured token of victory: but if they hold their peace, and call vs not, let vs returne backe againe.

As therefore they approched the enemies hoſt about the beginning and brie of day, the Philiſtines ſaid the one vnto the other: The Hebrewes creepe out of their caues and dens. Then cried they out to Ionathan, and his harneſſe-bearer, ſaying: Come hither, come hither vnto vs, to the end wee may plague you according to your audacious enterpriſe. Sauls ſonne quickly taking hold of theſe their words, and eſteeming them for an ominous and aſſured token of victorie, departed with his eſquire from the place where they were firſt diſcouered, anſwering them that he would ſhortly viſit them. So withdrawing himſelfe on the other ſide of the rock, which by reaſon of the ſituation thereof was left vnguarded, ouercomming the difficultie of the place with great labour; at laſt they attained the place where the enemy was, whom they found aſleepe, and aſſai-
D ling them ſlue twentie of them, and filled the whole armie with terror and amazedneſſe: ſo that caſting away their weapons they fled amaine: ſome other being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, inuaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themſelues that onely two Hebrewes durſt neuer aſcend and enter their campe, they addreſſed themſelues to their mutuall murther and ſlaughter: ſo that ſome of them were ſlaine, others fled to eſcape the ſword, and fell headlong downe the rockes. But when as the Kings eſpials had told him what confuſion and diſorder was befallen in the campe of the Philiſtines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were abſent: and hearing that his ſonne and his harneſſe-bearer were miſſing, he commanded the high Prieſt, that attired in his pontificall ornaments, hee ſhould prophecy that which ſhould ſucceede: who aſſuring him that he ſhould obtaine the victorie ouer his enemies, hee ſallied out
E and aſſaulted the Philiſtines, and ranne vpon them, who were thus confuſed and diſordered, and whetted the one againſt the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes ſuch, as before times were fled into dens and places vnder ground, as ſoone as they heard that the victory inclined on Sauls ſide: ſo that gathering together to the number of ten thouſand Hebrewes, hee purſued his ſcattered enemies thorow all the countrey. But afterward, a great inconuenient hapned vnto Saul, proceeding from the ioy hee had conceiued by this victorie (for commonly ſuch as are bleſſed by ſuch good fortunes, are not maſters of their owne affections and reaſons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to ſatiate himſelfe with reuenge for all thoſe iniuries hee had receiued from the Philiſtines, hee publiſhed an imprecation or curſe amongſt the Hebrewes againſt any one whomſoeuer, that intermitting the chaſe and ſlaughter ſhould take ſu-
F ſtenance before night, purpoſing vntill darke night neither to giue ouer purſuite or ſlaughter. This execration thus publiſhed by Saul, it chanced that his ſonne that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his father, nor the generall ratification and allowance of the ſame by the people, falling into a certaine groue belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many ſwarmes of Bees, he by chance light vpon an hony combe, and preſſing the hony thereout, afterwards did eate the ſame. Afterwards hauing intelligence that his father had vnder a grieuous penaltie of execration, forbidden any man to taſte any ſort of meate before ſunne-ſet, hee gaue ouer eating further:

ther: yet ſaid hee, that his father had done amiſſe therein in publiſhing that prohibition, by reaſon that if they had receiued ſuſtenance, they might with greater force and forwardneſſe purſue the enemy that fled, and ouertake and ſlaughter them in great number. Killing therefore many thouſands of the Paleſtines partie, about the euening they began to ranſacke and ſpoile the campe of the Philiſtines, and bore away from thence great ſpoyles, and a wonderfull number of cattell, part of which were ſlaine and eaten with the blood, contrarie to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and ſignified to the King, how the people had offended againſt God, by ſlaughtering the beaſts, and eating the fleſh of them, before it was either waſht or purified from the blood: Saul commanded that a great ſtone ſhould be rowled into the midſt of the place, and commanded the people to kill and ſacrifice their beaſts vpon the ſame: and that they ſhould forbeare to eate the fleſh with the blood, becauſe it was not agreeable vnto God. All which was performed according as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offred a burnt ſacrifice vnto God. This was the firſt Altar that he erected. But Saul being deſirous incontinently to aſſaile the enemies campe, and ſacke all that was therein before the day ſpring, whileſt his men of warre diligently followed him, and ſhewed great forwardnes in the execution of his command: the king asked counſell of the high Prieſt Achitob, whether God would giue him the victorie, and permit thoſe that ſhould enter the enemies campe, to returne from thence with victorie. The high Prieſt certified him that God returned him no anſwer: which when he vnderſtood; it is not without cauſe, ſaid he, that God is thus ſilent, who heretofore was wont to giue a willing anſwer in that which we ought to doe: but there muſt needes be ſome hidden ſinne in vs, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be ſilent. But I ſweare by the ſame God, that although mine owne ſonne Ionathan had committed that ſinne; to the end I may appeaſe God, I will with no leſſe ſeueritie execute him, then any one ſtranger that is neither by alliance nor affinity tied vnto me. Now when the people cried out and encouraged him to the performance of that he had ſpoken, he preſently aſſembled them in one place, and he ſtanding with his ſonne apart, began by caſting lots to finde out him that was faultie. Now when the lot fell vpon Ionathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his owne conſcience he was guilty of. To whom he anſwered, I know no other thing, but that yeſterday beeing in purſuite of the enemy, and ignorant of thine edict, I taſted of a hony combe: but Saul ſwore that he would ſlay him, ſetting more by his oath, then either by kinred, nature, or affection. Hee nothing aſtoniſhed with his preſent perill, with a generous and dreadleſſe minde, preſented himſelfe with this reply: O father (ſaid he) I intreat no fauour at thy hands: for I will willingly ſubmit to that death, which may diſcharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly becauſe I haue ſeene ſo famous a victorie: For I ſhall die throughly contented to ſee the inſolencie of the Paleſtines ouermaſtred by the power of the Hebrewes. This valour and courage of the yong man mooued the whole multitude to remorſe and commiſeration: ſo that they ſwore all of them that they would not ſuffer that Ionathan, who was the author of ſo famous a victorie, ſhould be ſlaine: and therefore reſcued they the yong man from his diſpleaſed father, and made vowes vnto God to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul after he had ſlaine about ſixtie thouſand of his enemies, returned with victory to his owne home, and raigned afterwards very happily, and ouercame by force the Ammonites, Philiſtines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalechites, and King Oba that dwelt neere about him. He had three ſonnes, Ionathan, Ioſuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob, and Michol. The Generall of his army was Abner the ſonne of his vncle called Neer: for Ner and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and ſonnes of Abiel. Hee was very rich both in horſe and charriots, and againſt whatſoeuer enemy he marched forth, he alwaies returned with victorie: ſo that he reduced the affaires of the Hebrewes to a happy eſtate, and ſo much increaſed their power, that they were feared by all thoſe nations that neighboured vpon them. SAVLS victorie againſt the Amalechites.

Hedio & Ruffinus. chap. 8. 1. King. 15.

BVT Samuel comming vnto Saul, told him that hee was ſent vnto him by God, to admoniſh him how hee had choſen him aboue the reſt, and preferred him to the kingdome: and for that cauſe that it behooued him to bee obedient vnto him in all things, becauſe he ruled the people; but God both kings, kingdomes, and all things. Thus therefore (ſaid hee) doth

A doth God command thee. Since the Amalechites offered many iniuries vnto the Hebrews in the desart, whilest in their departure out of Ægypt, they trauelled into that region which they now inhabite; it behooueth thee to punish them by a most iust warre: and hauing ouercome them, that thou vtterly extinguish their memorie, without regard either of sexe or yeeres; and this reuenge shalt thou execute vpon them, in repaiment of those iniuries they in times past offered to our forefathers. Neither shalt thou spare either beast or horse, or flocke, to apply them to thy profit or particular vse: but thou shalt consecrate all vnto God, and according as Moses commanded it, deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All these things did Saul promise to performe, and supposing obedience consisted in this, not onely in the acting, but also the speedie execution of that which was enioyned him, he presently assembled all his forces to-

B gither, and mustring his souldiers at Galgal, he found about fortie thousand, besides the tribe of Iuda, which of it selfe affoorded and allowed thirtie thousand chosen men: with these did Saul enter the countrey of the Amalechites, and laid diuers ambushes neere vnto a riuer, not onely to affiict them with open and hostile warre, but also to enclose and surprise them at vnwares, and kill them amidst their hie waies: He charged them therefore, and put them to flight, and discomfited their whole armie, pursuing them that fled. Which execution of his, hauing that answerable successe (according as God had promised him before) he marched onwards, and besieged the Cities of the Amalechites, and ouercame some of them by batterie, some by mines and countermures raised on the outside: othersome by famine and thirst, and diuers other waies. And in those Cities which he ouercame, he neither spared women nor children, neither supposing

C their murther to be cruell, neither inhumane: first, for that he executed it vpon his enemie; next for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandement, towards whom his disobedience might redound to his vtter ouerthrow. He tooke Agag prisoner also, who was the King of the Amalechites, whose beautie and personage seemed vnto him so well proportioned and perfect, that he wondered therat, and thought him worthy to be kept aliue; and that not by Gods commandement, but ouercome by his owne affection, vsurping vpon an vngranted priuiledge of mercie to his owne preiudice: For God so hated the Amalechites, that he spared not their infants, who ought in naturall compassion to haue beene more pitied then the rest. But Saul kept aliue the king of his enemies, and the author of all the Hebrewes euils, setting more by his beauty then Gods commandement. This sinne of his the people presently imitated: for they spa-

D red both horse and other kind of cattell, and made prey of them, notwithstanding that God had charged them to reserue nothing. They caried away with them all other mooueables and riches, and onely consumed those things which were of smallest value by fire. This victorie had Saul ouer those people that dwell betwixt Pelusium, which is a Citie on the borders of Ægypt, vnto the red sea. But he medled not with the Sichemites, which inhabite in the middest of the Madianites, whom before the battell he had commanded to retire themselues, least they should partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied vnto them, by reason of Raguel, Moses father in law; the Hebrewes had cause to procure their safetie. Saul hauing obtained this victorie, and reioycing at his good successe, returned to his own home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel,

E before his war with the Amalechites, but as if he had precisely obserued all that which was enioyned him. But God was sore displeased, both for that the king of the Amalechites was preserued, and for that the people had made prey of their cattell: for both these actions of theirs were expressly against Gods permission. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortall King, that they should neglect and contemne his lawes and decrees, by whose onely meanes they were furthered and fauoured in their victorie. For which cause God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented him in that he had chosen Saul for their king, considering that he infringed his commandements, and gouerned himselfe according to his owne appetites. When Samuel heard these words, he was sore troubled, and besought God all the night long, that he would appease his wrath and displeasure conceiued against Saul: but notwithstanding all the importunities, and

F praiers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no sort be reconciled, because it was inconuenient that the sinnes, which were committed by Saul, should be remitted by Samuels submission and intercession. For sinne neuer more augmenteth and increaseth, then when such as are offenced are too remisse in their punishments: for whilest they would be reputed both for good and mercifull, they themselues both vnwares, and vnwittingly, become the authors of sin. When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his request, and it manifestly appeared that no praiers or supplication might appease him; as soone as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at that time remained in Galgal. Now as soone as the king perceiued him, he ranne vnto him G and embraced him, saying: I giue God thankes for the victorie, and all those things which he commanded me, I haue performed. But Samuel replied and said: How commeth it then to passe, that I heare this bleating of sheepe, and bellowing of beasts thorow the army? Saul answered, that the people had reserued that cattell for sacrifice, and that besides them, all the nation of the Amalechites was exterminated according as God had commanded, and that there was not any one remaining, but that he onely had reserued the King, whom he would cause to be presented before him, to the end they might consult together what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answered: that God tooke no pleasure in sacrifices, but such as were good and iust, and such (said he) are they that are according to his will and commandement; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God refuseth not him that sacrificeth not, but him that disobeyeth him. For he willingly accepteth not those sa- H crifices that are offered vnto him by those that submit not themselues vnto him, and offer not vnto him the true and onely offerings; yea, though they present diuers and many great sacrifices, and bring him sundry Iewels of gold and siluer, but reiecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of pietie, but testimonies of wickednesse: But he taketh pleasure in those onely that obserue that which he hath pronounced and commanded, making choise rather to die, then any waies to infringe the same: not seeking that sacrifices should be offered vnto him; but if they be offered, although of small and no value, yet are they more acceptable vnto him in pouertie and obedience, then all those which the richest hand, or strongest fortune can offoord him any waies. Know thou therefore (said he) that thou hast incurd Gods displeasure, in that thou hast I contemned and neglected his commandements: for how canst thou thinke that he will regard thy sacrifices with a gracious eye, which hee himselfe hath adiudged to vtter perdition and ruine? except thou thinke that to offer such things vnto GOD, be in effect no lesse then to seeke out death: Be assured therefore of the losse both of thy kingdome, and power, which hath in such sort transported thee, that thou hast contemned God, who bestowed the same vpon thee. But Saul confessed that he had sinned and done amisse, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alleadged he that he was compelled to doe the same, in that he durst not restraine the souldier, who was whet and kindled vpon the prey: but (said he) be fauoura-ble and mercifull vnto me, for hereafter I will take heede least I fall into the like sinne: and he besought him that he would stay with him so long whilest he might offer a peace offering in his behalfe. But he that foresaw and knew that God would be mooued by no sacrifice, began to K depart.

SAMVEL proclaimed DAVID King.

BVT Saul willing to retaine Samuel, tooke hold of his garment, and for that the Prophet hastily withdrew himselfe, he tore away a part thereof, by reason that Samuel violently withdrew himselfe from him. To whom the Prophet said, that in like sort his kingdome should be rent from him, and that another who was more honest and vpright, should take posses- L sion thereof: for God continued in his determination intended against him, because that to change and varie opinion is humane passion and not diuine puissance. Saul answered, that he had grieuously sinned, but it was impossible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithstanding besought him, that in the presence of the people he would as yet doe him honour, at such time as he should walke with him, and cast himselfe before the presence of God: which Samuel condescended vnto, and went with him to adore God. After this, Agag the king of the Amalechites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament and complaine that death was very bitter and tedious; to whom he answered in this manner following. As thou hast caused diuers mothers amongst the Hebrewes to weepe and lament the losse of their children; so shalt thou cause thy mothers sorrow and torment for thy death: which said, he presently commanded that M he should be put to death in Galgal: as for himselfe he returned backe againe to the citie of Ra-math. But the king perceiuing in himself into how many mischiefes he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chiefe city called Gaba (which name signifieth a hillock) and from that day forwards he neuermore came into the Prophet Samuel presence, who was heartily sorry for his fal: But God commanded him to giue ouer his care, & that taking with him the sacred oyle he should repaire to the city of Bethleem to Iesse the son of Obed, & that there he

The king of the Amalechites is slain by Samuels commaund. 1. Kin. 15.

God sendeth Samuel to Bethleem to annoint Dauid king.

A should annoint one of his sons for king according as he had commanded him : and when as the Prophet said that he was afraid, least Saul getting notice thereof, should either by treason or open force seeke to slay him, being encouraged and assured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed towne. In that place was he saluted with great concourse of people, and each of them inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither : who answered them that he came to offer sacrifice vnto God. Now when the oblations were performed, he inuited Iesse and his sonnes to banquet with him; and beholding the eldest of them to be faire and well proportioned, he coniectured by his stature and seemelines, that it should be he that was to be elected king; but in this matter he attained not the scope of Gods prouidence. For demanding whether he should annoynt that young man, whom in admiration he thought so worthy of the kingdome: it was answered him that men saw not in such manner as God doth. For thou (said he) beholding the beauty of the young man,

B supposest him worthy of the kingdome: but I prize not royaltie and gouernment of estate, by the beauties of the body, but by the vertues of the soule : and him require I that is perfectly furnished herewith, and hath his mind beautified with pietie, iustice, obedience and fortitude. Vpon these words Samuel commanded Iesse to bring all his other sonnes into his presence, who presented him with fiue others, the eldest of which was called Eliab, the second Aminidab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fift Rael, and the sixt Asam. Now when the Prophet beheld these likewise no lesse beautifull men then was the eldest, he asked of God which of them hee should choose for king; he answered him that he should choose neither of them: for which cause he en-

C quired of Iesse whether he had any other sons besides them: who told him that he had one which was called Dauid, who had the care and custody of his flockes. Him did the Prophet sodainly command him to send for, alledging that it was impossible for them to sit downe to the banket, except he were present. Now when Dauid was arriued according as his father had commanded him. Samuel seeing him faire in colour, quicke in eye, and otherwaies answerable to his naturall ornaments : This is he (said he in priuate to himselfe) who is accepted and elected by God to be our king. This said, hee sat downe at the table, and made the young man sit aboue him, and both Iesse his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruet of oyle in the presence of the said Dauid, he annointed him, and tolde him in his eare, how God had chosen him to bee king, and exhorted him to study iustice, and to be obedient to that which should bee commanded him, assuring him by that meanes, that his kingdome should be of long continuance, his family and stocke should be famous and renowned, and that he should ouercome the Philistins, and

D conquer those nations against whom he should fight, & obtaine glorious renowne in his life time, and leaue the same to his successors as an inheritance. Samuel hauing made this exhortation departed from him, and the spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entred into Dauid, so as hee began to prophecy, by meanes of a diuine spirit wherewith he was seised : whereas on the other side, Saul was tormented with strange passions of the euill spirit, whereby he fell into strange suffocations, and strangelings : so as his Physitians could not inuent any remedy for him, but gaue counsell that search should be made, if a man might bee found that were expert and cunning in singing and playing on the harpe, to the end that when the euill spirit should assault and trouble him, he might stand at his head, and both with voyce and instrument sing sacred hymnes before him. And when as the king had giuen present and speedy command, that such a one should bee

E sought after, one of those that were assistant told him that hee had seene in Bethleem a sonne of Iesses, a young man of excellent feature, and besides his other good parts and bringing vp, very cunning both in song and playing on the Harpe : and besides that, addrest enough and toward in feates of armes. He therefore sent messengers to Iesse to command him to withdraw Dauid from the folds, and to send him vnto him, because that hauing heard report of his beautie and valour, he was desirous to see him. This command of his did Iesse obey, and sent his sonne with presents vnto Saul the king, who greatly reioyced vpon his arriuall, and made him his pentioner, and honoured him diuers wayes. For he was refreshed by him, and was his onely Phisitian against the vexation of euill spirits, at such time as they seised and possessed him : for by reciting and singing

F Psalmes vpon his Harpe, he restored the king to his right mind : he therefore requested Iesse that he would suffer him to liue with him, and attend vpon him, because hee was so much delighted with his presence, whereunto he condescended, permitting him to dwell with the king.

A ſecond expedition of the Paleſtines againſt the Hebrewes.

The yeare of the world, 2883. before the Natiuitie of Chriſt, 1081.

NOt long time after this, the Philiſtines aſſembled themſelues, and gathered together great companies of men of warre, with whom they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and ſubdued all that which is betweene Sucoth and Azeca, where they encamped. Saul on the other ſide led foorth his army againſt them, and encamping himſelfe vpon a certen mountaine, he conſtrained the Philiſtines to diſlodge from their firſt campe, and intrench themſelues vpon an other mountaine right ouer againſt that where he pitched his tents. The campes being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended it ſelfe betweene both the armies: Into this there deſcended a certaine man called Goliah, a Gittite, of huge ſtature, beeing foure cubites and a ſpan length in height, hauing his limmes couered with huge and mightie armour: for his curets which he bare on his backe weighed fiue thouſand ſicles; his helmet and pouldrons were of braſſe, made fit to couer his maſſie members; his ſpeare which he bare in his hand was no light lance, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, and the head thereof weighed 600. ſicles, and after him there followed diuers men bearing armes. Now when he came betwixt both the armies, hee ſtood vp and cried with a loud voice, addreſſing his ſpeech to Saul, and the Hebrews in theſe tearmes: Hebrewes, what neede you to hazzard the doubtfull fortune of warre? Single me out an aduerſarie, and let vs determine by our two hazards on whoſe ſide the victory & conqueſt ſhall fall: ſo that whoſeſoeuer ſouldier ſhall be ouercome, let his party be adiudged ſubiect to their ſides whohaue the victory: for it were better that ſome one among you, then the whole army ſhould be brought in hazard. When he had ſpoken thus, he returned backe to his owne camp. The next day he came foorth againe and vſed the ſame words, and thus for forty dayes ſpace ceaſed he not to defie the Hebrewes in ſuch like words, and vnder the ſame conditions: ſo that both Saul and all his army were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelues alwaies ready and arranged in battell, although the fight was begunne on neither ſide. During the time that Saul addreſſed himſelfe to this expedition, he ſent Dauid backe againe to Ieſſe his father (contenting himſelfe with his other three brothers, who at that time ſerued vnder his royall ſtandard) where hee intended his intermitted care of keeping his flocks: But whilſt the war was rather protracted then performed, whither his father had ſent him to carry victuals to his brothers, and to know how their affaires went in the armie, and whileſt that Dauid deuiſed with his brothers, as touching thoſe things which his father had committed to his charge: he heard the Philiſtine blaſpheming and railing vpon the Hebrew army, and was therewith ſo greatly mooued, that turning himſelfe vnto his brothers, he told them that he was ready and addreſſed to fight hand to hand againſt that enemie. But Eliah the elder brother reproued him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardy then became his age, and that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to returne vnto his father, and intend his flocks. Dauid for the reuerence he bare vnto his brother departed from thence, and meeting with certaine ſoldiers, ſaid vnto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud chalenger: which they preſently ſignified vnto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeek him out. Now when he came before his preſence, he asked him what he intended to doe: O king (ſaid he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy feare ouermaſter thee. For I am hee that will abate the pride of this enemy, and encounter and enter combate with him: and how great and high ſoeuer he be, how elate and fierce ſoeuer he ſhew himſelfe, I will ſubdue him, and turne his terrour to deriſion: and ſo much the more ſhall thy glory, and the honour of thy army be enhaunced, by how much ſo great and expert a man at armes ſhall bee ſubdued by a young man, and an vnexperienced ſouldier. Saul amazed at his hardineſſe, and great courage; yet notwithſtanding, ſuſpecting him by reaſon of his yeares; told him that hee was too feeble, to encounter a man ſo expert in feates of armes: whereunto Dauid made this anſwer. That which I promiſe you (my ſoueraigne) is vnder the aſſurance which I haue in God, which heretofore I haue prooued, and the ſuccour which at other times I haue receiued at his hands. For whiles I fed my fathers flocks, I redeemed a lambe that was rauiſhed out of my fold, out of the lions iawes; and catching the wilde beaſt by the taile, that with open mouth aſſaulted and ſought to deuoure me, I beate him to the ground, and ſlue him. Neither with leſſe ſucceſſe inuaded I a Beare that ſet vpon my flocke; and as light doe I ſet by this monſter alſo: who vomiting out his ſlanderous raylings both againſt God, and men, ſhall neither eſcape the diuine arme of iuſtice which he ſo wickedly prouoketh, neither flie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him.

So

A So much preuailed this forward readineſſe in the young man, that the king beſeeching Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſhed him with a royall armour, a ſword and a helmet, and ſent him foorth to the battell. But Dauid feeling the weight of his armour, and ſeeming rather to be loaded then defenced with the ſame, ſaid vnto him: Let theſe armes (O King) ſerue to incloſe and defence thy body, who art able to beare them; and ſuffer me I beſeech thee, who am thy ſeruant, to fight according to mine owne fantaſie. He therefore laid by his armour, and tooke a ſtaffe in his hand, and fiue ſtones which he gathered on the bankes of the torrent, which he put in his ſcrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemie. Now when the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorne he asked him whether he thought him to be a dogge, that hee thus came foorth to fight with him, with weapons fitte to ſcare dogges. Nay (ſaid Dauid) I eſteeme
B thee worſer then a dogge: which ſo much peruerted Goliahs patience, that he curſed the name of his God, thundring out threates, that he would caſt out his carcaſſe to be deuoured by the beaſts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But Dauid anſwered, Thou commeſt againſt me with thy ſword, thy iauelin, and curets: but contrariwiſe, I march out againſt thee vnder the warrantiſe and protection of God, who ſhall deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole army, for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy body to the dogs whom thou reſembleſt, and all men ſhall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrewes, and that our armes and forces are the cares that it pleaſeth him to haue of vs, and that all other furniture of warre is vnprofitable, except it be aſſiſted by God. The waight of the Philiſtines armes hindred him from marching readily: ſo that he marched foote by foote towards Dauid, contemning him,
C and truſting that he ſhould kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, as alſo becauſe hee was young, and tender in yeares.

CHAP. XI.

The ſingle combate betwixt DAVID and GOLIAH, and the ſlaughter of the Philiſtines that followed after.

DAVID ſet forward to make head againſt the enemy, beeing aſſiſted by a companion whom he ſaw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the ſtones, which he had gathered on the bankes of the torrent, out of his ſcrip, and hauing fitted it to his ſling, hee
D forced it againſt Goliah, and gaue him ſuch a ſtroke on the forehead, that hee pierced him to the very braine: ſo that Goliah fell downe ſodainly dead, and he running vpon him as hee lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his owne ſword: for hee himſelfe had none. As ſoone as he was ſtrooken downe, diſcomfiture and flight ſeiſed all the army of the Philiſtines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed warriour amongſt them ouerthrowne and ſlaine, they began to ſuſpect the generall iſſue of their warre, and reſolued to retire from thence; ſo they tooke their flight in diſorder and confuſion, ſuppoſing by that meanes to deliuer themſelues out of dangers. But Saul and the whole armie of the Hebrewes ſallied out againſt them, with great ſhouts and cries; and in the purſuite made a great ſlaughter of them, and draue them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Aſcalon. In this battell there died on the Philiſtines ſide aboue thirty thouſand, and
E the reſt that were hurt and wounded, were twice as many. Saul returning backe into his campe pillaged and burnt their tents: but Dauid bore Goliahs head into his pauillion, and hung his ſword in the Tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame vnto God. But Saul afterward conceiued a priuie hatred againſt Dauid, vpon this occaſion which enſueth: For whereas hee returned triumphant like a conquerour with an armie, and the women and maidens ſinging and dauncing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meete him: The women ſung, that Saul had ſlaine diuers thouſands of the Philiſtines; and the virgins anſwered, that Dauid had ſlain diuers ten thouſands. Which when Saul vnderſtood, and ſaw that the leſſer teſtimonie of thouſands was referred to him, and that the ten thouſands were attributed to Dauid, he ſuppoſed that after ſo glorious a renowne, there wanted nothing for Dauid, except to be king. For which cauſe
F he began to feare and ſuſpect him: ſo that by reaſon of the feare he had of him, hee thought that he was too neere his owne perſon, and therefore from beeing one of the chiefeſt in authoritie about him, which was to bee one of his chiefe commanders and guard, hee made him captaine ouer a thouſand, rather reſpecting his owne ſecuritie, then the others honour; to the intent that beeing often charged by incurſions of the enemie, hee might by ſome diſaſter bee depriued of his life. But Dauid hauing in all places the aſſiſtance of almightie God, returned alwaies with with good successe and happy issue: so that for the excellency of his valour, the people intirely G

loued him: and Sauls daughter also, that was about that time marriageable, began to bee inamoured with him, and so great and apparant was her affection towards Dauid, as the certaine notice thereof came vnto her fathers eares, who was sore displeased therewith; yet hoping by that meanes the sooner to intrappe him, he gaue eare thereto with some shew of allowance, and told them who discouered their loues vnto him, that he would willingly giue him his daughter to wife, vnder pretence that the enioying of her might be the meanes of his vtter ouerthrow: For (said he) I am content to giue him my daughter in marriage, vnder that condition, that hee bring me sixe hundreth enemies heads; and he desirous to get so high and famous a reward, and in like sort to obtaine honor, by an act both so dangerous and admirable, will vndertake the execution thereof, and shall be slaine by the hands of the Philistines, and that intention which I haue conceiued against him, shall succeede according to mine owne hearts desire: for I shall be H deliuered of him, in sending him out of the world, not by my meanes, but by other mens hands. Further, he charged his Courtiers to sound and seeke out Dauids resolution, and how he was affectioned towards marriage: who beganne to deuise with him, telling him that the king bare him a most intire fauor, and that the people admitted him, and how they should procure him the marriage of the kings daughter. Whereunto Dauid replied: Thinke you it to be a small matter to be son in law vnto the king? for my selfe I esteeme otherwise, considering in especial mine own base condition, who haue neither reputation nor any honourable quality. When Sauls seruants had related vnto him what answer Dauid had made them: Tell him (said he) that I neither want goods nor presents (for that were to expose my daughter to sale, and not to match her with a husband.) I seeke for a sonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue, such as I is manifest and apparant in thee: and my desire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou giue me neither gold nor siluer, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers house; but the punishment of the Philistines, and sixe hundreth of their heads, which shall be the most desired and accepted dower thou canst present me with. My daughter also requesteth aboue all the dowers, that may accrew vnto her by order of law, to be maried to such a man that is so ennobled and famous by the ouerthrow of his enemies.

When these words were reported vnto Dauid, hee was very ioyfull, thinking that Saul spake sincerely of this affinitie: and without delay, or taking counsell or deliberation, whether the thing were easie or impossible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to goe and find out the enemy, and execute the condition, vnder which the marriage was promised him. For it was God that made all things easie and possible to Dauid: for after he had slaine K diuers of them, and cut off sixe hundred of their heads, hee returned and presented them to the king, and in consideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. Saul resolueth to kill Dauid.

Ionathã loues Dauid, and sheweth him his fathers determination, and counselleth him to haue care of his safety, and stand on his guard.

BVT Saul that could not flie from his promise (for feare least it should bee a great dishonour for him to be found a lier, or to haue promised Dauid his daughter vnder colour, either to murther him, or to draw him to the execution of things that were impossible) L deliuered his daughter Michol vnto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that mind. For perceiuing that Dauid was gracious in Gods sight, and in good reputation amongst the people, he was afraid of him: and being vnable to conceale his feare he had conceiued, to bee depriued of two things of such consequence, as were his kingdome and life, hee resolued to kill Dauid; giuing commission to his sonne Ionathan, and diuers other of his seruants to execute the same. But Ionathan amazed to see this change in his father, who in stead of the singular good liking he had of Dauid in times past, sought to hurt Dauid, not in any slight sort, but by indangering his life: and on the other side being singularly affected towards him, and respecting of his vertue, he communicated the secret and deliberation of his father with him, counselling him to haue M care of himselfe, and to flie vpon the next morrow, and that in the meane while he would go and salute his father, and as soone as the occasion presented it selfe, hee would speake and conferre with him, to know the cause of his conceiued displeasure against him, to the intent he might pacifie the same: supposing it to bee a matter vnreasonable, that hee should be depriued of life to whom the people were so much indebted, and who in particular was his esteemed and vowed friend:

A friend: yea in respect of his former merits, although he were found guiltie of many hainous offences, yet ought hee to obtaine a deserued pardon. I will tell thee afterwards (said he) what my fathers resolution is. Dauid gaue credit to his holesome counsaile, and retired himselfe from the presence of the King. The yeare of the world, 2883, before Christs Nativitie, 1281.

CHAP. XIII.

How the King practised to murther DAVID.

B THE next day after, Ionathan came vnto Saul, and finding him merry and well disposed, he began to speake vnto him to this effect, as concerning Dauid. In what fault (O Father) either great or small haue you found Dauid guilty, that you haue ordained and commanded him to be done to death? who is such a man as for the conseruation of your own person, hath bin very profitable, and besides that hath preiudiced the estate of the Philistines, and inhanced the honour of the people of the Hebrewes, and hath deliuered them from that disgrace and mockery, wherewith they haue beene curbed for the space of forty yeeres: so that he only hath dared, and opposed himselfe against the proud defies of the enemy; and since that time hath brought so many of the Philistines heads as was commanded him, in recompence whereof hee hath had my sister to wife: so that his death should be a great displeasure vnto vs, not onely by reason of the vertue wherewith he is endowed, but also through occasion of his alliance with vs in blood and consanguinitie. For by his death your daughter shall partake part of the iniurie, by reason that shee shall suffer the incommodity of widdowhood, before she hath tasted the fruits and commodities of marriage. Weight these things, and pacifie your displeasure, & do no wrong vnto such a man, who first of all hath beene the author of your so good and great fortunes, as is the conseruation of your person at such time, as you were possessed and tormented with euill spirits: and hath brought to passe that your furies are alayed: and secondly, hath reuenged you of your enemies. For it is a thing vnworthy either your maiestie or the name of a man, to forget good deserts. With these words was Saul pacified, so that he swore vnto his sonne that he would not iniure Dauid: for his iust perswasions and arguments were more stronger, then the choler and feare of the king. Ionathan sent to seeke out Dauid, and told him these good and happy tidings from his father, and brought him vnto him, where he liued and remained in sort as he did before time.

Ionathan reckoneth vp vnto his father the good deserts of Dauid praying him to pacifie his displeasure conceiued against him.

Ionathan certifieth Dauid how he hath pacified his father.

CHAP. XIIII.

How hardly DAVID escaped the ambushes that were often laid for him by the King; yet hauing him twice at aduantage and in his power, would not murther him.

ABOVT the same time, whilest the Philistines led forth their armie anew against the Hebrewes, Saul sent out Dauid against them accompanied with his forces, who encountring them slew a great number of them, and returned vnto the king with a great victorie. But Saul entertained him not, both as he deserued, and the happy exploit atchieued by him did merit; but despited and enuied his good actions and honourable deserts, as if Dauids happy successe had bin Sauls disaduantage and preiudice. But at such time as the euill spirit returned anew and both seised and vexed him, he lodged him in his owne chamber where he lay, and hauing at that time a iauelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his harp and to sing hymnes. Now whilest Dauid executed that his commandement, Saul stretching out his arme threw his dart at him; but Dauid foreseeing it, auoided the stroke, and fled into his owne house, where he soiourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the king sent out certaine of his seruants to watch his house for feare least he should escape, to the end that the next day being drawne and appearing in iudgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol Dauids wife and Sauls daughter, hauing intelligence of her fathers intention, ran vnto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he and shee were, who without his presence neither could nor would liue any longer. Beware (said he) least the sunne finde thee in this place, for he shall no more behold thee here hereafter. Flie therefore whilest the present night offereth thee opportunitie, which God doth lengthen for thy safetie sake: for be assured that if thou be surprised in this place, my father will make thee die a miserable death. This said, shee let him downe by a window, and so saued him; and incontinently after, shee prepared his bed, and trimmed it as if he lay sicke therein, and vnder the couering thereof shee laid the liuer of a new slaughtered Kid: and when her father had sent the next morning to apprehend Dauid, shee answered that he had beene sicke all the night long: then discouering the bed that was couered, shee gaue them to vnderstand that Dauid was laid therein, making them touch the couerlet vnder which the liuer stirred, and made them beleeue that the liuer that lay there was Dauid, who panted and breathed very hardly. G

Michol perswadeth the kings seruants that Dauid is sicke.

Which being signified vnto Saul, hee commanded that he should be brought vnto him in that estate wherein he was, because hee was resolued to put him to death. But when Sauls messengers were arriued and returned thither, and had discouered the bed, they perceiued Michols subtiltie, and went and certified the King thereof: who reprooued her very grieuously for that shee had saued his aduersarie, and deceiued her father. But she defended her selfe with words full of good apparance, saying, that Dauid had threatned to kill her; and how for that cause, and by the impulsion of feare, shee was drawne and induced to aide and saue him. For which cause shee ought to be pardoned, since by constraint and not of set purpose shee had furthered his escape. For (said shee) I thinke that you seeke not so greedily after the death of your enemie, as to preferre the same before the safety and security of your daughter. On these perswasions Saul pardoned his daughter. H

Michol excuseth her selfe for deliuering Dauid.

Dauid deliuered from this perill came vnto the Prophet Samul to Ramatha, and told him what ambushes the King had laid for him, and how hardly hee had escaped death by the stroke of his Iauelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, hee had alwaies shewed himselfe obedient: againe how hee had neuer ceased to warre vpon his enemies, and had by Gods assistance beene fortunate in all things, which was the cause that Saul was so displeased with him. The Prophet, I informed of Sauls iniustice, forsooke the Citie of Ramath, and led Dauid to a certaine place called Galbaath where he remained with him. But as soone as Saul was informed that Dauid was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certaine souldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him vnto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were seized with the spirit of God and began to prophecie. Which when Saul vnderstood, hee sent out others, who had the like encounter with the first. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company prophecy likewise, he was in the end so much despited, that hee came thither in his owne person. And when he drew neere the place before that Samuel saw him, hee made him prophecie; so that Saul comming towards him, was seized by aboundance of the spirit: so that he was rauished out of himselfe, and hauing despoyled himselfe of his raiment, hee lay prostrate all the day and the night long in the presence both of Samuel and Dauid. Dauid departed from thence, and went vnto Ionathan, to whom he complained of those ambushes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithstanding he had neuer committed either iniurie or fault against his father, yet did he earnestly pursue him to put him to death. Ionathan perswaded him that he should neither rashly suspect these things, nor be ouer-credulous in those reports which perhaps might be brought vnto him, but that he should trust him onely; who was assured that his father intended no euill against him: For if he had he would haue told him, who is neuer wont to act any thing without his counsell. But Dauid sware vnto him that it was so, and besought him that he would beleeue his vnfained assertions, whereby he might the more easily procure his securitie, least contemning his words, and supposing them to be fained and friuolous, he should by his death be ascertained of the sight and truth thereof: For he assured him that his father for that cause did not communicate his counsailes with him, because hee was assured of the loue and friendship that was betweene them. Ionathan sore aggrieued, that Dauid was so perswaded, and Sauls intention was such, asked him what hee desired at his hands, or wherein hee might shew him friendship. Dauid said vnto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou maist, and refuse mee in nothing. Now to morrow is the first day of the moneth, in which I was accustomed to dine at the kings table, and if thou thinkest good I will depart out of the Citie into the field, where I will lie hidden: if he aske for me, thou shalt say I am gone into the countrey of Bethleem where my tribe solemnizeth a feast; thou shalt certifie him also that thou hast giuen me leaue. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinary wish that friends vse to such as go a iourney, know that he hath no hidden rancor, nor secret malice conceiued against me; but if he answer otherwise, it shal be an assured testimony that he complotteth some mischiefe against me, and this shalt thou ascertaine me of, as both becommeth my present calamity, and our mutuall friendship, which by vowed oath thou being my Lord, hast plighted with me who am thy seruant: And if thou thinke me vnworthy of this fauour and iniurious towards thy father, without expecting the sentence of his iustice, kill me now at this present with thine owne sword. These his last words so grieuously

K L M

A grieuously strooke Ionathan to the heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request, assuring him to certifie him if he any waies could perceiue that his father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be beleeued, he caused him to walke foorth with him into the cleare and open ayre, and there sware vnto him that he would not pretermit any thing that might tend to the conseruation of Dauid. For (said he) that God that filleth and moderateth all things in this wide spred Vniuerse, and who, before I speake, knoweth my mind: he I say, shall beare witnesse of that accord which shall be ratified betweene thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father till such time as I know and haue conceiued his intention, and that I haue entred into his secrets to know what sicknes his soule is seized with; and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceale it from thee, but giue thee notice thereof, be it that he bee appeased or displeased against thee. The same God knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be
B assistant vnto thee, as also he is at this present: and that hee abandon thee neuer, but make thee Lord ouer thine enemies, yea though it were my father, or my selfe. Onely remember mee in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children, and be as fauorable towards them, as I am affected to theeward at this present. After he had sworne this oath, he dismissed Dauid; willing him to conceale himselfe in a certaine place of the Plaine, where he ordinarily exercised himselfe: For that as soone as he vnderstood his fathers mind, he would returne thither with his Page, and if (saith hee) hauing shot three shafts at the marke, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them backe againe to me, for that they are right before him, know thou that thou art to expect no euill from my father: but if thou heareſt mee speake to the contrary, thinke thou that my father is incensed and misaffected towards thee;
C yet howsoeuer it happen, I will doe my best, that nothing shal befall thee otherwaies then we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such time as thou shalt obtaine thy happy daies, and be thou fauourable vnto my children. Dauid being confirmed by Ionathans promises, retired himselfe to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnitie of the new moone, after the king was purified according to the custome, he sate downe to take his repast: Now when his sonne Ionathan was set on his right side, and Abner the Generall of his Armie on the left, Saul perceiued Dauids place was void, and spake not a word, supposing that hee was absent from that company by reason he was not purified since hee had the company of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new Moone that he was absent likewise, he asked his sonne Ionathan why Iesses sonne both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at that feast;
D who answered him that he was gone into his country (prosecuting the storie, according as it had beene concluded betweene them) alleadging that his tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assist the same. Further (said he) he inuited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assist the feast, for you know how entirely I loue the man. At this time knew Ionathan the displeasure his father had conceiued against Dauid, and perceiued most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceale his choler, but began to raile vpon his sonne, calling him rebell and his enemie, and companion and confederate with Dauid, telling him that he shewed reuerence neither to him, nor to his mother, since he was so minded: and that he would not beleeue, but that as long as Dauid liued, their royall estate should be alwaies in continuall disturbance: Hee commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he
E might doe iustice vpon him. Ionathan replyed, What euill hath Dauid committed, for which he should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choller in words and disgraces, but taking hold of a Iauelin, he assaulted him and would haue slaine him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained by his friends. At that time did Ionathan cleerely discouer the hatred that Saul bare towards Dauid, and how instantly and seriously he sought his ruine, since welny for Dauids sake he had slaine his owne and eldest sonne. Then did Ionathan withdraw himselfe from the banquet, seeing with how little profit hee had pleaded, and so much was hee grieued that hee ceased not to weepe, and the rather since welny his father had vnkindly slaine him: And seeing that Dauid was adiudged to die, hee passed all the night long without sleepe, and about the day spring hee departed out of the Citie to the appointed field, making a shew that hee walked out
F to take his exercise; but indeed it was to discouer vnto his friend the intent which his father had according as it was couenanted betweene them. After that Ionathan had done that which he had promised, and sent backe his Page into the Citie, he came vnto Dauid both to see and speake with him in priuate: who as soone as he perceiued him, cast himselfe prostrate at Ionathans feet, calling him the conseruer and maintainer of his life. But Ionathan lifted him vp from the earth, so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutuall kisses for a long time, lamented their yeares with warme teares, and their vnfortunate friendſhip with bitter ſighes: they bewailed likewiſe their future ſeparation no leſſe grieuous vnto them, then death it ſelfe. Dauid commeth to Naban or Nob to Achimelech the high Prieſt.

Dauid flying from the king and the war which he made againſt him, retyred himſelfe to the city of Nob to Achimelech the prieſt: who ſeeing Dauid come alone vnto him without either friend or ſeruant, was amazed; and deſired to know the cauſe why he thus wandred without any attendance. Dauid told him that the king had ſent him about ſome ſecret execution, which might not be communicated vnto him, although he were deſirous to know it: and as touching my ſeruants (ſaid he) I haue commanded them to attend mee in this place. He further required him, that he would giue him ſuch things as were neceſſarie for his voyage that he had to make, wherin he might performe the part of a friend, in ſuccouring him at ſuch time as he had neede of him. H

Dauid receiuing Goliahs ſword, flieth to Geth. to Achis king of the Paleſtins.

Which when he had condeſcended vnto, he requeſted him to giue him ſome armes, either ſword or iauelin (now in this place was there preſent one of Sauls ſeruants that was called Doeg, a Syrian by nation, and the paſtor of the kings mulets.) The Prieſt anſwered him, that he had no ſuch thing by him except it were Goliahs ſword, which he himſelfe had hanged in the Tabernacle & dedicated vnto God, at ſuch time as he ſlew the Philiſtine. Dauid hauing gotten it, fled out of the countrey of the Hebrewes, and went vnto Geth, a countrey of the Philiſtines, wherein Achis was king. There being knowne by the kings ſeruants, he was diſcouered and noted to bee that Dauid, that had ſlaine many thouſand Philiſtines. Dauid fearing to bee put to death by him, and ſuſpecting leaſt hee ſhould fall into the ſame danger which hee had eſcaped by flying from Saul, counterfeited himſelfe to be fooliſh and mad: ſo that the ſome frothed and iſſued out of his mouth; and counterfeited in all things ſo cunningly, that hee made the king of Geth beleeue moſt ſtedfaſtly that he was beſotted and frenzie in his ſickneſſe. For which cauſe the king was wroth with his ſeruants in that they had brought him a mad man, and commanded them with al expedition that might be, to driue him out of his countrey. Hauing in this ſort eſcaped out of the countrey of the Geths, he tranſported himſelfe into the tribe of Iuda, and beeing in the caue of Adullam, he ſent vnto his brothers to let them vnderſtand that he was there, who came vnto him with all their linage: and diuers others that either were in need or ſtood in feare of Saul, reſorted vnto him, ſaying, that they were ready to performe whatſoeuer he ſhould command them: all which amounted to the number of foure hundreth or thereabouts. Dauid therfore being thus aſſured, by reaſon of the ſuccours and forces that came vnto him, diſlodged from thence & went to the king of the Moabites, beſeeching him that he would be pleaſed to entertaine his father and mother in that countrey, vntill ſuch time as hee vnderſtood what ſhould be the iſſue or end of his affaires. The King vouchſafed him this fauour, and did them great honour all the time they were in his countrey. And as touching Dauid, he hauing receiued inſtructions by the commandement of the Prophet to abandon the deſart, and to ſoiourne in the tribe of Iuda: he obeied him; ſo that comming to Saron, hee made his aboade in that place. But when Saul had vnderſtood that Dauid had beene ſeene with a number of men, hee fell into an extraordinarie feare and trouble of minde: for knowing both the vnderſtanding and courage of the man, he thought inwardly with himſelfe that hee would attempt no action that was not great, and ſuch a one as might not onely endanger his kingdome, or at leaſtwiſe breede him much difficultie and labour. For which cauſe, aſſembling his friends and captaines, and thoſe of his tribe in Gaba where hee kept his royall court, there ſitting in a place called Aror, where all his honourable and ciuill magiſtrates, with the reſt of his Captaines and ſouldiers enuironed him round about, he ſpake vnto them after this manner. Beloued friends, I know that you can beare witneſſe of my bountie, and how I haue aduanced ſome of you to honours, ſigniories and poſſeſſions, and haue preferred you to the chiefeſt dignities and prerogatiues amongſt the people. Now would I know of you whether you hope or expect from the ſonne of Ieſſe greater bounty and larger benefits, then I haue beſtowed vpon you: I know that all of you are confederated with him, and that my ſonne Ionathan likewiſe is of the ſame faction, and hath perſwaded you to follow and fauour him. For I am not ignorant both of the oathes and couenants that are paſt twixt him and Dauid, and am well aſſured that hee is both a counſeller and aſſiſter vnto him in whatſoeuer hee vndertaketh againſt me: yet are none of you touched with theſe cares; but intending your owne quiet, you expect the euent of theſe matters. A the Syrian maſter of the kings mulets, aroſe and ſaid: That he had ſeene Dauid in the Citie of Nob, who reſorted to the high Prieſt Achimelech, to aske counſel of him as touching his affaires; that there he had receiued thoſe things that were needfull to furniſh him in his voyage, and Goliahs ſword likewiſe; and how he was ſafely conducted towards the place whither he pretended to goe. Hereupon Saul ſent for the high Prieſt and all his kinred, and ſpake thus vnto him. What wrong or diſpleaſure haue I done thee, that thou haſt entertained the ſonne of Ieſſe? and haſt deliuered him victuals and armes; to him, I ſay, that ſeeketh but the meanes to poſſeſſe himſelfe of my kingdome? What anſwer haſt thou made him as touching thoſe demands he preſented thee, in regard of his future fortunes? for thou haſt not beene ignorant that he fled from me, and what hatred he beares againſt both me and my family. The high Prieſt denied none of theſe
B things, but freely confeſſed that he had deliuered him ſuch things as were reported, but not with an intent to gratifie Dauid, but the king: for I entertained him (ſaid he) not as thine enemy, but as thy faithfull miniſter and tribune; nay which is more, as thy ſonne in law, and ſuch a one as was tyed vnto thee by neere alliance. For who would haue thought, that he, who was intituled to ſo much honour by thee, ſhould be thine enemy: nay rather, who would not eſteeme him for thy fauourite and neereſt friend? And whereas he asked counſell of me as touching Gods will, this is not the firſt time, I haue anſwered him, but oft and many other times haue I aduiſed him. And where as he ſaid, that he was ſent by thee about ſome haſtie and ſecret buſineſſe, ſhould I haue refuſed him thoſe ſupplies which he required at my hands, I might haue bin iudged rather to haue done iniurie to thy maieſtie then to him. For which cauſe thou art not to ſuſpect or thinke euill
C of me; or if thou haſt receiued any aduertiſement, that Dauid at this time intendeth ſome trouble and innouation againſt thee, oughteſt thou to think that by reaſon of the curteſie I haue ſhewed him, that I either fauour him or maintaine him againſt thee: for what I beſtowed, I imployed as on thy friend, thy ſonne in law and thy tribune; and whatſoeuer curteſie he receiued from me, it was done vnto thee. Notwithſtanding all theſe iuſt allegations, yet could Saul be no waies induced to beleeue them: but contrariwiſe, his vehement feare made him ſuſpect the true iuſtifications of Achimelech: ſo that he commanded certaine armed men that were about him, that they ſhould put both him and all his family to the ſword. But when they held it no leſſe then ſacriledge, to violate by violent death ſuch as were men conſecrated vnto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to perpetrate the ſlaughter, who ioyning to himſelfe certaine other ſacrilegious
D and impious men, he murthered Achimelech and all his race, who were in number three hundreth, thirtie and fiue men. He further ſent to Nob the citie of the Prieſts, and put all of them vnto the ſword, neither ſparing woman nor childe, nor hauing reſpect vnto any other age, but conſumed the whole Citie with fire, onely one ſonne of Achimelech eſcaped, who was called Abiathar. All which befortuned according as God had foretold the high Prieſt Eli, ſaying, that by reaſon of the tranſgreſſion of his two ſonnes, his poſteritie ſhould be extinguiſhed.

This cruell and malicious act perpetrated by king Saul (in extinguiſhing all the race of the ſacerdotall order, without compaſſion either of Infants, or reuerence of old age: this deſtruction of his of that Citie, which God had choſen to bee the countrey and common nurſe of the Prieſts and Prophets, and which he elected to be a receptacle and refuge of all that ſort of men)
E manifeſtly expreſſeth and declareth vnto all men, how depraued and corrupt the minds of men are. For ſo long as they are humble, and limited by a baſe and priuate eſtate, becauſe they neither dare nor can haue libertie to giue ſcope to their vnbridled natures: they ſeeme to be good and iuſt men; and make ſhew of a wonderfull ſtudie of iuſtice, accompanying the ſame with pietie, and are perſwaded that God is preſent in all our actions: finally, that he beholdeth all our cogitations. But no ſooner haue they attained to power and empire, laying aſide their former and reformed manners, and taking vpon them as it were in a ſtage play, both a new habite and another perſonage, but they are deuoured in all audaciouſneſſe and inſolencie, and contempt of both diuine and humane lawes. And when as to ouercome their enuie they had moſt neede of pietie and iuſtice; and when as not onely all their actions, but alſo their wils are expoſed to all
F mens eyes: then moſt of all, as if either God diſſembled, or feared their power, they exerciſe their tyrannies vpon their ſubiects; and whatſoeuer they decree, either through vaine feare, hatred or vnreaſonable fauour, that ſuppoſe they both to be ratified by men, and allowed by God: being altogether depriued of either reſpect or reaſon of thoſe things that are to come. For whatſoeuer they be that ſpend their many and vnexhauſted labours in their ſeruice, thoſe doe they firſt preferre: and afterwards when they haue loaden them with the burthen of dignities, they through enuie not onely depriue of thoſe dignities, but through ſlander alſo doe oftentimes oppreſſe oppreſſe them, not conſidering how deſeruedly they oppreſſe, but onely giuing credit without G proofe to raſh and ſcandalous detractions, executing and ſatiating their rage, not on thoſe they ought to puniſh, but thoſe that may moſt eaſily be depreſſed and ouerthrowne. The manifeſt example hereof appeareth vnto vs in Saul the ſonne of Cis: who after the gouernment of the nobility was extinct, and the ſupreame magiſtracie of Iudges was diſannulled, beeing the firſt created King of the Hebrewes, onely for that hee ſuſpected Achimelech, he ſlew three hundreth prieſts and prophets, and after he had ſlaine them deſtroyed their citie with fire; and as much as in him lay, depriued the high Temple of God, not only of prieſts but ſacred miniſters; and after ſo hideous a ſlaughter, neither ſpared their countrey nor any of their offspring to be left aliue. But Abiathar Achimelechs ſonne, who onely eſcaped with life amidſt all his ſlaughtered family, flying vnto Dauid, declared vnto him both the ouerthrow of his family and the death of his father. Dauid anſwered him, that hee expected no leſſe then that which hapned, at ſuch time as hee eſpied H Doeg there, who as his minde gaue him would not faile to reprooue and ſcandale Achimelech to Saul: yet tooke he it on him that the misfortune hapned vnto his friend by his meanes: he therefore praied him to remaine with him, becauſe he could not be concealed or ſecured in any place better then with himſelfe.

Abiathar eſcaping from Sauls hands, telleth Dauid of the ſlaughter of Achimelech his father, and of the prieſts.

About the ſame time, Dauid vnderſtanding that the Philiſtines made a road into the countrey of Cilla, and preied the ſame, determined to aſſault them, if after the Prophet had asked counſell of God, hee ſhould bee by the oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordingly falling out, hee ſallied out accompanied by his friends, and ſet vpon the Philiſtines, and made a great ſlaughter of them, and recouered a very rich prey, and gaue conuoy to the Cillans, till I ſuch time as they had ſafely gathered in and houſed all their corne and fruite. The rumour of this his exploite was preſently brought vnto Saul: for this noble act and happy execution was not onely not ſhut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renowne thereof was diſperſed euery where both in other mens eares as alſo in the Kings, and both the action and the author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very ioyfull to heare that Dauid was in Cilla, and ſaid thus: God hath deliuered him into my hands, by inforcing him to ſhut vp himſelfe within a citie incloſed with wals, gates, and bares: whereupon he ſodainly gaue commandement that all the people ſhould march againſt Cilla, and beſiege the ſame, and ſurpriſe or kill Dauid.

Dauid defendeth Cilla againſt the incurſions of the Paleſtines. 1. Kin. 23.

Saul ſeeketh to beſiege Dauid in Cilla.

But Dauid hauing intelligence hereof, and aduertiſed by God that if hee ſtaied among the Cillans, they would deliuer him into the hands of Saul, hee tooke with him his foure hun- K dreth men, and retired himſelfe from the Citie into the deſart, and encamped on a defenced hill called Engaddi: ſo that the King being aduertiſed that he was fled from the Cillans, ceaſed to iſſue out in armes againſt him. From thence Dauid departed to a certaine place of the Ziphians, where Ionathan Sauls ſonne met with him, and after hee had embraced him, hee exhorted him to bee of good cheere, and to conceiue an aſſured hope of future good fortune, and not to giue place to his preſent miſeries, by reaſon that he ſhould obtaine the kingdome, and ſhould haue the whole power of the Hebrewes ſubiected vnto him; but that ſuch things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great trauailes: and after they had once more renued the oath of mutuall and laſting amitie and faith betweene them, during all the time of their L liues, calling God to witneſſe with imprecations againſt him, that ſhould contradict or in any ſort change thoſe conuentions; Ionathan left Dauid ſomewhat eaſed in heart, and disburdened of his conceiued feare, and that done, returned to his owne home. But the Ziphians intending to gratifie Saul, tolde him that Dauid was amongſt them, and promiſed him to deliuer him priſoner into his hands, if ſo be hee would iſſue out againſt him: inſomuch as if hee would ſeize all the ſtreights of the countrey, it ſhould bee impoſſible for him to flie into any other place. The king praiſed their forwardneſſe, and promiſed them to requite their loyalty, and to remunerate them ſhortly for this their good affection, and withall ſent out certaine men to ſeeke out Dauid and to beake ouer the forreſt, promiſing them that ſhortly hee would follow after them. Thus did the gouernours & princes of the Ziphians offer themſelues vnto the king to ſearch out M and apprehend him, expreſſing their affection therein, not onely in outward ſhew, but alſo with their whole power labouring what they might, that ſurpriſing him they might deliuer him to the Kings hands. But their iniuſt deſire had as infortunate ſucceſſe: who beeing to incurre no perill by concealing him from purſuite, promiſed to betray into the kings hands through adulation and auarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully perſecuted to death by his enemies. For Dauid beeing made priuie to their malice, and aſcertained of the Kings approach, leauing

A thoſe narrow ſtraights wherin they then incamped, eſcaped to a certaine rock which is ſituate in the deſarts of Simon: Neither deſiſted Saul to purſue him; for knowing by the way that he had ouercome the ſtraights, he came to the other ſide of the rock, & Dauid had ſurely both bin taken and circumuented, had not the king been reuoked by fearfull tidings, which aſſured him that the Paleſtines had forcibly entred and ſpoiled his kingdome. For he thought it more conuenient to reuenge himſelfe on thoſe his hoſtile and ſworne enemies, and to giue ſuccour to his country and people, being ready to be ſpoiled and waſted, then vnder deſire to lay hands on a priuate enemie, to betray both his country and ſubiects to their ſwords; and thus was Dauid ſaued beyond all expectation, and retired himſelfe to the ſtraights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulſed the Paleſtines, certaine newes was brought him that Dauid dwelt in the ſtraights of Engaddi: where-
B upon, preſently taking with him three thouſand of the choiſeſt men in all his army, hee led them ſpeedily to the forenamed place, and being not far from thence, he perceiued neere vnto the high way, a deepe, hollow, large, long and open caue, whereas Dauid with his foure hundred men might be hidden, and deſcended himſelfe alone into the caue to disburthen the neceſſities of nature. This was preſently diſcouered by one of Dauids followers, who told him that GOD had preſented him a fit opportunity to reuenge him on his enemy, and counſelled him to cut off Sauls head, and to diſcharge himſelfe thereby of much trouble and torment; who ariſing and finding him out, onely cut off the lap of the veſture wherewith Saul was attired, and preſently thereupon repented himſelfe, ſaying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by elec-
C tion had raiſed to the eſtate of Maieſty and Empire. For (ſaid he) although he be vniuſt toward me, yet ought I not to be iniurious towards him.

But when Saul was iſſued out of the caue, Dauid went out after, and cried with a loud voice, beſeeching Saul that he would giue him audience: who turning back vnto him, he caſt himſelfe proſtrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the cuſtome, and ſpake after this manner; How vnworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy eares to ſcandalous backbiters, and giuing truſt and credit to vaine and looſe men, thou ſuſpecteſt thy moſt tried friends, whom thou rather oughteſt to iudge by their ſincere and vpright actions: for words may be either falſe or true, but the mind may bee diſcouered by none more apparant arguments then by mens actions: as at this preſent thou maiſt iudge, whether thou haſt raſhly beleeued them, that make mee

E Dauid, began to weep, & Dauid wept alſo: but Saul ſaid that he had greater cauſe to lament then he. For, ſaid he, by thy meanes haue I receiued many benefits, and thou at my hands haſt been repaied with infinite iniuries. This day haſt thou teſtified that thou retaineſt the ancient iuſtice of thy progenitors, who commanded that their enemies ſhould be diſmiſſed with life, at ſuch time as they were ſurpriſed in the deſart: now am I thorowly perſwaded that God hath reſerued the kingdom for thee, & that the Empire of all the Hebrews attendeth thee. Aſſure thou me therfore by an oth, that thou wilt not exterminate my race, neither remember thee of thoſe iniuries I haue done vnto thee, but that ſparing my poſterity, thou warrantiſe and keep them vnder thy protection. Dauid ſware vnto him according as hee had required, and ſuffered him to returne into his Realme, and both he and his companies retired themſelues to the ſtraights of Maſpha. About the F ſame time died Samuel the prophet, a man who by his merit was in great eſtimation amongſt the Hebrews, the famous teſtimony of whoſe vertue, and the peoples obſeruation towards him, was expreſſed in this, in that they celebrated his funerall, and ſet out his ſepulcher with great pompe: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented him many daies, not after the manner of a common or forraine miſery, but as if each one of them had in particular a preiudice and loſſe to lament for. For, he was a man that was naturally framed to all iuſtice and goodneſſe, and for theſe his vertues moſt acceptable vnto God. Hee gouerned the people after the death of Eli the high Prieſt, firſt in his owne perſon for the ſpace of twelue yeares, and afterwards during the raigne of Saul eighteene yeeres, whoſe death hapned (as I ſaid) about this time. But in thoſe places where Dauid at that time remained, there was a certen Ziphian in a towne called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattell. For he had a troupe of three thouſand ſheepe, and a heard of a thouſand Goats. On theſe did Dauid command his people to commit no waſte; neither thorow deſire, nor neceſſitie, nor hope of concealement, they ſhould doe him any hurt. Charging them moreouer, that they ſhould offer no wrong vnto any man, becauſe that to violate and take another mans goods, was both vnlawfull and wicked, and contrary to Gods commandement. He inſtructed them in this ſort, imagining with himſelfe, that he ſhould gratifie a good man, and ſuch a one as deſerued to be in like ſort fauoured: but Nabal (for ſuch was his name) was a rude and curriſh perſon, leading his life in hunting. Yet had he a wife that was good, wiſe and faire.

Nabals flocks ſpared by Dauid.

To this Nabal did Dauid ſend tenne of his ſeruants about the time of his ſheepe-ſhearing, both to ſalute him, as alſo to wiſh him all good, and to beſeech God, that for diuers yeares he would grant him grace to doe the like. Meane while he requeſted him, that hee would impart vnto him ſomewhat of that which was in his power, when as his ſheepheards could informe him, that hauing long time remained in the deſart, wee haue, ſaid they, beene ſo farre off from doing your flocks any harme, as we haue rather ſeemed to be their ſheepheards and keepers: they promiſed him likewiſe, that whatſoeuer curteſie he ſhould ſhew vnto Dauid, he ſhould beſtow it on a mindfull and thankfull perſonage. Thus ſpake the meſſengers vnto Nabal: but hee anſwered them very diſcourteouſly, and rudely, demanding of them what that Dauid was; and beeing informed that he was the ſonne of Ieſſe: Now, (ſaid he) theſe fugitiues and ſlaues forſaking their Maſters, liue proudly and inſolently.

Dauids embaſſage to Nabal to require reliefe, and his curriſh anſwer.

Dauid, hearing of this report, was grieuouſly diſpleaſed, and commanded foure hundred of his men to take vp their weapons and follow him, commanding two hundred to keepe the baggage (for at that time he had ſixe hundreth) and in this equipage marched hee forward againſt Nabal, ſwearing, that that very night he would vtterly exterminate and root out all his race, and ranſacke all his riches. Neither was he only diſpleaſed for that Nabal was ingratefull towards them, without reſpect of that humanity which they had ſhewed towards him, and his; but alſo, forthat without any cauſe of iniury offered, he had iniured and outraged him in words.

Dauid ſallieth out againſt Nabal with 400. armed men.

In the meane while, certaine ſheepheards that attended Nabals cattell, told their Miſtreſſe their Maſters wife, that Dauid hauing ſent vnto her husband to requite ſome ſmall courteſie, had not onely obtained nothing, but alſo receiued inſupportable iniuries, whereas till that day he had ſuffered his flocks to be vntouched: telling her that that inſolency of their Lord, might breede them all much woe and miſery. Which when Abigal heard (for ſo was the woman called) ſhe loded diuers Aſſes with all ſorts of preſents (without making any motion to her husband, who was ſo drunke that he was inſenſible) and went towards Dauid. As therefore ſhe deſcended the ſtraights of the mountaine, Dauid encountred her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with foure hundred men: As ſoone as Abigal perceiued him, ſhe leaped from her Steed, and falling vpon her face, ſhe proſtrated her ſelfe before him, beſeeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was anſwerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal ſignifieth folly: ſhe excuſed her ſelfe likewiſe, ſaying, that ſhe ſaw none of them that were ſent vnto her husband. For which cauſe ſhe ſaid, I beſeech thee grant me pardon, and giue God thanks, that by my means he hath hindered you from polluting your hands in innocent blood: for if thou remaine pure and innocent from bloudſhed, he ſhall exact a puniſhment at their hands that haue hurt thee. For thoſe misfortunes that attend on Nabal, ſhall fall on the heads of thine enemies: onely be thou fauourable vnto me in accepting theſe my humble preſents, and for my ſake remit that wrath which thou haſt iuſtly conceiued againſt my husband: for clemency and humanity becommeth him whom the Fates haue deſtinated a kingdome. Dauid accepting her preſents, gaue her an anſwer after this manner. Woman, ſaid he, GOD of his goodneſſe hath this day brought thee hither, otherwiſe, thou haddeſt not liued, or ſeene the next morning. For I haue ſworne, that this night I would ouerthrow thy houſe, and leaue none aliue of that vngratefull mans family, who hath ſo contumeliouſly abuſed both me and mine: but now God hath put thee in mind wiſely to preuent and pacifie my wrath.

As touching Nabal, although at this preſent hee bee exempted by thy meanes from puniſhment, yet ſhall hee not eſcape, but he ſhall loſe his life: for his manners vpon an other occaſion ſhall be the cauſe of his ruine. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abigal: who returning to her houſe, and finding

Dauids prophecy of Nabal.

A ding her hus husband amidſt his other companions, loden and ouerwhelmed in wine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day when he was ſober, certifying him thereof, he loſt all his forces, and his body became mortified through the griefe he conceiued at her words. ſo that ſome tenne daies after and no more, he departed out of this life. Which when Dauid vnderſtood, he ſaid that he was deſeruedly puniſhed by God, becauſe that his owne wickedneſſe was the cauſe of his puniſhment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who receiued the iniurie were vndiſtained with blood: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can eſcape Gods iudgement, and that all humane affaires are not raſhly diſpoſed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodneſſe, and the wicked puniſhed according to their wickedneſſe. He afterwards ſent meſſengers to his wife, and cauſed her to come vnto him, to the intent he might marrie her, and take her to his wife. Shee anſwered the meſſen-

B gers, that ſhe thought her ſelfe vnworthie to lie at his feete: notwithſtanding ſhe repaired vnto him with all her furniture and meanes whatſoeuer, and was married to Dauid, hauing obtained that degree of honour, both in that ſhe was modeſt and iuſt, as alſo for that ſhe was beautifull. Now Dauid had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the Citie of Abeſar.

As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gaue her to wife at Liſſa to the ſonne of Phalti of the Citie of Gethla. After this, certaine Ziphians comming vnto Saul, told him that Dauid was returned againe into their countrey, and that if it pleaſed him to aſſiſt them, they might eaſily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul iſſued with three thouſand armed men, and being ſurpriſed by night, he incamped in a certaine place called Sicelleg.

When Dauid was certified that Saul was iſſued forth againſt him, he ſent out certaine Spies,

C whom he gaue in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired, who aſcertaining him that he was at Sicelleg; he watched all that night without the knowledge of any of his followers, and went into Sauls campe, attended onely by Abiſai his ſiſter Saruias ſonne, and Achimelech the Chittite.

Now whilſt Saul was aſleepe, and both his generall Abner withall his ſouldiers wholly deuoured in drowſineſſe, Dauid entred into the kings campe: and although he knew the kings pauilion, by reaſon of his Iauelin that ſtood at the doore therof, yet ſlew he him not, neither permitted he Abiſai, who was both willing and addreſſed to execute the ſlaughter, to performe it. But this he ſaid, that although the king were euill, yet notwithſtanding it were a ſtrange and vndecent thing for him, to ſlay him who was Gods elected: for that it was Gods right to take reuenge on him,

D who had giuen the kingdome: and thus reſtrained he the others vnbridled furie. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that hauing the opportunitie to ſlay him, he had ſpared his life; he bare away with him his Iauelin, and the pitcher of water that ſtood by Saul whilſt he ſlept, without the witting or knowledge of any of the campe: ſo much were they deuoured and onerhaled with ſleepe. He therefore departed thence in all aſſurance, hauing executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to doe. But after he had paſſed the riuer, and had attained the top of a mountaine, from whence he might be eaſily heard, he cried out to Sauls ſouldiers, and their generall Abner ſo ſtrongly, that he awaked them from their ſleepe; and calling vpon Abner as well as the common ſort of ſouldiers, the generall asked who it was that called him? to whom Dauid anſwered, It is I, the ſonne of Ieſſe, your fugitiue: but, ſaid he, how

E commeth it to paſſe, that thou who art ſo great, and in chiefeſt authoritie about the king, haſt ſo ſmall reſpect and guard of his perſon? Thy ſleepe is more pleaſant vnto thee then thy watch for his conſeruation. Aſſuredly this act of thine deſerueth a capitall puniſhment, becauſe thou neither haſt diſcouered me, nor any others before we entred the campe, or approched the king. Seeke for the kings Iauelin and his pitcher of water, and thou ſhalt perceiue in what great danger he hath beene euen in the midſt of you, without any notice or diſcouery of yours.

Saul perceiuing that it was Dauids voice, and conceiued how that being in his hands (whom he had ſurpriſed in the depth of ſleep, through the negligence of his guard) he had not ſlaine him, but pardoned him his life, although it iuſtly lay in his power to take his head from him: he ſaid, that he gaue him thankes, and acknowledged his life from him; exhorting him to be aſſured, and

F without ſuſpect of any euill to returne home vnto his houſe, becauſe he was perſwaded, that he loued not himſelfe ſo much, as he was intirely affected by Dauid; notwithſtanding that he had purſued him, and for a long time paſt had chaſed him like a fugitiue, conſtraining him alſo by diuers afflictions and great torments of ſpirit, to be abandoned from his deereſt parents & friends: yea from Dauid himſelf, who might haue preſerued him, and who had giuen him diuers demonſtrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had beene oftentimes preſerued; whom notwith-

notwithstanding he ceased not to pursue vnto the death, who contrariwise desired nothing more G

Hereupon Dauid willed him to send some one of his seruants to bring backe his Iauelin and pitcher of water: protesting that God should be Iudge of both their natures, manners and actions, who knew that that day also hee had spared his enemie, whom if he had so thought good, he might haue extinguished.

The yeere of the world, 2889. before Christs Natiuitie, 1075.

Saul hauing this second time escaped from Dauids hands, returned to his royall house. But Dauid, fearing least if he soiourned in that place he should be intrapped by Saul, thought good to retire himselfe into the countrey of the Philistines and soiourne there. So that accompanied with sixe hundred men which he had with him, he transported himselfe to Achis king of Geth, one of their fiue Cities; who receiued him with all his people, & gaue him a place to dwell in: so that he aboad in Geth, hauing with him his two wiues, Achinaas and Abigal. Which when Saul vnderstood, he made no more account to send or sally out against him, because that two seuerall H times he had bin in danger of his life, at such time as he pursued him to intrap him. Dauid held it not conuenient to remaine in the Citie of Geth, and therefore requested the king of the Philistines, that sith he had curteously entertained him, it might please him likewise to do him the fauour to assigne him a certaine place in his countrey, where he might make his habitation, because he feared to be chargeable to him, if so be he remained in the citie. Achis assigned to him a village called Siceleg, which Dauid after he obtained the kingdome, loued and honoured, holding that for his owne demaine, as his owne children and heires did after him. But hereof will we speake in another place. The time that Dauid liued amongst the Philistines and in the towne of Siceleg, were foure moneths and twentie daies; during which time, by seuerall and secret excursions against the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he spoiled their countrey and returned I backe againe with a great bootie of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bondmen, least Achis by their meanes should haue intelligence of his enterprise. He sent likewise a part of the prey vnto the king, and when he demanded from whom he had taken the same, he answered that he had taken it from the Iewes that dwelt Southward and in the Plaine, perswading him that he had done no losse: so that Achis conceiued an opinion, that since Dauid warred against his owne nation all the time of his aboad with him, he would be a faithfull seruant vnto him. About the same time, the Philistines hauing determined to lead forth their armie against the Israelites, sent out to their allies, requiring them to assist them in that warre, and to make their Rendeuous at Renga, to the intent that being there assembled, they might dislodge and assaile the Israelites. Amongst their other auxiliarie companies, Achis had requested Dauid to assist him, with his sixe K hundred souldiers: which he promised him willingly to performe, telling him that the opportunitie was now come wherein he might requite his curtesie, and the hospitalitie he had shewed him. Achis promised him that after the victorie, when as all things had succeeded according as he desired, he would preferre Dauid to the guard of his person; thinking by the promise of this honour and trust, he might augment Dauids forwardnesse and affection towards him.

BVT Saul about this time had banished all Diuiners and Inchanters, and in generall, all such as were tellers of fortunes, reseruing none within his countrey, but the Prophets. When as therfore he vnderstood that the Palestines were already vp in armes, and strongly encamped neere to the Citie of Sonna, situate in the Plaine, he marched forward and made head against them with all his forces. And as soone as he drew neere to the mountaine of Gelboa, he incamped right ouer against the enemie. Now when his armie discouered their great forces, they were much discomforted, and no sooner beheld it but were amazed. Being therfore sore troubled herewith, he sought counsell at Gods hands as touching the euent of the battell: and seeing he returned him no answer, his heart more & more failed him, in that he manifestly perceiued M what sinister successe would betide him, if God should not assist him in the conflict. He therefore commanded that they should search him out some Pythonissa or cunning enchantresse, who inuocated and raised the spirits of the dead, to the end that by her means he might know if his wars should haue that successe which he pretended (for the Diuiners which gaue answer by the belly, which the Greekes call Engastrimythes, declare their aduentures to those that aske them.) And when

Saul banisheth all diuiners and enchanters out of his kingdome.
Saul hearing the Philistines made head against him, asked counsel of God,

A when as by the report of a certaine familiar friend of his, he was aduertiſed that there was ſuch a one at Endor, vnwitting to his whole armie, and laying aſide his royall habites, and attended onely by two, whom he eſteemed for his moſt faithfull ſeruants, he repaired to Endor to this woman, requiring her to diuine and raiſe vp the ſpirit of him whom he ſhould name. The woman denied, and ſaid, that ſhe ought not to contradict the kings edict, who had driuen out of his Realme all ſuch ſort of Soothſayers, telling him that he did not well, that hauing receiued no wrong at her hands, he ſhould thus ſound her, and ſeeke to bring her in lapſe of the kings lawes, and cauſe her to be puniſhed. But Saul ſwore vnto her, that no man ſhould know thereof, and that he would not diſcouer her diuination to others: briefely, that ſhee ſhould incurre no danger thereby.

Saul repaireth to Endor to aske counſell of a Sorcereſſe.

B After then that by his oathes and proteſtations he had perſwaded her, that ſhe ſhould haue no cauſe to feare, he commanded her to raiſe the ſpirit of Samuel. Shee not knowing what Samuel was, called him from hell, and he ſuddainly appeared. But when ſhe perceiued that it was an honourable man, and of diuine ſemblance, ſhe was ſore troubled; and being wholly diſcomforted with this viſion, ſhe turned and ſaid vnto the king: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no leſſe. Saul confeſſed that it was he, and asked her for what cauſe ſhe ſeemed to be ſo much troubled: She anſwered, that ſhe ſaw a man aſcend that reſembled God. Saul commanded her to declare vnto him his ſhape, habite and age: and ſhe gaue him to vnderſtand that he was a reuerend old man, attired in the veſtment of a high prieſt. By theſe markes Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, proſtrating himſelfe on the earth, he adored and ſaluted him. The ſpirit of Samuel asked him for what cauſe he had troubled and raiſed him. To whom he complained and lamented that he was inforced thereunto by neceſſitie: for that a grieuous hoſt of his enemies were at hand, and that voide of counſell he was forſaken by God, hauing from him no prediction, either by prophecie or dreame: for which cauſe, ſaid he, I made my recourſe vnto thee, who haſt alwaies had care both of me and my fortunes. But Samuel, foreſeeing that the kings death was hard at hand, anſwered him that it was in vaine for him to queſtion with him, as touching thoſe things that ſhould happen, ſince thou knoweſt that thou art forſaken by God. Know therefore, ſaid he, that Dauid ſhall poſſeſſe the kingdome, and that it is he that ſhall eſtabliſh the eſtate by armes: but as concerning thy ſelfe, thou ſhalt loſe both thy kingdome and thy life, becauſe thou haſt diſobeyed GOD in thy warre againſt the Amalechites, and haſt not obſerued his commandements, according as I foretold thee at ſuch time as I was aliue. Know therefore, that thy people and hoſt ſhall be diſcomfited by the enemie, and that both thou and thy ſonnes ſhall be to morrow ſlaine in the battell, and be with me. When Saul vnderſtood theſe things, he became ſpeechleſſe, through the ſorrow wherewith he was ſeaſed, and fell downe on the pauement, either for that his forces failed him through ſuddaine griefe, or for his want of meat; becauſe that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchſafed his body any refection or ſuſtenance.

Saul commandeth the witch to raiſe Samuels ghoſt.

Saul complaineth him of his miſeries to Samuel, and asketh his aduiſe.

Samuels ghoſt certifieth Saul of the euent of his battell againſt the Philiſtines.

Saul through ſodain ſorrow fell in a ſwoune.

At length, hardly recouering himſelfe out of this ſwoune, the woman importuned him to receiue ſome ſuſtenance, beſeeching him to doe her that fauour in recompence of her vnexpected diuination; which though interdicted, ſhe had aduentured to performe for his ſake (before ſhee were aſcertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in conſideration whereof, ſhe prayed him, that ſitting downe at the table, hee would refreſh himſelfe with ſome ſuſtenance, to the end he might be the more able to returne vnto his army. And although he reſiſted and vtterly refuſed to eate, in that he had no appetite, and was vtterly deſperate; yet ſo effectually importuned ſhee, that finally ſhe perſwaded him to receiue ſome little nouriſhment. And whereas ſhe had but one calfe which ſhe bred vp in her houſe with ſome particular care (for ſhe was but a poore woman, and had no other riches) yet ſpared ſhe not to kill it, and dreſſe the fleſh for Saul and his ſeruants. Thus refected, Saul returned back againe into his camp. The curteſie of this woman deſerueth to be praiſed: for, although ſhe knew that the king had prohibited her art, whereby both ſhe and her family ſufficiently maintained themſelues: and although before that time ſhee had neuer ſeene Saul; yet ſo it is, that without remembring her that it was he by whom her art had bin condemned, ſhee entertained him not as a ſtranger, or like the man ſhee had neuer ſeene before; but had compaſſion of him and comforted him, exhorting him to eate, although he refuſed it, and preſented him willingly and heartily with that little which ſhe had in her pouerty. All which ſhe did not vnder hope of recompence, or expected preferment (knowing well that Saul ſhould ſhortly loſe his life) nor according to the ordinary courſe of men, that naturally honour thoſe that haue beſtowed ſome dignity vpon them, and become ſeruiceable to thoſe from whom they pretend to draw ſome profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth an excellent excellent example of bountie, approouing that there is nothing more worthy praise, then to relieue those that are in necessitie; neither any thing more becomming men, or whereby we may obtaine Gods fauour and graces, better then by it. Thus much sufficeth at this present, in respect of this woman. But now me thinketh I shall doe well if I insert in this place, and in these my writings, an other example both profitable to people and Nations, and in especiall an incitation to noble men, and such as are borne vnto glory, to follow vertue; which also shall expresse what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memory, which ought to engender in the hearts of kings of Nations, and of Gouernours of Common-weales, a singular desire and affection to addict themselues to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertaine dangers, yea death it selfe; and teach them to endure all difficulties whatsoeuer, for their Countries cause. To which intent, the history of Saul the king of the Hebrewes yeeldeth me matter most incident to this purpose. For, although he knew that which should befall him, and that his death was at hand (according as it had beene foretold him) yet resolued he not to auoid the same; neither so loued hee his life, that for the conseruation thereof, he would deliuer vp his people into the hands of their enemies, nor dishonour his royall dignitie: but himselfe, with his children and all his household, exposed themselues to danger; thinking it more honourable to die with them in fighting for his subiects, and farre more expedient that his children should die like valiant men, then to leaue them aliue in incertitude of estate whereinto they might fall, supposing that he should haue sufficient successours of his race, if he left behind him a perpetuall memorie & praise both of him and his. For which cause (in my opinion) he was both iust, strong, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like vnto him, I suppose that it becommeth all men to giue testimonie of such a mans vertue. For I thinke that the Historians and ancient Writers, haue not worthily entituled them with the stile of valiant men, who attainining some worthy actions, attempted warre vnder assured hope of victorie and safetie, but they only that imitate Saul may deseruedly be called iust, praise-worthy, couragious, hardie, and contemners of all dangers. For what great thing is there in vndertaking the common hazard of warre, and tossed twixt hope and feare, to vse Fortunes fauour if she fawne vpon vs? But contrariwise, I account it an assured signe of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodnes, and knowing his death at hand, and assured in his conflict, he is not affraid nor dismaid with such apprehensions, but seeketh out with an inuincible courage his most assured hazzard.

Iosephus praiseth Saul for a worthy and valiant King, in that foreknowing his danger and death, he exposed himself to assured perill.

G H I

This is the praise of our Saul, who is an example to all true louers of glory, that if they haue regard to leaue an honest memory to their posteritie, they should vpon the like opportunitie propose the same resolution to themselues: but in especiall Kings, who, by reason of the excellencie of their degree, ought not onely forbeare to be euill, but also striue to be excellently vertuous. I could likewise say more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but least I should seeme too affectionate, I will returne to our former purpose.

K

1. Kin. 29.

After that the Philistines were thus encamped (according as hath beene afore-spoken) and had numbred their forces according to their nations, kingdomes, and gouernours, king Achis issued in the rereward with his particular company, whom Dauid followed, accompanied with his sixe hundred souldiers: whom when the Chiefetaines of the Philistines beheld, they asked the King whence those Hebrewes came, and what their Leaders name was? Who answered them that it was Dauid, who fled from Saul his master, and how he had entertained him being fledde from him: againe, how Dauid, in recompence of the good he had receiued at his hand, and to reuenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them against him. But the chiefetaines blamed him, because he had chosen an enemy for his associate, counselling him to dismisse him, for feare least he should secretly performe some strange stratageme against his confederates, because (said they) he hath a fit opportunitie to reconcile himselfe to his Master. They therefore willed him to send Dauid backe with his sixe hundred souldiers, vnto the place which hee had giuen him to inhabite, because it was the same Dauid of whom the damsels made songs, singing in praise of him, that hee had slain many thousand Philistines. When the king of Geth vnderstood these things, he thought their counsell to be laudable: for which cause, calling Dauid vnto him, he said vnto him; I protest vnto thee (said he) that I beare a most singular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cause I haue called thee out to assist vs in this battell; but our Captaines allow not of my resolution; for which cause, retire thy selfe to the place which I haue giuen thee, without conceiuing any euill suspicion of mee. There shalt thou be in guarison, to forestall the enemie from foraging our countrey: and in so doing, thou shalt partly assist vs in the warre. Hereupon, Dauid departed vnto Siceleg, according as the king had commanded him.

Achis leadeth out Dauid with him against the Hebrewes, and is reproued by the chiefetains of the Palestines for so doing.

But

The yeere of the world, 2890. before Christs Nativitie, 1074.

A But during the time that Dauid was in campe; and attended on the Philiſtines warre, the Amalechites aroſe and tooke Siceleg by force, and burned the City: and after they had gathered a great bootie both in that place, and in other villages of the Philiſtines countrey, they retired backe againe. Now when Dauid arriued at Siceleg, and found it wholly and ruinately ſpoiled and ſeeing likewiſe that his two wiues, and the wiues of his companions were priſoners togither with their children: he preſently rent his rayment, and began to weepe and lament with his companions; yea ſo much was he afflicted, that he had ſcarce any teares left him to bemone himſelfe: beſide this, his companions amated with the captiuity of their wiues and children, were ready to ſtone him to death; accuſing him that he was the cauſe of all that which had hapned. But when as his griefe was after a manner aſlaked, and hee ſomewhat returned to himſelfe, he lifted vp his B heart vnto God, and commanded the high Prieſt Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and aske counſaile of God; and that done to declare vnto him wherby by his aſſiſtance he might ouertake the Amalechites, if ſo be he ſhould purſue them; and whether he ſhould recouer his wiues and children that they had led away, and reuenge him of his enemies. As ſoone as the high Prieſt had certified him that he might purſue them, hee ſallied out with ſixe hundreth ſoldiers, and purſued the enemy: and drawing neere vnto the riuer, he found a certen ſtraggler an Egyptian by nation, wholly diſcomforted and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was preſſed, hauing for three daies ſpace wandered in the deſart without any ſuſtenance; whom after he had refreſhed with meate and drinke, and recomforted, he asked him to whom he belonged, and what he was. The Egyptian told him his nation; and how he had beene left in that place by his maſter, becauſe C that thorow his weaknes it was impoſſible for him to follow them. Hee confeſſed likewiſe, that his maſter was one of the number of thoſe that had burned and ſacked, not onely other quarters of Iudæa, but Siceleg alſo. Dauid taking this man for his guide ouertooke them, finding ſome of them lying on the earth; others banquetting and following drunkennes, and almoſt ſenſeleſſe by ouerdrinking: ſo recouering both his bootie and pillage, and ſodainly ſet vpon them, hee made a great ſlaughter. For they being naked, and ſuſpecting no ſuch inconuenient, and wholly addicted to frolicke drinking and feaſting, were all of them eaſily defeated: diuers likewiſe amongſt them were ſlaine as they ſate at their meat; others likewiſe were ſlaughtered whileſt they carrouſed the one vnto the other; and ſome of them periſhed being loaden with ſleepe, and gorged with wine.

D They likewiſe that were compleatly armed, intending to make reſiſtance, were as eaſily ſlaine, as they that lay naked vpon the earth: Thus Dauids men abode with him from the firſt houre of the morning till the euening, doing nought elſe but kill and murther, ſo that only foure hundreth of the Amalechites eſcaped, who likewiſe fled being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recouered he all that which the enemy had ranſackt, and amongſt other things he releaſed both his own wiues and thoſe of his companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundreth, which might not follow them, becauſe they were appointed to guard the baggage: To theſe, the abouesaid foure hundreth would not grant a part of the booty and profit, becauſe they had not (as they ſaid) followed the enemie with them, but ſhewed themſelues ſlacke in the purſuite; alledging that they ought to content themſelues with the recouery of E their wiues. But Dauid ſaid, that the ſentence which was pronounced by them, was both euill and vniuſt: for ſince God had granted them the grace to defeate their enemies, all of them merited to haue part in the profit, which ought equally to be diuided amongſt them, both amongſt thoſe that had fought, and amongſt thoſe likewiſe that ſtaied behind to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath beene held firmely amongſt them, that they that keepe the baggage, ſhould haue equall part and portion of the prey with thoſe that ſhould goe out to the battell. But when Dauid was returned to Siceleg, he ſent vnto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Iuda, a ſeuerall part of the ſpoile: In this manner was Siceleg ſacked and burned, and thus were the Amalechites diſcomfited. But the Philiſtines aſſailed, and fought a bloody battell with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philiſtines had the vpper hand, and ſlew a great num-F ber of their enemies. Saul king of Iſrael with his ſonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with ſtout hearts, ſeeing that all their honour conſiſted in that onely point to die nobly, and to hazzard themſelues againſt all camiſadoes of their enemies. For ſince the Philiſtines bent all their forces againſt them, they ſaw no meanes of recouerie, ſo that incompaſſed by them they died in the middeſt of them, and yet before their death ſlewe a great number of the Philiſtines. There were there preſent Sauls three ſonnes; Ionathan, Aminadab, and Melchi: who being defeated, all the Hebrew armie turned their backes: ſo that beeing inſtantly purſued by the enemy, there fell a great disorder, slaughter and confusion amongst them. Saul fled also, although hee had about him a strong squadron of men. And although the Philistines marshalled foorth against him a multitude of archers, that shot many darts and arrowes at him; yet were they all but a very fewe repulsed: and although he had fought very brauely, hauing receiued on him diuers wounds, yet being vnable to support the paine and griefe of his wounds, and trauailed with shortnesse of breath, he commanded his Esquier to draw his sword, and to thrust it thorow his body before hee should be surprised aliue by his enemies: which his Esquier refused to doe, not daring to lay hands vpon his master. For which cause Saul drew his owne sword, and setled the point to his breast and cast himselfe thereon: but vnable to force it home enough, nor make it by goaring himselfe thereon to peirce quite thorow him, he looked backe and percerued a yong man hard beside him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, hee requested him, that since himselfe was vnable to peirce himselfe with his owne hands, that he would leane vpon him, and make the sword passe thorow him, and bring him to that death which he so earnestly desired: which he did, and hauing taken from him the gold which he had about his armes, and the royall crowne likewise, he fled away. The Esquier seeing Saul dead, sodainly slew himselfe: Not one of all the kings guard escaped, but all of them were slaine neere vnto the mountaine Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other side of Iordan and in the Plaine, had intelligence that Saul and his sonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their nation was slaine, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defenced. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whilest the Philistines spoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his sonnes, which they spoiled and beheaded; sending their heads round about the countrey, to make it knowne that their enemies were defeated. They offered vp their armes also in the temple of Astaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the wals of the Citie of Bethsan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Iabes a Citie of Galaad vnderstood how the Philistines had thus cut off the heads of Saul and his sonnes, they were sore mooued, and thought it became them not to bee so careless of them, but that they should be rescued. For which cause the most valiant and hardy amongst them (for that Citie bringeth vp men both valiant in heart and strong in body) departed and marched all night long, so as they attained Bethsan, and approching neere the wals tooke downe the body of Saul and his sonnes, and carried them vnto Iabes, without any resistance of the enemie, in that they durst not attempt the rescue. These Iabesians lamented ouer their dead bodies and made publike lamentations, and buried them in the faireſt place of their countrey, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this manner weeping, both men, and women and children, and beating their breasts, and lamenting the King and his sonnes, and tasting neither meate nor drinke. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because he had disobeyed God in his warre against the Amalechites, and for that he had slaine the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himselfe also, and destroyed the Citie of the Priests. He raigned during the life of Samuel for the space of eighteene yeares, and twenty two yeeres after his death. Thus finished Saul his life.

Saul striueth to kil himself: and being vnable vseth the assistance of a yong Amalechite.

DAVID is created King of one Tribe in Hebron : ouer the rest, SAVLS sonne obtaineth the soueraigntie.

THIS battell was fought on the same day that Dauid returned conquerour to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three daies after his returne, he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battell, hauing his garment rent and ashes cast vpon his head, came and cast himselfe prostrate before Dauid : and being demanded from whence he came, he answered, from the battell of the Israelites; and certified Dauid of the vnhappy issue thereof: telling him how diuers thousands of the Hebrewes were slaine, and how Saul himselfe and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. He likewise gaue him to vnderstand, how he himselfe retreated amongst the Hebrewes, and was present at the flight of the king : confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, vnder purpose to redeeme him from the hands of his enemies : For (said he) Saul hauing cast himselfe vpon the point of his sword, was so weake, by reason of the agonie of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himselfe. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death; the gold about his armes, and the royall crowne which he tooke and brought from him being dead. Dauid perceiuing no cause whereby he should suspect his death, whereof he had most euident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions. And the more was he ouerpressed with sorrow, by reason of the losse of his most deere friend Ionathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and conseruer of his life : And so vertuous and affectionate shewed he himselfe towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes beene in danger to haue been slaine by him, yet was he sore aggrieued at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himselfe had accused himselfe for slaying the king, declaring thereby that he was the sonne of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should be put to death. He composed likewise lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Ionathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I liue. After that he had thus honoured the king, and performed his lamentation and obsequies, he asked counsell of God by the meanes of the Prophet, what Citie of the tribe of Iuda he would giue him to inhabite in : who answered him that he would giue him Hebron. For which cause he forsooke Siceleg, and came and dwelt in G Hebron, and brought thither his wife and souldiers. All the people of the aforesaid tribe resorted thither vnto him, and proclaimed him king: where vnderstanding how the Iabesins had buried Saul and his sonnes, he sent Embassadours vnto them, both to praise and approoue their actions, promising them that both he allowed their act, and would remunerate their deuoire which they had extended toward the dead: giuing the likewise to vnderstand, that the tribe of Iuda had chosen him for their king. But Abner the son of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble disposition, vnderstanding that Saul and Ionathan and his two other brothers were dead, came into the campe, and bringing with him the onely sonne of Saul that was left, whose name was Isboseth, he passed on the other side of Iordan, and proclaimed him king of all the people except the tribe of Iuda. He appointed likewise for his royall seate and place of resi- H dence, a certaine countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to say, the campe. From thence went he with an elected band of souldiers, with a resolution to fight against those of the tribe of Iuda, in that he was displeased with them, because they had made choise of Dauid for their king. Against him marched out Ioab the sonne of Suri and of Saruia Dauids sister, Generall of his army, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abisai and Azael, and all Dauids souldiers: and arriuing neere a certaine fountaine of Gabaa, he arranged his armie in that place to enter battell. And when as Abner said vnto him, that he desired to make triall whether part had the better souldiers, it was accorded betweene them, that twelue of either side should be chosen out to determine the challenge: who marching out into a certaine place betwixt both the hosts, and hauing darted their Iauelins the one against the other, came at last to the sword; where mu- I tually assailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, sides and bowels, they all of them at last fell down dead, as if the plot had bid determined between them. Which done, the two armies ioyned in like sort, and after a cruel battell Abner with his followers were discomfited: who speedily flying were incessantly pursued by Ioab, who in his owne person insisted and exhorted his other soldiers to pursue them hastily, without suffering any of them to escape. But amongst the rest, Ioabs brothers were hot vpon the chase, and the yongest of them called Azael gaue especiall testimonie of his forwardnes, through that swiftnesse in running wherewith he was endowed; for he ranne not onely more swift then other men, but outstripped horses also in their race. Whilest thus he pursued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong course, without turning either on the one side or on the other; Abner turned backe vpon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces; he first couenanted with him for one souldiers armour, and K another time seeing that he could not be perswaded to stay, he prayed him to arrest himselfe and pursue him no further, for feare least being inforced to kill him, he should be depriued of the courage to behold his brother Ioab. But perceiuing that he made no account of his words, in that Azael instantly insisted to pursue him; Abner flying and turning himselfe backe, strooke him with a Iauelin which he had in his hand, in such sort as he presently died. But they that pursued Abner, likewise arriuing in the place where Azaels body vnaduenturously fell dead, staied round about him, and surceased to pursue the enemy any further. But Ioab and his brother Abisai outstripping the body with swift running, and conceiuing a more mortall hatred against Abner, for that he had in this sort slaine their brother; they pursued him vntill sun-set, with admirable swiftnesse, and incredible alacritie vnto a place called Dumaton: There mounting vpon a hillocke, hee saw Abner with the tribe of Beniamin flying from him; who began to cry out L vnto him and say, that men of the same tribe should not be so whetted and incensed the one against the other: That their brother Azael was in the fault, because that although he had exhorted him to cease from running after him, yet could he not perswade him, and that for the same cause he had both strooken and slaine him. Ioab wisely digesting these his sayings, and accepting of them as of holesome and friendly aduertisements and counsels, he commanded the trumpet to sound retreat, and surceased to pursue them any more, and incamped for that night in the same place: during which time, Abner trauelled without ceasing, and hauing past ouer Iordan, returned to his campe to Isboseth Sauls sonne. The next day Ioab suruaied the dead, and caused them to be buried. Those that were found dead on Abners side were about three hundreth M and sixtie men; and on Dauids side nineteene, ouer and besides Azael, whose body Ioab and Abisai tooke with them, and carried it vnto Bethleem, and after they had interred it in the tombe of their ancestors, they repaired to Hebron vnto Dauid. From that time forward there arose a ciuill warre amongst the Hebrewes, that endured a long time, in which Dauids followers had alwaies the vpper hand, and neuer aduentured the hazard of the field without returning with some aduantage,

A aduantage; whereas the ſonne of Saul and his partakers had almoſt euery day the worſe. Dauid at that time had ſixe ſonnes by ſo many wiues, the eldeſt of them was called Ammon the ſonne of Achimaas, the ſecond was Daniel the ſonne of Abigal, the third was called Abſolon the ſonne of Machama the daughter of Ptalomey King of Geſſur; the fourth was Adonias the ſonne of his wife called Aggite: the fift and the ſixt were called Gertheſſa and Gala. But after this ciuill warre was begunne, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountred and fought together; Abner Generall of the armie of King Sauls ſonne, a prudent man, and one that was beloued by the people, endeauoured all that in him lay, that the whole countrey might be commanded by Iſboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted vnto him for a certaine time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accuſed to haue kept company with Riſpa Sauls concubine, the daughter of Sibath, and that Iſboſeth likewiſe had reproued him for the ſame cauſe, he conceiued
B a great griefe & deſpite, ſuppoſing that he had great iniurie done vnto him, conſidering how carefull he had beene, and was, of the Kings eſtate: for which cauſe he threatned him to eſtabliſh the kingdome to Dauid, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him ſoueraigne ouer the tribes on that ſide Iordan, but that his faith and warlike conduct was the cauſe thereof. For which cauſe he ſent vnto Hebron to Dauid, requiring him by an oath to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſwade the people to forſake Sauls ſonne, and to proclaime him King of the whole region: Dauid ſware vnto him, according as he had required, and was very glad of that embaſſage that Abner had ſent vnto him, and the rather for that vnder aſſured teſtimony of their accords, hee had preſerued Michol Dauids wife (whom hee had purchaſed with the price of diuers great dangers, and with ſixe hundreth heads
C of the Philiſtines preſented to his father Saul, to the end he might enioy her) which Michol Abner had ſent him backe, hauing taken her from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſboſeth alſo was aſſiſtant, to whom Dauid had written that it was reaſon that hee ſhould recouer his wife. Abner therefore aſſembled all the elders and gouernours of the people, and told them that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelues to Dauid, he had diſſwaded them from that intent; but at this preſent if they had the will, he would condeſcend vnto them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen Dauid (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to bee King ouer all the Hebrewes; and had foretold that hee ſhould puniſh the Philiſtines, and ſhould ouercome them, and bring them vnder his ſubiection. Which when the elders and gouernours vnderſtood, and were aſſured likewiſe that Abner would D ſubſcribe to their reſolution as touching the eſtate, they all of them determined to ſubmit themſelues to Dauid. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolued, did afterwards aſſemble al the tribe of Beniamin (out of which the archers of Iſboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiuing that they contradicted him no waies, but ſubmitted themſelues vnto his pleaſure, he gathered about twentie of his familiar friends, and reſorted vnto Dauid to receiue in his own perſon Dauids oath: both for that each man in his own affaires repoſeth greateſt confidence in himſelfe, as alſo to giue him intelligence what ſpeech he had held with the elders and the whole tribe. Dauid receiued and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently and ſumptuouſly feaſted him at his table for many daies, praying him that he would depart, and returne & bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence & ſight, he might deliuer him vp the gouernment. When Dauid
E had diſmiſſed Abner; ſome little time after his departure, Ioab the Generall of Dauids armie came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had bin with Dauid, and that but ſome little time before he was departed from him, with accords and promiſes made vnto him that he ſhould be gouernour; he fearing leaſt that if Dauid ſhould place him in honour and dignitie, and ſhould make Abner (who was a man otherwaies exerciſed in affaires, and politique to preuent occaſions) as it were his companion in the kingdome, that the ſaid Ioab ſhould be degraded and depriued of his office; he tooke vpon him a curſed and froward reſolution. For firſt of all he laboured to detract and make him odious in the kings eare, counſelling him to ſtand on his guard, and not to giue eare vnto Abners promiſes, who vnder colour and ſubtilty ſought to eſtabliſh the kingdome vnto Sauls ſonne: alledging that he came vnto him vnder colour and cautele, intending then to leaue him, F when his hopes were ſatisfied and affaires diſpoſed: But perceiuing that theſe his ſubtilties tooke little effect with Dauid, and conſidering with himſelfe likewiſe that he mooued him in no ſort, he attempted a more perilous exploit then the former. For reſoluing with himſelfe to kill Abner, he ſent out certaine men after him, whom he gaue in commiſſion that as ſoone as they ſhould ouertake him, they ſhould vrge their interparlee in the name of Dauid, alledging that they had ſomething to communicate with him as touching the eſtate, which he had forgot to certifie him of.

The yeere of the world, 2899. before Christs Natiuitie, 1065.

When Abner had heard the words of theſe meſſengers (who ouertooke him in a place called Beſira, ſome twentie furlongs off of Hebron) he ſtrooke out of the way without ſuſpicion of his future diſaſter, and Ioab going before him, embraced him with great loue, and like an affectionate friend (for ſuch as enterpriſe any wicked action, do often and ſubtilly diſſemble and make ſhew of honeſtie, to the end to expel out of the innocents mind all iealouſie or euill ſuſpicion) whereſingling him from his other companie, and making ſhew to informe him of certaine ſecrets, and hauing drawne him into a by-way beſides the wall, accompanied only with his brother Abiſai, he drew his rapier and thruſt it into his ſhort ribbes: Of which wound Abner died, ſurpriſed by the treaſon of Ioab; who pretended and coloured that act of his, with the reuenge and death of his brother Azael, whom Abner had ſlaine vpon the chaſe in the firſt warre at Hebron; but in truth it was but the ſuſpicion of his greatneſſe and honour, fearing leaſt he ſhould be depriued, and Abner inſeated by obtaining the next degree of honour vnto Dauid. Hereby may a man conceiue how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazzard for their auarice and ambition ſake, and to the end they may not be inferiour vnto any others in thoſe matters. For when as they deſire to attaine riches and honours, they atchieue it by ten thouſand miſchiefes; and at ſuch time as they feare to be diſpoſſeſt, they ſtriue to continue their eſtates by meanes more pernicious, becauſe they thinke it to be the leſſe ſinne, and that the calamitie is leſſe actiue, rather not to haue obtained to any greatneſſe and power: then after the poſſeſſion thereof, to fall into diſgrace. Thence it commeth, that all of them intend and practiſe many hazzards and difficult encountries, through the feare they haue to loſe their degree. But it ſufficeth to haue briefly touched this point. Dauid hauing notice of the murther of Abner, conceiued a great griefe in his heart, and called all his aſſiſtants to witneſſe, lifting vp his hands vnto God, and proteſting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had beene ſlaine without his commandement or will. He likewiſe vttered moſt grieuous curſes againſt the murtherer, his houſe and accomplices, by which he wiſhed them to be ſubiect to the fatal penaltie of murther: for he greatly ſuſpected leaſt he ſhould be held in ſuſpicion to be a party in that which had hapned vnto Abner, contrarie to his faith, oath and promiſe, which he had paſt vnto him. Moreouer, he commanded that all the people ſhould weepe and lament for him, and that the funerals of his body ſhould be honored according to the accuſtomed faſhion, in renting of garments and putting on ſackcloth: and that the ſame ſhould be done the coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefeſt gouernours of the Iſraelites followed, beating on their breaſts, and ſhedding teares, and teſtifying the loue which they bare vnto him during his life, and their diſpleaſure to ſee him dead, who had bin murthered contrary to their will and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs compoſed in his praiſe by Dauid himſelfe, who ſetting himſelfe on the tombe firſt of all lamented, and gaue others cauſe of lamentation. And ſo much was hee confuſed at the death of this Abner, that he ſwore to forbeare all kind of meat vntill the ſunne-ſet, notwithſtanding all the inſtances of his friends, who vrged him to take refection: which act of his purchaſed him much good will and loue amongſt the people. For they that loued Abner were very glad to be witneſſes of that honour which he did him in his death, and that faith which hee maintained in honouring him, euery way according to the cuſtome, as if he had been his kinſman or friend, and not embaſing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if hee had beene his enemie. And in generall, all of them were ſo glad of the curteſie, ſweetneſſe and royall nature of king Dauid, that they eſteemed in like caſe, that he would haue the like eſtimate of them, as they ſaw him haue of deceaſed Abner. And by this meanes Dauid happily maintained his credit, and increaſed the peoples good opinion of him, eſcaping thereby the ſuſpition and conceit that hee might in ſome ſort haue beene acceſſarie to his death. He proteſted alſo vnto the people, that he conceiued no ſmall griefe at the loſſe of ſo good a man, declaring thereby that it was no ſmall ſtaine vnto the ſtate of the Hebrewes to bee depriued of him, who had the meanes to maintaine their peace by his good aduiſe, and to ratifie the ſame by his executions and warlike valour: But God (ſaid he) who hath care of all things ſhall not ſuffer him to die vnreuenged: And hee it is that ſhall beare mee witneſſe, that it lieth not in my power to puniſh Ioab and Abiſai, who haue greater credit in the armie then my ſelfe; yet ſhall they not eſcape Gods iuſtice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

Men inclined to ambition and auarice dare al things.

Dauid with the whole people bewaile Abner, and honour his funerals.

Dauid ſalueth his honour, and auoideth the ſuſpicion of Abners death.

CHAP. II.

The yeere of the world, 2890. before Christs Nativitie. 1065.

ISBOSETH is slaine through the treason of his friends and followers: the whole kingdome descendeth to DAVID.

WHEN Isboseth, Sauls sonne, had notice of Abners death, he was sore displeased, not only for that he perceiued himselfe to be depriued of his neere kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had setled the crowne on his head. Neither did he himselfe long time remaine aliue after him: but by the sons of Ieremon, Banaoth and Thannus, he was traiterously done to death. These two being Beniamites, and of the chiefest nobilitie amongst them, made their reckoning that they would make away Isboseth, and thereby obtaine great recompence at Dauids hands; supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefest place and dignity in the army, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isboseth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleepe, and vnassisted by any of his guard, and perceiuing likewise that the Porter was fast, who through his trauell and other businesse (by reason of the extreame heate) was laid downe to rest: they entred into his lodging whereas Isboseth was asleepe, and slew him: and hauing cut off his head, they trauelled all the night and day long, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure them from peril. And when they came to Hebron, they presented Dauid with Isboseths head, offering themselues as his most dutifull liegemen to do him seruice, who had deliuered him of an enemy, and made away an aduersary against his roialtie. But Dauid allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus vnto them; O cursed men, said he (on whom I intend presently to execute iustice) haue you not heard how I punished him that murthered Saul, and brought his roiall crowne vnto me? Yea, although he slew him vpon his owne instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprise him aliue? Were you of that opinion that I was changed, and that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your mischiefes, or that I will countenance them, as if these acts of yours (who are murtherers of your master) were laudable in you? in you, I say, who haue slaine a good man on his bed, that iniured no man, but was your benefactor, and who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure your selues, that you shal be punished in his behalfe, and shall yeeld me satisfaction by the losse of your liues, because you haue thought that Isboseths death would work my contentment: for, you could not in any sort dishonor me more, then by conceiuing such an opinion of me. Which said, he adiudged them to die by the most cruell torments that might bee imagined: and with all the honour that he might, he caused Isboseths head to be interred in Abners tombe.

Hedio & Rufinus. chap. 2. 2. King. 4.

Isboseths head is brought to Dauid.

Dauids sharp inuective against the murtherers of Isboseth, and their punishment.

These murtherers beeing thus done to death, all the chiefest of the people repaired to Dauid vnto Hebron (both they that commanded ouer thousands, and such also as were Gouernours) & submitted themselues vnto him, reckoning vp the good affection they had borne him, both during Sauls life time, as also the honour which they had neuer discontinued to beare him, since the first time that he was Coronell ouer a thousand, especially for that he had beene chosen by God thorow the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their king, and his children after him; declaring vnto him, that God had giuen him the countrey of the Hebrewes, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. Dauid accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should neuer repent themselues of their obedience: and after he had banquetted and entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

2. King. 5. The nobles of the Hebrews repaire to Dauid to Hebron & declare him king.

Dauid entertained the nobles kindly.

Of the tribe of Iuda, there came together about sixe thousand eight hundred men of war, bearing for their armes a buckler and a iauelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sonnes, and besides whom the tribe of Iuda had assigned the kingdome to Dauid. Of the tribe of Simeon, 7. thousand, and a hundred or somewhat more: of that of Leui 4700. whose chiefetaine was Iodam, with who was Sadoc the high priest, accompaniud with 20 & two gouernors of the same linage. Of the tribe of Beniamin 4000. men of war: for this tribe were as yet of opinion that some of the heires of Saul should raigne. Of that of Ephraim 20800. both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the halfe as many, namely 8000. Of that of Issachar 200. who were skilfull in diuination, and 20000. men of war. Of the tribe of Nepthali there were 1000. chiefetains, famous for their valour, & armed with shield & iauelin, attended by an infinite number of their tribe. Of the tribe of Dan there were 27000. chosen men. Of that of Aser 40000. Of the two tribes on the other side of Iordan, and of the half tribe of

of Manasses fixe score thousand armed men, with buckler, iauelin, murrion and sword: The rest of the other tribes also wore swords. All this multitude was assembled together in Hebron before Dauid, with great prouision of victuals and wine, sufficient to sustaine them all, who all of them with one consent, appointed Dauid to be their King. Now when the people had mustred, and banquetted for three daies space in Hebron, Dauid dislodged from thence with his whole host, and repaired to Ierusalem. But the Iebusites, who at that time inhabited the city, and were of the race of the Chanaanites, shutting vp their gates against his comming, and placing on their wals as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other sort, in contempt of him, scoffingly iested, and said, that these were sufficient to keep out the enemy: so much trusted they to their fortifications. Wherewith Dauid being sore displeased, began to besiege Ierusalem, and vsing all diligence and industry to surprise the same, he incontinently expressed how strong he was, checking therby other mens pride, who perhaps would haue done the like vnto him, and afterwards tooke the lower Towne. And for that the higher Towne was as yet vnsurprised, the King resolued to encourage his men of war to shew themselues valiant, promising them honors and recompence; proclaiming that he would make him generall ouer all the people, that should first of all scale, ascend, and seize the wall. Whilst thus they inforced themselues to mount without refusing any trauell (thorow the desire they had to obtaine the gouernment that was promised) Ioab, the son of Saruia, was the forwardest amongst the rest; and hauing got vpon the wall, cried vnto the king, requiring him to grant him the generall gouernment.

DAVID, hauing taken Ierusalem by force, casteth out all the Chanaanites from thence, and deliuereth the Citie to be inhabited by the Iewes.

AFTER therefore he had cast out the Iebusites from the higher citie, and repaired Ierusalem, he called it the city of Dauid, and remained therein all the time of his raigne: so that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, ouer the sole tribe of Iuda, was 7. yeeres and sixe moneths. But after he had established Ierusalem for his royall city, his fortunes daily more and more increased, because God both furthered, and bettered them. Hiram also, king of Tyre, sent vnto him, and made a league of amity with him: he presented him likewise with presents of Cedar wood, and workmen and Masons, to build him a royall house in Ierusalem. Now, when the King had seized the higher city, he annexed the rock thereunto, and made one body of twaine; and hauing walled it in, he gaue the gouernment thereof to Ioab. This king was the first that droue the Iebusites out of Ierusalem, and called the same by his name. For, from the time of Abraham, our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there some that infer, that Homer vnder that name intended Ierusalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyma is as much to say, as Security. Al the time from the exploite of warre made by Iosuah against the Chanaanites, and since the diuision of the Country (during all which time the Israelites could not driue the Chanaanites out of Ierusalem) vntill such time as Dauid tooke the same by force, were fiue hundred and fifteene yeeres. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongst the Iebusites; who, for that he was well affected toward the Hebrewes, was not put to death in the surprisall which Dauid made of Ierusalem: but (as I will shortly declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the king. Dauid espoused other wiues besides those which he had; besides many other concubines: by them he had eleuen sonnes, whose names are these which follow, Amnas, Emma, Ebamatha, Salomon, Iebar, Eliel, Phalna, Ennapha, Ienaah, Eliphal: besides these, he had a daughter called Thamar. Nine of these were begotten on noble mothers, but the two last (which were named by vs) were the sons of concubines. But Thamar was Absalons sister by the same father and mother.

Hedio & Ruffinus. chap. 4.

NOVV, when the Palestins knew that the Hebrews had created Dauid king, they led forth their army against him towards Ierusalem, where encamping themselues in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not farre off from the City) they in that place expected the encounter. But the king of the Hebrewes, who was wont to doe nothing inconsiderately, without

A out Gods aduiſe, commanded the high prieſt to prophecie and foretell, what ſucceſſe and euent the warre ſhould haue; who after he had informed him that God ſmileth on, and fauoureth their attempts, he preſently drew out his army againſt the enemy: and ſtriking the battell, he ſodainly aſſailed the enemies on their backs, and partly ſlew them, and partly put them to flight. But let no man ſuſpect, that the army of the Paleſtines was either ſmall in number, or weake in courage, which at that time aſſailed the Hebrewes, in that hee coniectureth in his mind, that they were eaſily ouercome; without their attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to know that all Syria, Phenicia (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare armes with them, and were confederates in this war: which was the onely cauſe, that notwithſtanding they were ſo many times ouercome, and had loſt diuers thouſands of men, that they deſiſted not to aſſaile the Hebrewes with more great force: and that which is more, hauing beene defeated in
B the battels before recited, yet forbare they not to aſſaile Dauid anew with thrice as much power as before, and to incampe in the ſame place. For which cauſe, Dauid tooke counſell of God once more, what the iſſue of this battell ſhould bee: and the high Prieſt told him, that hee ſhould encampe in the forreſt called Teares, becauſe it was not far off from the enemies campe, and that he ſhould not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battell, before the trees did ſhake without any agitation or breath of wind. Wherupon, as ſoone as the trees ſhooke, and the time which God had appointed was come; without any delay, he iſſued out, to enioy a prepared and manifeſt victorie. For the ſquadrons of the enemy were diſarraied, and incontinently betooke them to flight, and were ſwiftly followed and ſlaughtered, vntill the Citie of Gerar (which is a frontire towne of their countrey) and their campe was thorowly ranſacked, wherein there were found
C great riches; and amongſt all other things, their gods were beaten to pieces.

The battell beeing brought to this end, it ſeemed good vnto Dauid (by the counſell of the Elders and Coronels ouer thouſands) that all the flower of their youth, ſhould be aſſembled from all the parts of the country, euery one according to his tribe. Secondly, that the Prieſts & Leuites ſhould repaire to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Arke of God, and conuay it to Ieruſalem; to the end that when it ſhould be there, the ſeruice of God might thereafter bee celebrated in that place, and other ſacrifices and honours, agreeable to the diuine Maieſtie, might be performed. And had the ſame bin done during the life of Saul, no inconuenience had fallen vpon them. When as all the people were aſſembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transferre the Arke; which the Prieſts carrying out of Aminidabs houſe, they laid it vp-

The King marched formoſt, and after him all his people, praiſing God, and tuning all ſorts of melody then vſuall in that country, with diuerſity of ſounds of inſtruments, of Dances, & Shalms, Trumpets & Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Arke into Ieruſalem. But when they were come to the threſhing floore of Chidon (which is a certaine place ſo called) Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the Oxen ſtumbling that drew the chariot, and the Arke ſome-what ſhaken, he ſtretched out his hand with intent to ſuſtaine the ſame; and becauſe he was no Prieſt, God ſtrooke him till he died. The King and the people were ſore aggrieued at the death of Oza, and the place where he died, is called to this day Ozas Striking. Dauid, fearing leaſt if he ſhould retire the Arke with him into the Citie, the like happe ſhould attend him that had befallen Oza
E (who was in that ſort done to death, for that he had onely thus ſtretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his owne houſe within the Citie, but commanded that it ſhould bee left in the poſſeſſion of one called Obed, by deſcent a Leuite, and in behauiour a man good and vertuous: where it remained for three months ſpace, during which time, his houſe was bleſſed with all worldly goods and goodnes. The king being aſcertained what aduantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore and needy man, was ſuddainly become very rich, ſo that all men had their eyes fixed on him, and they that heard ſpeake of his houſe enuied him) he aſſured himſelfe that no inconuenience would befall him: for which cauſe he retired the Arke into his owne houſe, which was caried by the Prieſts, and ſeuen quires of ſinging men diſpoſed by the king went before the ſame. The king himſelfe likewiſe touched, and plaied vpon the Harp, ſo that Michol, Dauids wife
F and Sauls daughter, ſeeing him entertaining himſelfe after that maner, mocked at him. The Arke then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dreſſed by Dauid, who offered moſt magnificent ſacrifices of all ſorts, and forgot not the ſacrifices for proſperities: he feaſted all the people likewiſe, both men, women and children, diſtributing vnto euery one a cake, a morſell of roſted meat, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the ſacrifice: and after hee had thus feaſted the people, he diſmiſſed them, and retreated himſelfe into his owne houſe. But Michol

his wife (and daughter to King Saul) drawing neere vnto him vpon his returne, beſought God for him, that it might pleaſe him in all other things ſhe might expreſſe vnto her husband all that, which became her intire and vnequald loue towards him: but in this ſhee blamed him, becauſe that being ſo great and mighty a king as he was, he had diſhonoured himſelfe in dancing, deſpoiling himſelfe, and diſcouering partly that which became him not, doing all this in company of his ſeruants and handmaides. To whom Dauid anſwered, that he was not aſhamed in performing a thing ſo acceptable vnto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him aboue all others, aſſuring her that hee would play and dance oftentimes after that ſort, without care whether his demeanour pleaſed either her or her chambermaids. This Michol (of whom we entreat) had no children by Dauid, but being maried againe to another (to whom her father had betrothed her after he had rauiſhed her from Dauid) ſhe bare fiue ſonnes, of whom we will ſpeake in their place. The king perceiuing how by Gods aſſiſtance his affaires proſpered daily more and more, thought that it ſhould be a hainous offence in him, if he ſhould dwell in houſes made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Arke ſuffer it to remaine vnder a pauillion: for which cauſe he conceiued a deſire to build a Temple vnto God, according as Moſes had foretold: and to this entent conſulted he with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to performe all that which he was minded to accompliſh, aſſuring him that God would be each way aſſiſtant vnto him: for which cauſe he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple. But the ſame night God appeared vnto Nathan, commanding him to certifie Dauid, that hee accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable vnto him (conſidering in eſpeciall that no one before him had a thought to performe the like:) yet notwithſtanding (although his deliberation were ſuch) he permitted him not to finiſh the ſame, by reaſon he had followed many warres, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his deceaſe (which ſhall happen after hee hath liued a long and proſperous life) his ſonne called Salomon (to whom hee ſhall leaue the kingdome after his death) ſhall cauſe a Temple to bee built vnto him, promiſing him to aſſiſt and fauour the ſayd Salomon (euen as the father doth his ſonne) and that he would continue the royalty in his heires and their ſucceſſours: And that if they ſhall happen to offend him, hee will onely puniſh them with ſickneſſe and ſterilitie. Dauid vnderſtanding theſe words which were deliuered him by the Prophet, was very ioyfull, by reaſon that the royaltie was firmly aſſured to his heires, and for that his houſe ſhould bee famous and renowned; and preſenting himſelfe before the Arke, he proſtrated himſelfe and adored, and gaue God thanks for all the benefits he had beſtowed on him; for that from a poore and humble ſheepheard, he had raiſed him to ſo great a height of maieſty and glory, and for that hee had promiſed to haue care of his poſterity as erſt hee had had of the Hebrewes and their liberty. This ſayd, after hee had ſung hymnes vnto God, he departed.

NOT long time after this, Dauid thought it requiſite to make warre vpon the Philiſtines, partly to the intent hee might auoide the ſuſpition of ſloth and idleneſſe, and partly that hauing (according as God had foretolde) diſcomfited his enemies, hee might leaue a peaceable kingdome to his poſterity after him. He therefore aſſembled his army anew, commanding them to be in a readines to march forward to the warre: when as therefore he ſuppoſed that the army was addreſſed, he departed out of Ieruſalem, and made a road vpon the Philiſtins, whom hee ouercame in battell, and tooke a great part of the countrey from them, by meanes whereof he enlarged the frontires of the Hebrewes, and tranſlated the war, and led forth his forces againſt the Moabites: whoſe army being diuided into two parts, was by him defeated and ouerthrowne, and the reſt were taken priſoners, and tributes were impoſed on them, which they were bound to ſatisfie euery yeere. Afterwards hee led out his hoſt againſt Adarezer ſonne of Ara, King of Sophona: and waging battell with him neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, he ſlewe about twenty thouſand of his footmen, and ſome fiue thouſand of his horſe: he tooke alſo almoſt a thouſand of his charriots; the greater part whereof was wholly conſumed, and one hundred of them onely reſerued to his owne vſe.

CHAP. VI.

They of Damaſco are ouercome by DAVID.

The yeare of the world, 2904. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 1064.

ADAD King of Damaſco and of Syria, vnderſtanding that Dauid had made warre on Adarezer (who was both his friend and confederate) iſſued forth with great forces to be aſſiſtant vnto him, and to deliuer him from his enemies according as he expected. But entring field, and waging battell with Dauid neere vnto the riuer of Euphrates, he was ouercome and loſt a great number of his ſouldiers: for in that battell there were ſlaine on his ſide by the Hebrew enemie, to the number of twentie thouſand, and the reſt fled. Of this king, Nicholas the Hiſtoriographer maketh mention in the fourth booke of his hiſtories, in theſe words. Sithence and long time after, a certaine man of that countrey called Adad gouerned in Damaſco, and ouer the reſt of Syria (except Phœnicia) who making warre againſt Dauid King of Iudæa, and hauing oftentimes fought with him, in his laſt encountrie (wherein he was ouercome neere vnto the flood Euphrates) he ſhewed himſelfe more reſolute then all other kings in force and valour. Moreouer he ſpeaketh of his heires, how after his death, they ſucceeded him both in royaltie and name, the one after the other, and ſaith thus. He being deceaſed, his ſonnes raigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiuing from their father, the ſame name and the ſame kingdome, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Ægypt. The third of theſe being more mighty then the reſt, and deſirous to reuenge himſelfe in warre of theſe iniuries, which were offered vnto his grandfather, led forth his army againſt the Iewes, and deſtroyed the countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any waies from the truth: for he of whom he ſpeaketh, is that Adad, that made warre in Samaria, during the reigne of Achab King of Iſrael, of whom we will ſpeake hereafter in his place. But when Dauid had led forth his campe againſt Damaſco, and againſt the reſt of the countrey of Syria, he reduced them all vnder his obeiſance, placing garriſons amidſt their countrey, and impoſing tribute vpon them, which they ſhould pay vnto him. He dedicated alſo to God in the Citie of Ieruſalem, the golden quiuers and armors which Adads guard were wont to weare; which afterward Syſſac king of Ægypt took at ſuch time as he warred againſt Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the temple of Ieruſalem, as it ſhall be declared hereafter, when as we ſhall come to intreat of that matter. This king of the Hebrewes being inſpired by God (who made him proſperous in all his wars) encamped before the goodlieſt Cities Adarezer had, that is to ſay, Betthea and Machon, which he beſieged, tooke, and ſpoyled: where there was found great ſtore of gold and ſiluer and of braſſe, which was of more eſtimation then gold, whereof Salomon made that great veſſell called the Sea, and other faire lauers, at ſuch time as he adorned and furniſhed the temple of God. When the King of Amath vnderſtood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were deſtroyed, he grew affraid of his owne eſtate, and reſolued with himſelfe to make a league & confederacy with Dauid, before he might come out againſt him: and to that intent he ſent his ſonne Adoram vnto him, to teſtifie and expreſſe that contentment he had receiued, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemie, and to contract with him amitie and confederation. He ſent him preſents alſo, namely, veſſels of antique worke of gold, of ſiluer, and of braſſe: whereupon Dauid made a league with Thani (for ſo was the king of Amath called) and receiued the preſents that were ſent vnto him; and afterwards diſmiſſed his ſonne with conuenient honour, both for the one and the other: and conſecrated that to God which he had ſent him (together with the gold and ſiluer, which he had taken from other Cities and nations that were ſubiect vnto him.) For God did not only ſo farre fauour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own wars; but hauing alſo ſent Abiſai Ioabs brother the Lieutenant of his army againſt the Idumæans, he likewiſe granted him victorie: for Abiſai ſlew in the battell about eighteene thouſand of them, and filled all Idumæa with garriſons, challenging a tribute throughout the countrey by the pole. This king loued iuſtice of his own nature, and exerciſed iudgement according to veritie. He had for his lieutenant generall in all his armies Ioab, and appointed Ioſaphat the ſon of Achilles chiefe ouer the Regiſters. After Abiathar, he eſtabliſhed Sadoc of the houſe of Phinees for high Prieſt, who was his friend. Siſa was his Secretarie: Banaia the ſonne of Ioiada was captaine ouer his guard, and all the elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembring himſelfe alſo of the conuentions and oathes that were paſt twixt him and Ionathan the ſonne of Saul, and of the amitie and affection that had beene between them (for beſides all other graces which he had, he moſt freſhly retained them in memorie, from whom in times paſt he

he had receiued any friendſhip. He cauſed a ſearch to be made, if any one of the houſe and family of Ionathan were left aliue, to the intent he might remunerate the friendſhip which he had receiued at Ionathans hands. Whereupon a certaine man was brought vnto him (who was enfranchiſed by Saul) that might enforme him what one of his race was aliue: who asked him if he could name him any of Ionathans ſons then liuing, whom he might make partaker of thoſe curteous fauors and graces, which in times paſt he had receiued by Ionathan. Who anſwered him, that he had one ſonne remaining, whoſe name was Mephiboſeth, who was lame of his legs; for that at ſuch time as the newes came that both his father and grandfather were ſlaine in the battell, his nurſe fearefully ſnatching vp the child and flying, ſuffred him vnfortunately to fal from her ſhoulders, and ſo hurt him. When as then he was aduertiſed where, and with whom he was brought vp, he ſent vnto the citie of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephiboſeth was kept, and commanded him to be brought vnto him. Now when he came to Dauids preſence, he caſt himſelfe proſtrate on his face to do him reuerence: but the king exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gaue him his fathers houſe with all the poſſeſſions that were purchaſed by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to ſit and feed with him at his owne table; yea to eate of his royall prouiſion, not letting one day ſlip wherein he accompanied him not at meales. The yong man did him reuerence, humbly thanking him for the gracious words, and royall offers he had made vnto him. At that time Dauid called for Siba, and certified him how he had giuen Mephiboſeth his fathers houſe and all Sauls purchaſes, commanding him to manure and husband his poſſeſſions, and to haue care of all things, and to returne the reuenue to Ieruſalem, for that Mephiboſeth was euery day to take his refection at his table, charging both him and his 15. ſonnes, and 20. ſeruants, to doe him ſeruice. After the king had thus diſpoſed of him, Siba did him reuerence, and after he had proteſted to performe whatſoeuer he had giuen him in charge, he departed, and Ionathans ſonne remained in Ieruſalem, where he liued at the kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had beene his owne ſonne: he had a ſonne alſo called Micha. Theſe were the honors that thoſe children which ſuruied after Ionathan and Sauls death, receiued at Dauids hands. About the ſame day died Naas king of the Ammonites, who during his life time was Dauids friend, and his ſonne ſucceeded him in his kingdome, to whom Dauid ſent embaſſadors to comfort him, exhorting him to digeſt his fathers death with patience, aſſuring him that he would expreſſe no leſſe loue towards him, then he did vnto his father. But the gouernours of the Ammonites entertained this embaſſage very contumeliouſly, and not according as Dauid had kindly intended it, and murmured againſt their king, telling him that they were but ſpies ſent by Dauid to ſeeke into his forces, and diſcouer the ſtrength of his countrey, vnder a pretext of humanitie, counſelling him to ſtand vpon his guard, and not to giue eare to his proteſtation, leaſt being deceiued, he ſhould fall into ſome remedileſſe inconuenient.

Naas king of the Ammonites, ſuppoſing that his gouernors ſpake nothing but truth, outraged the embaſſadors that were ſent vnto him with great iniuries: for cauſing the halfe of their beards to be ſhauen cloſe by the chin, and cutting away the halfe of their veſtments, he ſent them backe againe, returning their anſwers not in words, but in deeds. Which when Dauid ſaw, he was grieuouſly diſpleaſed, and made it knowne that he would not ſuffer that mockerie and iniurie ſo eaſily to be digeſted, but that he would make war on the Ammonites, and reuenge thoſe indignities that were offered to his embaſſadors. The friends and gouernours of Naas conſidering how they had violated and broken the peace, and how for that occaſion they deſerued to be puniſhed; prepared for that warre, and ſent 1000. talents to Syrus king of Meſopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that warre, and receiue their pay: they requeſted the like of Subas: theſe kings had 20000. footmen in camp. They hired alſo with their mony the king of the countrey called Michas, & the fourth called Iſtob, which two had with them 12000. thouſand ſouldiers.

How DAVID ouercame the Meſopotamians.

BVT Dauid was nothing amated, neither with the confederacie, nor force of the Ammonites; but truſting in God, reſolued that the cauſe of his warre was iuſt: for which cauſe hee continued in reuenge of thoſe outrages which he had receiued by them. Hauing therefore muſtered vnder Ioab the flower of his whole army, he commanded him to depart and make warre vpon them: who came and incamped himſelfe before their chiefeſt City called Aramath; which when the enemies perceiued, they iſſued forth and arranged themſelues in battell (not

Dauid ſendeth out Ioab with the choiſeſt flower of his armie againſt the Ammonites.

A not altogether, but in two ſeuerall parts.) For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plaine, and the Ammonites ſtood in battell array neere vnto their Citie gate, to make head againſt the Hebrewes. Ioab perceiuing this, vſed this ſtratageme to counteruaile their complot: for he choſe out the ableſt and ſtouteſt of his men to ſerue vnder him againſt Syrus, and the other kings confederates with him, and gaue the reſt to his brother Abiſai, commanding him to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Ammonites whileſt he charged the reſt: willing him, that if he perceiued that the Syrians were ſtronger then he was, and did put him to the worſt, to diſplace his ſquadron, and to ſuccour him; promiſing to doe the like, if he perceiued him to be ouerpreſſed by the Ammonites; When as therefore he had exhorted his brother to behaue himſelfe valiantly and vertuouſly, and to take heed leaſt he ſhould light on ſome diſhonour, he ſent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other ſide aſſailed the Syrians, who valiantly re-

B ſiſted him for a little ſpace: yet notwithſtanding Ioab ſlew many of them, and finally conſtrained them to turne their backes. Which when the Ammonites perceiued (who were afraid of Abiſai and his people) they retreated likewiſe, and (conforming themſelues according to the example of their allies) they tooke their flight into the Citie. By which meane Ioab hauing obtained the vpper hand ouer his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victorie vnto the king to Ieruſalem.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this loſſe: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certaine knowledge that the Hebrews were ſtronger then themſelues, yet would they by no meanes liſten after peace. They therefore ſent vnto Chalama king of the Syrians on the other ſide of Euphrates, whoſe confederacie they attained by bribes and huge ſums

C of money. This king had one, who was called Sabecus, for his lieutenant Generall, and vnder him foureſcore thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſemen. Dauid vnderſtanding that the Ammonites drew to head, and intended anew to beare armes againſt him, he ſurceaſed to proſecute the war againſt them by his lieutenants, and himſelf in perſon with all his forces paſſed ouer the riuer of Iordan, and went out againſt them; and at laſt meeting and fighting with them, ouercame them, killing welnie fortie thouſand of their footmen, and ſeuen thouſand of their horſemen: he hurt Sabecus alſo, Chalamas Lieutenant, who likewiſe died of that wound. The iſſue of this combate being thus, the Meſopotamians, yeelded themſelues vnto Dauid, and gaue him many great and magnificent preſents. He therefore, by reaſon of the winter retired himſelfe for that time to Ieruſalem, but incontinently vpon the ſpring time he ſent out his Lieutenant Ioab once more to

D make warre vpon the Ammonites: who ouerrunning their countrey, vtterly ſpoyled it, and ſhut them vp in Aramath their principal city, which he ouercame and entred. About this time it ſo fel out, that Dauid (notwithſtanding he were a iuſt man, and one that feared God, and an exact obſeruer of all the lawes and ordinances of his forefathers) fel, and offended God moſt grieuouſly. For as he walked on the top of his royall palace; from the time of mid-day vntill the euening) for betwixt theſe times he vſed accuſtomably to walke) he perceiued a woman of incomparable beautie, and ſurpaſſing perfection, whoſe name was Bethſabe, who in her houſe bathed her ſelfe in a cleere and pleaſant fountaine: and being deuoured and rauiſhed with her beautie, he could not refraine his concupiſcence, but ſending for her, tooke the ſpoile of her beautie and chaſtitie: and by that meanes got her with childe. Which when ſhee perceiued, ſhee ſent vnto the king, beſee-

E ching him to bethinke himſelfe of ſome means whereby her ſhame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazzard by the law for her adultery) might be preſerued. Who thereupon ſent for Vrias (Bethſabes husband and one of Ioabs ſouldiers, who at that time was at the ſiege of Aramath) and queſtioned with him vpon his arriuall, as touching the eſtate of the ſiege and of the armie: who anſwering him that all things were fallen out according as he could wiſh; Dauid tooke a portion of his owne ſupper and gaue it him, willing him to repaire vnto his owne houſe, and repoſe himſelfe with his wife. But Vrias did nothing leſſe, but ſlept among his fellow ſoldiers neere vnto the perſon of the king. Which when Dauid vnderſtood, he asked him wherfore he repaired not to his owne houſe, according to the cuſtome of husbands that had beene long time abſent

F vpon a long voyage, and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had beene ſequeſtred ſo many daies? Vrias replied, that it became him not either to repoſe or take pleaſure with his wife, whileſt his companions and generall lay vpon the bare ground in the enemies countrey. Which ſaid, Dauid commanded him to ſoiourne there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might ſend him backe againe to Ioab. That night the king inuited him to ſupper, and although he were made drunke through the aboundance of wine he receiued (which the king had purpoſely cauſed to be giuen him (yet notwithſtanding he ſlept at the kings gate without any deſire to repaire home vnto his wife. Herewith the king was much deſpited, ſo that he wrote G vnto Ioab, commanding him to puniſh Vrias, becauſe he had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his ſhould not be diſcouered, he ſuggeſted him both in the meanes and manner of the proſecution of his death, enioyning him to place him in the ranke of greateſt danger, and in face of the enemy, to the intent that in the fight his perſon might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whileſt they that fought next vnto him retyred when they ſaw him charged. When as he had thus written and ſealed vp the letter with his owne ſeale, he deliuered it to Vrias to beare vnto Ioab: who receiuing the ſame, and conceiuing the kings pleaſure, placed Vrias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight moſt deſperately, appointing him out certaine of his beſt ſouldiers to ſecond him, with purpoſe, that he would come and ſuccour them with all his power, to the end he might breake thorow the wall and enter the Citie.

Vrias (who was a noble ſouldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the king, and H reputation amongſt all thoſe of his tribe, and tooke delight to be imployed in hazzardous attempts, and refuſed no danger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Ioab gaue priuate intelligence to thoſe that were ranked next vnto him, that when they ſhould ſee the enemie ſally out with greateſt furie, they ſhould abandon Vrias. When as therefore the Hebrewes drew neere vnto the Citie, the Ammonites feared leaſt the enemie ſhould ſpeedily ſcale and enter the Ci-tie on that ſide where Vrias was ranked: for which cauſe they picked out a ſquadron of the moſt reſolute men amongſt them, and ſetting open their gates, ſodainly with ſwift courſe, force and violence, they caſt themſelues vpon their enemies. They that were neere Vrias ſeeing them draw neere, retyred backe againe, according as Ioab had before hand commanded them: but Vrias being aſhamed to flie, or forſake his ranke, expected the enemie, and valiantly encountring I him, he ſlue diuers of them; but at laſt being incloſed and ſhut in the middeſt of them, he was ſlaine, and with him ſome other of his companions periſhed in the conflict. This done, Ioab ſent meſſengers vnto the king to certifie him, that not enduring the delay of the ſiege, and aſſailing and ſcaling the walles, he was compelled to returne backe into his campe, with loſſe of ſome men, and repulſe from the Citie; yet had he commanded the meſſengers, that if they perceiued the King to be diſpleaſed with the newes, they ſhould giue him to vnderſtand that Vrias was dead.

The king hearing this diſcourſe (according as Ioabs meſſengers had deliuered it) made a ſhew to be diſpleaſed, ſaying, that it was a fault in him that he had ſo neerely approched the wall, alled-ging that he might haue done farre better, to haue taken the towne by mine or engine: vrging in way of example the act of Abimelech Gedeons ſonne, who intending to ſurpriſe by force a tower K that was within the Citie of Tebez, was ſtrooken with a ſtone that was caſt at him by an old woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entring an action ouerraſh and dangerous, ſhamefully died. In remembrance of whoſe diſaſter, they ought to haue beene more warie, » and not to haue approched the wall of the enemie ſo neerely. For it is a very good point in » warre, to haue in memorie both fatall and fortunate ſucceſſes, to the end that when a man is in » the like dangers, he may follow the one, and flie the other. Whileſt he thus rebuked them, the meſſenger certified him of Vrias death, which did ſomewhat appeaſe him: So that he commanded them to tell Ioab, that it was but an humane accident, and that ſuch was the nature of warre, that ſometime the one ſide had the better, and ſometime the other: to conclude, that he ſhould prouide for the ſiege, and take care leaſt hereafter they ſhould receiue any further loſſe; coun- L ſelling him by trenches and engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all thoſe that were in the towne ſhould be put to the ſword. The meſſenger thus diſmiſſed, reported all theſe things vnto Ioab, according to the Kings commandement. But Vrias wife, hauing notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him diuers daies: and when the dule and lamentations were finiſhed and performed to the dead; the king eſpouſed her incontinent, and ſhe bare him a man child: yet God beheld not this marriage with a fauourable eye, but was wroth with Dauid, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dreame, he blamed the king very ſore.
Now Nathan who was a wiſe and experienced man, knew well that when kings are diſpleaſed, they ſuffered themſelues rather to be ouercome by paſſion, then by reaſon: for which cauſe he M determined to conceale the menaces and threatnings that God had made, for that time; and diſ-courſed of other profitable matters with Dauid after this maner, requiring the king that it would » pleaſe him to cenſure and deliuer his opinion in the ſame. Two men (ſaid he) dwelt in one and the » ſame Citie: the one of them was rich, hauing many troupes of great and ſmall cattell; the other
» that was poore, had but one only ſheepe, which he nouriſhed with his children, ſharing him out a

A part of that whereon hee fed, and louing her as tenderly as a man would doe his onely daughter. It hapned that this rich man had a ſtranger that repaired to his houſe, for whoſe entertainement he would not ſuffer any one of his owne beaſts to be ſlain, but ſent a violent meſſenger, who tooke away the poore mans ſheepe, and cauſed it to bee dreſſed to entertaine his gueſt. This report of Nathans diſpleaſed the king very ſore, inſomuch as he ſwore vnto him, that hee that had beene ſo bolde to commit ſuch an act, was a wicked man, and that reaſon required that he ſhould reſtore him fourefolde, and that after hee ſhould bee put to death. Whereunto Nathan replyed, ſaying, that it was hee that deſerued this puniſhment, who had giuen ſentence againſt himſelfe, in that he had preſumed to commit ſo grieuous a ſinne. Moreouer, hee certified him of Gods diſpleaſure, who notwithſtanding hee had made him king ouer all the Hebrewes, and Lord ouer all the nati-
B ons round about, which were diuers and great; and who beſides theſe things had warranted him from the hands of Saul, and had giuen him wiues, whom hee had eſpouſed iuſtly and lawfully, was ſo deſpiſed and diſhonoured by him, that he had eſpouſed and kept by him an other mans wife, and cauſed her husband to bee ſlaine, and betrayed him vnto his enemie. For which ſinnes of his, hee pronounced that hee ſhould be puniſhed by God, and his wiues ſhould bee violated by one of his owne ſonnes, who ſhould likewiſe lay a ſnare for him: ſo that hee ſhould ſuffer a manifeſt plague for the ſinne hee had committed in ſecret. Nathan propheciеth of Dauids puniſhment, and ſharpely rebuketh him: he is condemned by his owne mouth, and repenteth himſelfe.

After the king had receiued this meſſage, he was ſore troubled; and being confuſed, he powred forth teares and ſighed for ſorrow, confeſſing that he had done wickedly: for vndoubtedly before
C this time he had alwaies feared God, and had neuer in his life offended him, but in that act with Vrias wife. whereupon after his ſubmiſſion, God was appeaſed and tooke compaſſion of him, promiſing him to continue both his life and kingdome, and that he would be no more diſpleaſed with him, if ſo be that he repented him of the ſinne he had committed. After that Nathan had declared theſe things vnto Dauid, he departed vnto his owne houſe. But God inflicted a grieuous ſickneſſe on the infant that was borne by Bethſabe: for which cauſe the king was ſore aggrieued, and for ſeuen daies ſpace would take no refection; notwithſtanding that he was earneſtly inſtanted thereunto by his houſhold ſeruants. He put on likewiſe a mourning habite, and laid himſelfe on the ground vpon a ſacke: beſeeching him that it would pleaſe him to grant him the childs life, towards whoſe mother he bare ſo exceeding loue and affection. But when the infant was de-
D ceaſed about the ſeuenth day of his ſickneſſe, his ſeruants durſt not certifie him thereof, ſuppoſing that if it ſhould come vnto his eare, he would the more obſtinately abſtaine from eating, and the care of his perſon, ſhould bee in danger by reaſon of his diſordinate griefe for his childe, to procure and haſten his own death, conſidering he had ſo vehemently bin afflicted and tormented for his onely ſickneſſe. But the king perceiuing by their lookes that his ſeruants were troubled, and that they concealed ſome fatall harme, and gathering thereby that his ſonne was dead: he called vnto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, hee aroſe and waſhed himſelfe, and put on a white garment, and preſented himſelfe before the tabernacle of God, and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and ſeruants were very ſore amazed, and wondred why he hauing done none of theſe things during the childs ſicknes, ſhould now af-
E ter his death doe all theſe things at once; they beſought him therefore that it might be lawfull for them to demand the cauſe of theſe his proceedings. To whom he anſwered, that he would teach and diſcouer that vnto them, of which they were ignorant. Vnderſtand you not (ſaid hee) that while the child was aliue, and I had hope of his recouery, I omitted no means whereby I might mooue God vnto mercy: but now after that he is dead, it were in vaine for me to ſpend my ſelfe with vnneceſſary griefe. Which when they heard, they praiſed the wiſedome and conſideration of the king. After this he knew Bethſabe his wife, who became with child, and was brought a-bed of a ſonne, who (by Nathans direction) was called Salomon. Meane while Ioab preſſed the Ammonites with a ſore ſiege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things neceſſarie; ſo that they were welny famiſhed for want of victuall and prouiſion: for they drew their water F from a little ſpring in ſuch ſort, that they feared leaſt if they ſhould vſe it to their owne contentment, it would bee ſodainely dried. He therefore wrote vnto the king, and certified him of the eſtate of the City, and exhorted him to come in perſon, and be preſent at the ſurpriſall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be fained by his name.

the crowne of the king of the Ammonites waighing a talent of gold, in the midst wherof was enchased a Sardonyx of great valew, which Dauid wore vpon his head. He found likewise in that citie diuers spoyles of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the Cities of the Ammonites which he tooke by force. But after that the king was returned vnto Ierusalem, there fell a grieuous accident in his family vpon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull, and surpassed all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, borne by the same mother that Absalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of Dauid became enamoured: and for that he could not enioy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginitie, and the hand that was had of her (he grew so melancholy that his body dryed vp, and his colour changed through the very griefe that consumed him. A certaine coosin and friend of his called Ionathan (a man of great reach and quicke vnderstanding) perceiuing this his passion, and noting euery day how Amnons beautie and strength decayed and wasted, came vnto him and asked him the cause thereof, alleadging that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was growne passionate thorow the loue hee bare vnto his sister by the fathers side, Ionathan suggested him both the meanes and inuention to compasse his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himselfe to be sicke, and that if his father came to visit him, hee should desire him to send his sister to minister vnto him, by which meanes he should easily and speedily be deliuered of his sickenesse. This counsell of his was plausible in Amnons eares, who presently counterfaited sickenesse; and laid him downe on his bed (according as Ionathan had aduised him:) and when Dauid was come to visit him, he required him to send his sister vnto him, which he did. She being arriued, he praied her with her owne hands that she would temper: and frie some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her owne making: for which cause she in her brothers presence tempered the flower, and made certaine cakes and fried them in the frying pan, and presented them vnto him: but he tasted them not, but commanded all his seruants to retire themselues out of his lodging, because hee intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soone as this commandement of his was performed, hee prayed his sister to bring the meate into his most retired and priuie chamber: whereunto the damsell condescended: whereupon he sodainly surprised her and began to perswade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said vnto him: Forbeare my brother, forbeare to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Giue ouer this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which will breed nought else but disgrace and infamy to our whole family; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, require me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from mee by force. But hee inraged with loue, neglected all these sayings, and wholly poisoned with the sting of disordinate passion, rauished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist. And as soone as hee had aslaked his lustfull desire, a certaine hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many iniurious words against Thamar: so that hee commanded her to arise and depart. Shee answered, that this second outrage was more hainous then the former; for that hauing violated her, hee would not suffer her to remaine there vntill night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, and during the light, to the end she might meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: Notwithstanding all these iust reasons of hers, he commanded his seruant to driue her out of the doores. Shee strangely aggrieued at the outrage and violence that had beene offered her, tore her garment (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the Citie with cries and lamentations, wherein shee expressed what wrong had beene done vnto her. With her thus distracted, her brother Absalon met, enquiring of her what euill hap had befallen her. To whom she reported all the iniurie which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her selfe, and to suffer moderately whatsoeuer had befallen her; and not to suppose herselfe to bee indignified by an act of her brother. Whereupon shee condescended, forbearing her exclaimes, and surceasing to publish the iniuries shee had receiued in the eares of the people. And thus remained shee a long time with her brother Absalon in the quality of a widdow.

Dauid hauing intelligence of that which had hapned, was sore displeased, notwithstanding hee loued Amnon very entirely, who was his eldest sonne, and would not disquiet him: but Absalon hated him extremely, expecting (without any word speaking) for some fit opportunity, wherein he might reuenge himselfe on the rauisher. Now when as two yeeres were expired since his sister was both derided and deflowred, it chanced that Absalon intending a sheep-shearing in Belsephon, a Citie of the tribe of Ephraim, inuited his father and brethren to come and banquet with him.

CHAP. VIII.

How through the domeſticall diſcord of his family, DAVID was baniſhed by his ſonne out of his kingdome.

B AFTER that Abſalons ſeruants had thus executed his commandement, a trouble and feare ſeiſed all the reſt of his brethren, inſomuch as they ſuſpected their owne perſons: for which cauſe mounting themſelues on horſebacke, they poſted all in haſte towards their father. But a certaine man outſtripping them in the way, reported vnto Dauid that Abſalon had ſlaine all his ſonnes. Who ſurpriſed with a bitter and mortall feare, in ſuppoſing that ſuch a number of his children ſhould be ſlaine, and that by their owne brother, neither inquired the cauſe or any thing els which might be ſifted out in ſo grieuous an inconuenient that had hapned, but gaue himſelfe ouer to extreame and ſtrange diſcomforts, and renting his garments laid him downe on the earth, bewailing all his children, both theſe that were ſlaine, as him alſo that had ſlaine them. But Ionathan the ſonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his paſſion, telling him that he could not be perſwaded that the reſt of his children were ſlaine, in that he C could conceiue no probable cauſe of coniecture. But as touching Amnon there needed no queſtion, for that it was very like that Abſalon (by reaſon of the iniury which was offered vnto his ſiſter Thamar) would hazzard himſelfe to kill him. Meane while a great trample of horſes, and a confuſed troupe of men brake off their diſcourſe. Theſe were the kings ſonnes, who returned in poſt from the banquet: Againſt theſe the father iſſued out, accompanying their dolefull teares with a heauy and ſorrowfull countenance: and ſeeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he ſuppoſed to be loſt, returned in ſafetie, they were all of them on euery ſide giuen ouer to teares and lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the king his murthered ſonne. But Abſalon fled vnto Geſſur (vnto his grandfather on the mothers ſide, and Lord of that place) and ſoiourned with him three whole yeeres: at the end whereof Dauid determined to ſend D for his ſonne Abſalon; not to the intent to puniſh him, but to retire him vnto him (by reaſon that the indignation he had conceiued againſt him, was at that time aſlaked) Ioab alſo furthered this his reſolution by all meanes that were to him poſſible: For he cauſed a certaine old woman attired in mourning habit to preſent her ſelfe before Dauid, who ſaid vnto him, that betwixt her two ſonnes that liued in the countrey, there hapned ſuch a different, that falling to handy-ſtrokes they were ſo whet the one againſt the other, that not induring to be parted, the one of them in ſuch ſort wounded the other, that he died; and for that the kinſmen were ſore moued againſt the murtherer, and ſought without mercie to depriue him of life, ſhee humbly beſought the king that he would giue her her ſonnes life, and not depriue her of that hope that remained her to ſuſtaine her old yeers with; which he ſhould bring to paſſe, if ſo be he prohibited thoſe that would kil her ſon E from executing their intents: for that except it were for feare which they had of him, they would by no meanes be withdrawne from their fatal and bloody reſolution. Now when as the king had granted her requeſt, the woman began once more to breake into theſe ſpeeches: I moſt humbly thanke your maieſtie (ſaid ſhee) who haue had compaſſion of mine age, and doe ſo prouidently foreſee that I be not depriued of my ſonne; but to the intent I may be the better aſſured of thy humanity, I beſeech thee (O King) firſt of all pacifie thy diſpleaſure conceiued againſt thy ſonne, and be no more incenſed againſt him: For how can I perſwade my ſelfe that you will doe me this grace, if you your ſelfe euen vntill this day continue your diſpleaſure conceiued vpon the like occaſion againſt your ſonne? For it is contrarie to the rules of wiſedome, to adde to the remedileſſe loſſe of one ſonne, the hapleſſe death of a fathers liuing hope. Vpon theſe words the King began F preſently to ſuſpect that Ioab had ſuborned this woman, and vnderſtanding no leſſe by the olde womans report, he ſent for Ioab, and told him that he grauted him that which hee deſired, commanding him to ſend for Abſalon, aſſuring him that his diſpleaſure was pacified, and choller aſſwaged. Ioab caſt himſelfe downe proſtrate before the King, and reuerently receiuing his word of reconciliation, went vnto Geſſur and fet Abſalon from thence with him, and brought him to Ieruſalem. he exceeded all thoſe that liued more deliciouſly and daintily: his glibband or haire was ſo thicke that it could ſcarcely be powled in eight daies, and waighed two hundred ſicles which amount to fiue pound. He liued alſo two yeeres in Ieruſalem, and was the father of three ſons, and one faire daughter, which Roboam the ſonne of Salomon afterwards tooke to wife, of whom he begat a ſon called Abia. In proceſſe of time he ſent meſſengers vnto Ioab, that now at length he would pacifie his father, and beſeech him to admit him to his preſence, that he might both ſee and ſubmit him- H ſelfe vnto him. But becauſe Ioab made ſmall reckoning of theſe his motions, hee ſent of his ſer-uants, and commanded them to burne and ſpoile Ioabs poſſeſſions that abbutted vpon his: who hearing of that which had hapned vnto him, reſorted vnto Abſalon, accuſing him and queſtioning with him for what cauſe he had done him this iniurie. To whom Abſalon anſwered: I haue (ſaid he) inuented this ſtratagem to make thee come vnto mee, ſeeing thou madeſt ſmall account of my commiſſions, whereby I haue charged thee to reconcile mee vnto my father. And at this preſent I beſeech thee that thou wilt mooue my father in my behalfe; otherwiſe I ſhall thinke my returne more grieuous then my baniſhment hath beene, if ſo bee my father ſhall as yet continue his diſpleaſure. Ioab was perſwaded through the compaſſion he conceiued of the neceſſitie wher-in he ſaw him, and went and ſollicited the king, with whom he ſo effectually debated as touching I Abſalon, that altering his contrary diſpoſition, he graciouſly and ſpeedily ſent and called for him.
As ſoone as he came vnto his preſence, Abſalon caſt himſelfe proſtrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: But Dauid raiſed and lifted him vp, and promiſed him that from thenceforth hee would no more vpbraid him with thoſe miſdeedes. After all things had thus fallen out, Abſalon within a little ſpace aſſembled a great number of horſes and charriots, and entertained fiftie men for his guard, and euery day early in the morning preſented himſelfe before the kings palace, and talked with thoſe that reſorted thither; about the triall of their differents; and whereas ſome of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alleadging that his father had no good counſellers, and that perhaps he himſelfe had in ſome things iudged amiſſe: and by theſe means indeuoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them that if he had the like authority, he would make them know by proofe what his equity K was. Hauing by theſe plauſible perſwaſions drawne the hearts of the common people vnto him, he thought himſelf already ſeiſed of their ſeruices in whatſoeuer he intended. Some foure yeeres after his reconciliation, he came to his father Dauid, requiring of him that he might goe to Hebron & ſacrifice vnto God, according as he had vowed at ſuch time as he fled from his preſence.
Which requeſt of his when Dauid had granted him, he reſorted thither being attended with ſelfe had commanded them to doe. When the newes hereof came vnto Dauids eares, and he was L thorowly aſcertained beyond all conceit, how his ſonne had behaued himſelfe; he ſuſpected and doubted his impietie and arrogancy, wondring that he ſhould ſo ſoone and ſo lewdly forget him-ſelfe of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrarie to all law plunge himſelfe and hazzard his reputation in more grieuous offences: as firſt of all to peruert the eſtate of the kingdome which God had eſtabliſhed: and ſecondly, in complotting to depriue and degrade his owne father. For which cauſe he determined to flie to the other ſide of Iordan, conducting with him his moſt inward and hearty friends, to whom he reported the vnbridled furie of his ſonne, remitting all things vnto God who iudgeth all things; and leauing the gouernment of his royall houſe to the diſpoſition of his ſixe concubines, he departed from Ieru- M ſalem. With him iſſued an affectionate and great number of people; beſides thoſe ſixe hundreth ſouldiers, who had followed him in his baniſhment during Sauls life time. And although the high prieſts Abiathar and Sadoc with all the Leuites had concluded to depart with him, yet perſwaded he them to abide with the Arke, aſſuring them that God would deliuer them: yea although the Arke were vnremooued from his place. He commanded Abiathar likewiſe to ſend him priuate

But Ethæus the Gittite by no perſwaſions of the king could bee induced to ſtay, but contrarie to his command followed him, whereby hee more manifeſtly expreſſed his affection towards him. But as he mounted and aſcended on his bare feet vpon the mountaine of Oliuet, and all they of his traine followed him (intermixing their trauell with bitter teares) a certen meſſenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Abſalon, and held on his ſide. Which report aggrauated and increaſed his griefe: ſo that he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to alienate the affection of Abſalon from Achitophel, for feare leaſt if he ſhould giue him ſome ſiniſter counſell, he might eaſily be perſwaded thereunto, becauſe that Achitophel was a man of ripe iudgement and ready execution in all that concerned him. B he beheld the City: and as if he had vtterly been baniſhed from his kingdome, he began with abundant teares to call vpon GOD. There met hee with Chuſai his ſincere and vnfained friend, whom when hee be beheld with his garments rent, with aſhes on his head, and lamenting the vnhappy change which he then beheld: Dauid cheered him, and exhorted him to be no waies diſcomforted; and finally, beſought him to returne vnto Abſalon, as vnder a colour that hee had forſaken his part, where diligently prying into his ſecrets, he might oppoſe himſelfe againſt Achitophels counſels, becauſe he might not ſo much pleaſure him in keeping him company, as in ſtaying with Abſalon. Chuſai being after this manner perſwaded by Dauid, returned backe to Ieruſalem, where preſently after he encountred with Abſalon, who repaired thither. In the meane time Dauid marching onward a little further, chanced to meete with Siba Mephiboſeths ſeruant,

This man droue before him two Aſſes loaden with victuals, which hepreſented to Dauid and his company, to refreſh themſelues with; and being demanded where he had left Mephiboſeth: In Ieruſalem (ſaid he) where he expecteth to be choſen king, thorow the occaſion of thoſe troubles that had happened, and in memory of the benefits that diuers men had receiued at Sauls hands. Dauid diſpleaſed with that which he heard, gaue Siba all thoſe riches wherewith he had gratified Mephiboſeth in times paſt, deeming him more worthy of the ſame then Mephiboſeth. Wherewith Siba was very highly contented.

D more Dauids friends inuironed and defended him, the more obſtinately perſeuered he in his reproofes and ſcandalous railings: calling him murtherer, and captaine of the wicked, charging him like an impure and execrable man to get him out of the kingdome, giuing God thanks for that he had depriued him of his kingdome by the meanes of his owne ſonne, and in puniſhment of thoſe crimes which he had committed againſt his owne maſter. This his ſo cruell and vnbridled liberty, mooued all Dauids followers to diſpleaſure; ſo that all of them were prepared to reuenge them on Simei; and amongſt the reſt Abiſai would haue ſlaine him: but Dauid pacified his diſpleaſure, willing him to forbeare, for feare (ſaid he) leaſt to our preſent miſeries we annexe a further and new occaſion. For in as much as concerneth my ſelfe, I ſet light by this mad dog, and refer the matter vnto God, who is the cauſe that he is thus deſperately bent againſt vs. Neither is it

He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei ſaid, who ranne on the other ſide of the mountaine, railing and reuiling at him. When Dauid was arriued on the banke of Iordan, he muſtered and refreſhed his army, who were ſore wearied: meane while Abſalon entring Ieruſalem with Achitophel his Counſellor, was ſaluted and applauded by the whole concourſe of the people; and amongſt the reſt Dauids friend came vnto them, who proſtrating himſelfe before Abſalons feete, wiſhed him both proſperitie and perpetuitie in his kingdome. To him Chuſai anſwered both readily and wiſely, that it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

Sith therefore (ſaid he, my Soueraigne) that both theſe are for you, it concerneth me to follow you, becauſe you haue receiued the kingdome from God: If therefore you eſteeme mee to be your faithfull friend; I will approoue vnto you my loyalty and true affection in like manner, as in your knowledge I haue testified in effect vnto your father, who ought not to bee displeased at G that which hath hapned, since the kingdome is not transported into an other house, but remaineth in his owne family, because he who was his son receiued the same. By such like words he reconciled himselfe to Absalon, whereas before that time he was inwardly suspected. Hereupon Achito- phel was sent for to consult with him about their affaires in hand: who gaue him counsell to abuse all his fathers concubines; and make them his owne. For, said he, from that time forward, the people will beleeue that you and he will neuer be reconciled; and will bee more ready to beare armes and inuade your father for your sake. For hitherto (said he) they haue vnwillingly professed themselues to be his enemies, suspecting least a peace should be concluded betwixt the father and the sonne. Absalon beleeuing this aduise of his, caused a Tent or roiall Pauillion to be pitched in the sight of all the people, whereinto he entred, and had the company of his fathers concubines. All which fell out, according as the Prophet Nathan had fore-told, at such time as he cer- H tified Dauid, that his owne sonne should make warre against him.

CHAP. IX.

ABSALONS warre against his father: his death, and the discomfiture of his armie.

WHEN Absalon had done that which Achitophel had instructed him in, hee requested him once more to counsaile him concerning that warre which he had enterprised against his father: who required ten thousand chosen men at his hand, promising him to kill Dauid, and to bring all the rest that were in his conduct vnder his subiection: assuring him I that Absalons kingdome would bee then established, when Dauids head were cut off from his shoulders. When this aduise of his had highly cõtented him, he sent for Chusai, who was the chil-lest amongst Dauids friends (for so Dauid himselfe had tearmed him) to whom he discouered the aduice which Achitophel had giuen him, and required him to giue his opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well that if Achitophels counsaile were followed, Dauid should be in danger to be apprehended and slaine, enforced all his arguments & counsails to the contrary. For,
» said he, my Liege, you are sufficiently informed both what your fathers valour is, and their vertue » that accompany him; who hath fought many battels, and hath had the vpper hand ouer all his e» nemies. It is to be feared also least he at this present be encamped in the field. For, he is well ex» ercised in leading armies, and to preuent any stratagems, wherby the enemy may inuade him, and » about the euening hee hath perhaps left his men hidden in some straight, or in ambush behinde K
» some rock: and if our men shall assaile him, his souldiers will by litle and litle retire, and afterward
» recouering courage, by reason that the King shall be neere vnto them, they will charge vs afresh;
» and during their medley, your father will suddainly breake out of his ambush, and encourage his » owne men, and discomfort yours: wisely therefore examine mine aduice, and if you find that it be » good, neglect that which Achitophel hath giuen you. Send mee thorow all the countrey of the » Hebrewes, commanding euery one to take armes and march out against your father: and when » you haue gathered together these forces, be your selfe in person the Generall of the armie, and » commit it not to another mans charge, and assuredly expect to haue an easie victory ouer him, if » you assaile him in the open field, for that hee is accompanied with a very few men, and your » selfe are attended by many thousands, who at least-wise if they loue you, and will shew a good af- L » fection towards you, may easily rid you of that enemy. And if so be your father shut himselfe vp » in any Citie, we will and may subuert the same by mines and engines. This aduise of his seemed to be better then that of Achitophels, so that Absalon preferred the same. For it was God that put this thought into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and respect Chusais counsell.

2. King. 17. Achitophels counsaile perswading Absalon to pursue Dauid. Chusais opposition.

Chusais counsell accepted. Achitophels reiected.

Now when Chusai had thus preuailed, he presently repaired to the high Priests Sadoc and A- biathar, certifying them what Achitophel had complotted, and how he had contradicted him: finally, how his opinion had taken place, giuing them in charge to send priuate intelligence vnto Dauid thereof, and to informe him of his sonnes resolution, wishing him with all speede to passe ouer the riuer of Iordan, for feare least Absalon being informed of his aboad in that place, should M make haste, and pursue him, and ouertake him before he might recouer a place of securitie.

Now had the high Priests before hand prouided that their sonnes should lie hid without the Citie, of set purpose, to the ende they might bee sent vnto Dauid to informe him how matters went. They therefore sent a trusty seruant vnto these, who brought them newes of Absalons deliberations, with expresse commandement to enforme the King thereof with all speede,

A who presently vpon this intelligence, like good and faithfull ministers, posted with all speede to report their fathers newes vnto the king.

The yeere of the world, 2920. before Christs Nativitie. 1044.

But scarcely had they trauelled two furlongs, when certaine horsemen discouered them, and brought newes thereof vnto Absalon, who presently sent out scoutes to apprehend them: which when the children of the high Priest perceiued, they forsooke the high way, and incontinently retired themselues into a certaine village neere vnto Ierusalem, which is called Bocchura, where they besought a certaine woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of securitie, who let them downe into a pit, and couered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. She being demanded by those that pursued them whether she saw them, denied the same, saying, that as soone as she had giuen them drinke, they departed from her presently; assuring them that if they pre-

B sently and speedily pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not finde them, they returned from whence they came. The woman perceiuing that they were departed, and that there was no cause of feare, least the yong men should be surprised, she drew them out of the pit, and set them onward of their way: who, with as great speede as was possible, resorted vnto Dauid, and declared vnto him exactly what Absalons deliberation was. Hereupon Dauid passed the flood Iordan presently with all his men, and although it were night could not be withdrawne by reason of the darknesse.

Dauid informed of Absalons deliberation, passeth himselfe and his whole armie ouer Iordan by night.

But Achitophel seeing that his opinion had beene reproued, tooke his horse and suddainly repaired vnto his countrey of Gelmone: there calling together his houshold seruants before him, he discouered vnto them what aduise he had giuen Absalon; which since he had not accepted, he

C told them that shortly they should see him dead, alleadging that Dauid would haue the vpper hand in the war, and should returne into his kingdome. It is better therefore, said he, for me with a great mind, and as it becommeth a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my selfe to Dauids punishment for partaking with Absalon, and giuing him counsell. This said, he retired himselfe into the most secret part of his house, and hung himselfe, being both his owne iudge and executioner: after which, his kinsmen cut him down and buried him. But Dauid (as we said) hauing past Iordan, came and incamped in a strong Citie, the most defenced in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great beneuolence by all the noble men of that country, partly moued thereunto by the mans present necessitie, partly through the reuerence of his former felicity. These were Berzillai the Galaadite, Siphar the gouernour of the prouince of the Ammonites, and Achitophel perceiuing his counsell was despised, hung himselfe.

D Machir the chiefe of the country of Galaad, who gaue Dauid and his whatsoeuer they wanted, in abundance: so that they lacked neither beds, nor bread, nor flesh, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sicke and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serue for repose or refection. In this estate remained he. But Absalon assembled a great multitude of people to make warre vpon his father; and after he had passed Iordan, he pitched his tents neere vnto his fathers, within the country of Galaad, and made Amasa Generall of his armie, opposing him against Ioab his cosin: for Amasas father was Iethar, and his sister was Abigail, sister to Saruia, mother to Ioab. When Dauid had mustered and numbred his forces, and found that hee had fortie thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently to hazzard battell, and not to expect till Absalon should charge vpon them.

Hedio & Ruffinus. cap. 10. 2. King. 18. Absalon passeth ouer Iordan.

E Hee therefore ordained Coronels ouer thousands of his men, and diuided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gaue in charge to Ioab; the second to Abisai his brother; and the third to Ethæus his familiar friend (who was of the city of Geth.) In this battel his friends would not admit his presence (and that vpon good and deepe consideration) for they saide, that if they should be defeated in his company, they should vtterly loose all good hope: but if one squadron should be ouercome, the rest might haue their recourse vnto him, who might assemble vnto them and strengthen them with greater force; the rather for that the enemies would alwaies thinke it likely, that he had some other army with him. This counsell of theirs seemed pleasing vnto him, for which cause he remained within the City. But at such time as he sent out his friends vnto the battell, he besought them that (in remembrance of all the benefits and fauours hee had bestowed

Thus praying God to giue them victory, hee dismissed them to enter battell. But when as Ioab had planted his armie right ouer against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plaine, hauing a wood vpon their backs; Absalon also drewe out his army against him. So that encountring, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazzarding themselues in all dangers, and employing ploying all their affections, to the intent that Dauid might recouer his kingdome: the others neither refusing to doe or endure any thing, so that Absalon might not be depriued, or exposed to his fathers punishment and displeasure for his insolent attempt. Besides that, they held it an indignitie for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be surmounted by such a handfull of people as followed Ioab: deeming it to be an vtter disgrace vnto them, that being so many thousands of them in armes, they should be discomfited by Dauids followers. G

The flight and ouerthrow of Absolons armie.

But Ioab and his men being more skilfull and trained in feates of armes then the rest, discomfited and brake Absalons army: so that they fled thorow woods and steepe places. Dauids souldiers pursuing after them, tooke some, and slew other some; so that both in flight and fight, a great number of them were put to the sword: for there fell that day about twenty thousand men. But all Dauids troupes freshly set vpon Absalon, who was easily knowne by reason of his absolute beauty, and high stature: he fearing to be surprised by his enemies, mounted vpon his royall mule, H and fled in great haste. And for that by swift motion of his body, his locks were scattered abroad, his bush of haire was entangled in a thicke and branchie tree, where he hung after a strange manner, and his mule ranne onward with great swiftnesse, as if shee had as yet borne her Master on her backe: but he hanging by the haire amidst the branches, suddainly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certaine souldier perceiued, he brought newes thereof vnto Ioab, who promised him to giue him fiftie sicles, if he would kill him.

The souldier answered, that if he would giue him two thousand he would not commit such a murther on the sonne of his Soueraigne, the rather for that in the presence of them all, Dauid had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Ioab commanded him to shew him the place where he I had seene Absalon hang: who no sooner discouered him, but thrusting a Iauelin to his heart, he slew him. That done, Ioabs Esquires arrounding the tree tooke him downe; and casting him into a deepe and obscure pit, they ouerwhelmed him with stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a tombe, or some great, high, and stately monument. After this, when Ioab had sounded the retreat, he withdrew his souldiers from pursuite, supposing it to be an innaturall thing for one countreyman to flesh himselfe vpon another. Absalon had erected in the royall valley two furlongs distant from Ierusalem a Marble pillar, which he had intituled by the name of Absalons Hand; saying, that when his children should be dead, his name should remaine in that pillar. Now he had three sonnes, and a daughter which was called Thamar, as we haue said heretofore, who was married vnto Roboam, Dauids Nephew, and had by him a sonne called Abia, who succeeded his father in the kingdome: of whom we will speake more conueniently in his place. CHAP. X.

Chusai sent to certifie Dauid of the victorie.

AFTER that Absalon was slaine, all the people returned priuately to their owne houses: but Achimaas the sonne of the high Priest Sadoc drew neere vnto Ioab, requiring his licence to repaire vnto Dauid, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods helpe and prouidence he had obtained the victory. This did the Generall denie him, telling him that L it was not conuenient that he, who before times was wont to bring ioyfull newes, should now certifie the king of his sons death. He therefore commanded him to stay, and calling Chusai to his presence, he gaue him commission to certifie the king of that which he had seene. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to go, promising him that he would make no mention but of the victory; and that as touching Absalons death, he would not vtter any thing: whereupon he dismissed him also, who chusing the shorter way (which he onely knew) outstripped Chusai. Now as Dauid sate in the gate of the Citie (expecting some messenger that might certifie him of the successe of the battell) one of the Sentinels perceiuing Achimaas, that came running hastily, and vnable to discouer who it was, told Dauid that he saw a messenger comming towards him, who answered that it was some one that brought ioyfull newes. Anon after he told M him that a certaine other messenger followed: To whom Dauid answered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceiued that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the high Priests son, and that he was neere at hand, he ran first of all and certified Dauid; who was very glad thereof, saying, that he brought some good and desired newes as touching the euent of the battell: and no sooner had the king spoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himselfe vpon his face before Dauid, to whom he reported that his armie had the victorie. Being afterwards

A terwards demanded what was become of Abſalon: He anſwered, that he incontinently departed from the camp as ſoone as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certaine cry of ſouldiers that purſued Abſalon: and further then that, he knew nothing, becauſe by Ioabs commandement he was ſpeedily ſent away to bring tydings of the victory. When Chuſai was come and had humbled himſelfe before the King, and had declared vnto him the ſucceſſe of the battell, the queſtion was asked how Abſalon did? Whereunto he anſwered. The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Abſalon. Theſe words quite extinguiſhed the delight and ioy that Dauid conceiued in the victory, and wholly amated his faithfull ſoldiers: for as touching the king, he aſcending the higheſt part of the City, bewailed his ſonne, beating his breaſt, tearing his haire, and afflicting himſelfe in all kinds, and after ſuch a ſort, as may not bee expreſſed; and crying out in a moſt mournfull manner: My ſonne (ſaid he) would G O D my ſonne that I were
B dead with thee, that I might be with thee. For whereas of his owne nature he was a very louing man, yet loued he Abſalon aboue all other moſt tenderly.

David hearing of Abſalons death by Chuſai, grieuouſly bewaileth him.

When the army and Ioab were informed that Dauid lamented his ſonne in this ſort, they had this reſpect, that they would not enter the City after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them moſt tenderly, as if they had returned from ſome diſcomfiture. But when as the king hauing his head couered, perſeuered in his deſire to bewaile his ſonne, Ioab entred in vnto him and ſaid: O king, you conſider not that in this behauiour of yours, you diſhonour your ſelfe: for it is to be thought that you hate thoſe that loue you, and expoſe themſelues to all perils for your loue; yea that you hate your ſelfe and your own ſucceſſion: and that contrariwiſe, you loue your moſt mortall enemies moſt entirely, ſith you be-
C waile them that were no leſſe, & who are iuſtly depriued of their liues. For if Abſalon had had the victory, and had poſſeſſed the kingdome in aſſurance, there had not any one of vs beene left aliue that loue you, but had all of vs ſuffered a moſt hated death; nay, and in the firſt ranke your ſelfe & your owne children: neither would they being our enemies haue lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea they would puniſh them likewiſe who ſhould haue any compaſſion of our miſeries: yet art thou not aſhamed to lament after this manner, for ſuch a man as moſt extreamely hated thee, who notwithſtanding he were thine owne ſonne, was ſo vngrateful and vngracious towards thee. Deſiſt therefore from thy vniuſt lamentation, and offer thy ſelfe in preſence to thy wel-deſeruing ſouldiers, and giue them thanks, that by their vertue haue obtained thee this victory: otherwiſe, if thou continue as thou haſt begunne, this day will I tranſlate both the kingdome and D the army from thee, and giue thee occaſion more grieuouſly and truly to lament thee of thy misfortunes then thou didſt before. By theſe words Ioab pacified and alaied the Kings lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common-weale: for clothing himſelfe in a roiall habite, whereby he might ſeeme more gracious in the ſight of his ſouldiers, he ſate him downe in the gate: ſo that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to ſalute him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11.

Whileſt theſe things paſt after this manner, they that remained aliue of Abſalons army, returning home vnto their houſes, ſent their meſſengers to euery corporation, aduertiſing them how many benefits they had receiued at Dauids hands, and how after many and grieuous wars, he had brought them to a ſecure libertie, and how vniuſtly expelling him, they had committed the kingdome vnto another. For which cauſe it behooued them, ſith he was dead whom they had cho-
E ſen, to make their ſupplication and ſubmiſſion vnto Dauid, that diſmiſſing his wrath, hee would receiue the people into his fauour, and according as before time, ſo now alſo he would vouchſafe them his pardon and protection. Of theſe things ſundry intelligences came vnto the kings eare, ſo that by expreſſe letters he commanded Sadoc and Abiathar the chiefe prieſts, that they would certifie the princes of the tribe of Iuda, that it ſhould be a great indignity for thē, that other tribes ſhould prefer Dauid to the kingdome before them, eſpecially ſith he was both of their tribe, and their kinſman alſo. In like manner he commanded them to ſpeake with Amaſa the generall, and expoſtulate with him, why he who was his Nephew by the ſiſters ſide, did not perſwade the armie to recommend the kingdom to his hands: willing them to aſſure him that he was not only to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but alſo for the gouernment of the whole ar-
F mie, according as Abſalon had granted him. Hereupon the high prieſts not onely conferred with the Princes aforeſaid, but alſo informed Amaſa what the king had promiſed in his behalfe, whereby they drew him to their faction. And firſt of all, thoſe of his owne tribe reuoked Dauid very inſtantly into the kingdome: the reſt of the Iſraelites, by their example and Amaſas authoritie, did the like alſo; and theſe Embaſſadors flocked vnto him to receiue him into Ieruſalem. But wonderfull and praiſe-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Iuda, who went out as far as the banke of Iordan to meete with him, with these came Simei the sonne of Gera, with a thousand men, G which he had brought with him of the tribe of Beniamin. Sitha likewise Sauls freeman came thither with his fifteen sons,& twenty seruants: who made a bridge ouer Iordan, that the king might the more easily passe ouer both himselfe and his armie. As soone as he came vnto Iordan, he was saluted by the tribe of Iuda: and Simei marching onward on the bridge, and prostrating himselfe at the kings feet, asked pardon of his offences, and besought him to remit his displeasure: and that in recouering his authority, hee would not first of all doe iustice on him, but that hee should remember this also, that he beeing induced by the repentance of his errour, did with the formost march out to meete him vpon his returne. Whilst thus he besought and lamented, Abisai, Ioabs brother spake after this manner. Why should he not die that hath thus villanously outraged the king, whom God hath established? But Dauid turned backe vnto him and said: Ye sonnes of Seruia, will you neuer cease to hatch new troubles; and to adde new diuisions to your former com- H motions? Know you not that this is the first day of my raigne? for which cause I sware an oath that I will pardon all them that haue committed any impiety against me, & that no one man shall depart from me in my disfauour. For which cause be of good cheere Simei, & feare thou not that I will seeke thy blood. Wherupon he adored the king & marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboseth, Sauls nephew came out to meet him, clothed in a desolate and sorry raiment, hauing his haires hanging downe in a neglected & sorrowfull manner. For since the time that Dauid fled and forsooke the city, he had bin in such sort distressed, that he neither had trimmed his haire, nor changed or cleansed his garment, supposing this calamity & deposition to touch him as neerly, as it did the king: and further, in that by Siba his steward, he had bin vniustly detracted and accused to the king. After he had prostrated himself, and adored the king, Dauid asked him for what cause I he forsooke him in his troubles, and offered not himselfe to accompany him in his flight? Who answered, that it was the wickednes of Siba, who was the cause therof: for he, said he, being commanded to prepare my necessaries for that iourney, neglected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had beene some abiect slaue: Otherwise had I had the vse of my feete, and the means to haue waited on thee in thy iourney, I had neuer endured to haue forsaken thee. Neither was he contented (my Liege) to hinder my deuout seruice toward thee, but furthermore, hee hath maliciously incensed your maiestie against me: yet know I well that your wisedome will not admit or giue credit to his detractions, both for that you are iust, as also for that GOD and truth which you onely aspire to, are onely beloued by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers daies, you were alwaies conuersant amongst the most difficult dangers, and followed and attempted by him, and wheras all our posterity by that meanes deserued to be vtterly K extinguished, yet haue you vsed both moderation and meeknes, especially in forgetting those indignities; at such time as the memory thereof affoorded you meanes to punish them. And notwithstanding all these things, you haue entertained me like your friend, feasted mee at your daily table, and dignified mee with no lesse honours, then if I had been one of your neerest and deerest kinsmen. When Dauid had heard these things, hee thought neither good to punish Mephiboseth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accused him; but after he had certified him that he had giuen Siba all his goods, yet did he pardon him, and promise him the restitution of halfe his possessions. Whereunto Mephiboseth replied. Let Siba (saith hee) possesse the whole, it onely sufficeth mee that I see your Maiestie restored againe into your kingdome. After this, Dauid inuited Berzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man and of great authority, and by whose bounty L during the time of his warre he was assisted, and who had attended him as farre as Iordan) to accompany him vnto Ierusalem, promising him to make no lesse account of him then of his father, and assuring him liberally to allow him in all things that concerned his honour and age. But hee being desirous to liue in priuate, besought his Maiesty to dismisse him from the Court, because (as he said) his age was so extreame as it made him vnapt for courtly pleasures, considering that he had attained to the age of fourescore yeeres: alledging that it better became him to thinke of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cause he besought Dauid to fauour him so much as that he might gouerne himselfe according to his owne desire, because that by reason of his age, he neither knew how to fauour meate nor drinke: besides, for that his hearing was lost, M so that hee could not distinguish nor discerne the sound of instruments, wherein they who conuerse in kings Courts doe most vsually take such delight.

Berzillai excuseth himself and will not resort to Ierusalem,

To this Dauid replied. Sith (said he) thou doest so instantly request me to giue thee leaue to depart from me, I dismisse thee: but leaue thou thy son Achimaas with me, who shall be master of my many fauours. Hereupon Berzillai left his son with him, and taking leaue of the king (with praier

A prayer that God would grant him the fulnes of all his desires) he returned to his own house. But Dauid went vnto Galgal) hauing already the halfe part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Iuda.) Thither resorted then vnto him the chiefe gouernours of that countrey, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining vpon the tribe of Iuda, for that vnwitting to the rest they had resorted to him, when as by a mutuall consent they should all of them haue met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Iuda requested them in no sort to misconstrue their preuention of them. For that by reason of alliance they had done this office, whereby being tied vnto him they were bound with more feruent study to doe him seruice: for neither in respect of that diligence of theirs receiued they any rewards, wherby they that came after should thinke themselues preiudiced in profit. This answer of theirs the princes of the tribes tooke not in good part, but thus they spake vnto their brethren: We wonder (said they) that you onely challenge
B the king to bee your kinsman, as if he were not to be accounted an allie vnto vs all, whom God hath equally placed to be gouernour ouer vs all; when as therefore the whole people consisteth of eleuen parts, you onely are but one; besides, we are your elders: so that you haue not dealt vprightly in that you haue secretly and couertly sought out the king. Whilest the gouernors in this sort debated the matter with them, a certaine wicked and seditious person called Siba, the sonne of Bochri of the tribe of Beniamin, standing vp in the midst of the people began to cry out with a loud voice, and to exclaime after this manner. We haue no part with Dauid, nor inheritance with the sonne of Iesse. This said, he sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed warre against the king, so that all men followed him, and forsooke Dauid. Onely the tribe of Iuda remained with him, and established him in the royall throne in Ierusalem: where remooving his concubines (which C his son Absalon had knowne) out of his palace, he neuer after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amasa generall of the armie, and placed him in the same degree which Ioab had, neere vnto the person of the King; commanding him that he should assemble the greatest forces that he might out of the tribe of Iuda, and that within three daies he should return vnto him, to the end that hauing deliuered him both the armie and the place of general, he might send him to make war vpon the son of Bochri. After that Amasa was departed, and emploied his time in gathering vp his army; the king seeing that he failed to returne vpon the third day, told Ioab that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater head by delay, and thereby breede vs more trouble and molestation then Absalon had done. For which cause (said he) stay thou not but take vnto thee those forces which thou hast in readinesse, and my sixe hundreth men with thy D brother Abisai, and pursue thou the enemy, and in what place soeuer thou meetest him, by all meanes indeauour thy selfe to giue him the battell. Haste thee therefore, and ouertake him, for feare least he seize some of our strongest Cities, and thereby procure vs much trauell and labour. Ioab with all expedition obeyed his commandement, and tooke with him the aforesaid sixe hundreth, with his brother Abisai, and commanded all the forces that were in Ierusalem to follow after him, and in his array issued he after Siba. Now when he came vnto Gabaon (a borough, some forty furlongs distant from Ierusalem) Amasa came and met with him, and brought with him great forces. Ioab hauing his sword girt by his side, and his curets on his backe, whilest Amasa came onward to salute him, subtilly and of set purpose let his sword slip out of his sheath, and taking it vp from the ground with one hand he drew neere vnto Amasa, vnder pretence to E kisse him on the chin, and sodainly thrust the sword that was in his other hand into his belly and slew him. Which action of his was both hainous and detestable, proceeding from a iealousie he had conceiued against a good yong man and his cosin, who had in no sort offended him, and onely by reason of the estate of Generall, which the King had giuen him; and because Dauid had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cause before that, he had slaine Abner. Notwithstanding this act of his seemed in some sort pardonable, by reason of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done vnto his brother Azael, yet was not this a sufficient colour to excuse the murther of Amasa. When this was done, he pursued Siba, and left a certaine man to waite vpon the body of Amasa, who had commandement giuen him to proclaime with a loud voice thorow the whole army, that he was iustly and deseruedly slaine, commanding those that
F bare any fauour to the kings title, to follow their General Ioab and his brother Abisai. Now whilest his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is vsuall in such like accidents) flocked round about it, he that had the charge of the body tooke it vp, and bare it into a certen place out of the way, and couered it with a garment: which done all the people followed Ioab.

Now whilest he pursued Siba thorow all the region of the Israelits, a certain man told him that he had retired himself into a certaine strong citie called Abelmacha; where he no sooner arriued, but that he begirt the Citie, and entrenched it round about; commanding his ſouldiers to vndermine and ouerthrow the walles: for he was ſore diſpleaſed becauſe they had ſhut the gates againſt him. But a certaine honeſt and prudent woman, ſeeing her countrey in extreme perill, aſcended the walles and called Ioab and his ſouldiers to a parlee; who comming foorth to conferre with him, ſhe ſpake after this manner: God (ſaid ſhe) ordained kings and generals of armies, to the end they might deſtroy the enemies of the Hebrewes, and plant amongſt them an vniuerſall and perpetuall peace; but you inforce your ſelues to deſtroy one of the mother Cities of Iſrael, that hath in no ſort offended you. Ioab praied God to be fauourable vnto them, and ſaid that for his owne part it was not his meaning that any one of the City ſhould die, neither his pretence to raſe and deface ſo famous a City; his intent was onely, that if Siba the ſonne of Bochri, and the kings aduerſary were deliuered into his hands to doe iuſtice on him, he would leuy the ſiege, and cauſe his army to retire from thence. When the woman had heard what Ioab had ſaid, ſhe praied him to ſtay a little while, promiſing him incontinently to caſt his head ouer vnto him. Whereupon ſhe came downe amongſt the aſſembly of the Citizens, to whom ſhee ſpake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miſerably ſuffer your wiues and children to be ſlaine for a wicked mans cauſe, and a ſtranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of Dauid your king, from whoſe hands you haue receiued ſo many benefits? thinke you that one onely City can reſiſt ſo huge an army? After this manner perſwaded ſhe them to cut off Sibas head, and to caſt it into Ioabs campe: which done, Ioab commanded the retreat to be ſounded, and leuied the ſiege, and returning backe into Ieruſalem, was once more declared Generall of all the people. The king alſo appointed Banaia captaine of his guards, and of ſixe hundreth ſouldiers. Adoram was made treaſurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achilaus had the charge of remembrancers. Suſa was made ſecretarie. Sadoc and Abiathar were made the high Prieſts. After this it hapned that the countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cauſe Dauid beſought God that he would haue compaſſion on his people, and that it might pleaſe him to manifeſt not onely the cauſe, but alſo the remedy of that malady. The Prophets anſwered him, that God would be reuenged of the wrong done vnto the Gabeonites, whom king Saul had deceiued and traiterouſly ſlaine, without reſpect of the oath, which the gouernour Ioſuah and the elders made vnto them. If therefore he would ſuffer the Gabeonites to reuenge the death of their ſlaughtered friends according to their deſire, God had promiſed to be appeaſed, and to deliuer the people from their imminent and preſent euils. As ſoone as he vnderſtood by the Prophets what God required, he ſent for the Gabeonites, & asked them what it was which they required: who wiſhed him to deliuer into their hands ſeuen of Sauls ſonnes to take their reuenge on them: whereupon the king made ſearch after them, onely ſparing and protecting Mephiboſeth the ſonne of Ionathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold on theſe ſeauen, they executed them according to their pleaſures: and thereupon God incontinently ſent downe raine and diſpoſed the earth to beare fruit; moiſtning and alaying the drouth forepaſſed, ſo that the land of the Hebrewes recouered againe his priſtine fruitfulneſſe. Not long after, the king made warre vpon the Philiſtines: and at ſuch time as the battell was ſtriken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chanced that the king hotly purſuing the chaſe was left alone, and diſcouered in his wearineſſe by one of the enemies called Acmon, the ſonne of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beſide his ſword had a iauelin, the point whereof waighed three hundreth ſicles, & a corſelet tiſſued with chaines, who returning backe charged Dauid very violently, with an intent to kill the king of his enemies, by reaſon that he ſaw him ſpent with trauell. But about the ſame inſtant, Abiſai, Ioabs brother, arriued in the place, who ſtept betweene them and reſerued the king, and ſlew his enemie. The whole army for a little ſpace were grieuouſly diſcomforted, in regard of the danger wherin the king had bin, and the gouernors ſwore that he ſhould neuer afterwards enter into battel with them, for feare leaſt he might fall into ſome diſaſter, by reaſon of his readineſſe and valour, and by that meanes ſhould depriue the people of thoſe gifts which were in him, which he had already made them feele; and whereof hereafter they ſhould be made partakers, if God ſhould vouchſafe him a long and bleſſed life. The king hauing intelligence that the Philiſtines were aſſembled in the city of Gazara, ſent out an army againſt them, in which Sabach the Hittite, one of Dauids redoubted and picked ſouldiers behaued himſelfe very valiantly, and gat great reputation: for he ſlew diuers of them that vaunted themſelues to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed vp with preſumption of their valour, and was chiefe authour of that victory which the Hebrewes had.

After this laſt receiued loſſe, the Philiſtines once more hazzarded their fortunes in warre, againſt

The third was the ſonne of Ilus called Sebas, who fighting againſt the Philiſtines, in a place called the Iawe (and ſeeing the Hebrewes to be affraid of their power, and almoſt out of heart) reſiſted them alone, as if he had bin an arraunged army, and ſlew ſome of them, and purſued and put the reſt to flight, in that they were vnable to ſuſtaine his force and violence. Theſe three exploited with their owne hands theſe executions of warre. About that time that the king liued in Ieruſalem, the army of the Philiſtines came out to make warre vpon him, and Dauid as we haue declared heretofore) was gone vp into the higher city to aske counſell of God, what the euent of that warre ſhould bee; and the enemies beeing incamped in that valley (that extendeth it ſelfe as farre as Bethleem, a City ſome twenty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem) Dauid ſaid to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was born,

Theſe three men hearing theſe words, inſtantly ran out, and paſt thorow the enemies campe, and went to Bethleem: where hauing drawne water, they returned backe vnto the king, ſallying thorow the midſt of their enemies, bringing newes that the Philiſtines beeing affraid of their hardineſſe, and great courage, kept themſelues vpon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithſtanding their ſmall number. But the king taſted not of this water which they brought him, ſaynig that it was bought with the danger of mens liues, and therefore that it was no reaſon he ſhould drinke thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation vnto God, giuing him thankes becauſe hee had deliuered his ſeruants; After theſe three followed Abiſai Ioabs brother, who ſlew ſixe hundreth of the e-

The thirty three other were of like valour and vertue. But King Dauid being deſirous to know how many thouſands of men he could number amongſt the people, and forgetting the commandement ordained by Moſes (who had giuen order that if the people had beene numbred, there ſhould be paide vnto God for euery head halfe a ſicle) he commanded Ioab to goe and number all the people: and although Ioab had manifeſtly proued vnto him that it was a thing no waies neceſſary; yet could he not perſwade him, but that he enioyned him with all expedition, to ſet forward on his way, and muſter the people of the Hebrewes.

Hereupon Ioab tooke with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuited all the countrey of the Hebrewes, to know how many men there were: and at the end of nine moneths and twenty daies, he returned to Ieruſalem to the king; and preſented him with the liſt of the people, the tribe of Beniamin only excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Leui.) This done, the king perceiuing that he had diſpleaſed God, was very ſorrowfull and penſiue. The route of the other Iſraelites was of nine hundreth thouſand men, able to beare armes, and to follow the warre, beſides that the onely tribe of Iuda contained 400. thouſand men. When the Prophets had certified Dauid how God was diſpleaſed with him, he began to pray & beſeech him that it might pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God ſent the Prophet Gad vnto him, who brought him the choiſe of three things, willing him to make election wuich of the three he would endure: either that famine for ſeuen yeers ſpace ſhould raign in his countries; or that warre for three moneths ſpace ſhould afflict the ſame, wherein he ſhould haue the worſt; or that the plague and peſtilence ſhould for three daies ſpace raunge amongſt the Hebrewes. Being thus diſtraught and troubled by reaſon of his difficult election, amidſt theſe imminent miſeries; and the Prophet vrging him to returne a ſhort anſwer, whereby God might be ſatisfied: the king bethinking him that if he ſhould aske famine, hee ſhould rather ſeeme to reſpect his owne ſecuritie, then the common-weale, in that no danger might by that meanes touch him, for that he had great ſtore of corne in his barne, and they vnfurniſhed; and if for three moneths he ſhould make choiſe to be ouercome by the enemy, in that caſe alſo hee might ſeeme to haue care of himſelfe, in that he had many ſtrong Caſtles and a valiant guard of men to attend his perſon: he therefore made choiſe of a plague, that was both as incident to the prince, as the ſubiect; wherein each man was touched with equall and imminent feare: ſaying, that it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had receiued this anſwer from him, he reported it vnto God; who ſent a plague and mortalitie amongſt the Hebrewes, whereby they died after diuers manners: ſo that it was very hard to diſcerne the malady; which being but one kinde, yet notwithſtanding ſeiſed the people by tenne thouſand cauſes, and vnknowne occaſions. For one of them died after another, and the ſickneſſe ſurpriſing them at vnawares, brought a ſodain diſſolution of the ſpirits, and ſwouning vpon them; ſo that ſome of them gaue vp the ghoſt with grieuous torments, and moſt ſtrange dolors. Others were preſently parched vp through the burning agonies they endured, and (vnrecouerable by any counſell or remedy) conſumed away amidſt their languiſhing fits and tortures. Others died ſtrangled, hauing their eies ſodainly darkned and blinded. Otherſome giuing order for the burial of their houſhold ſeruants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day breake (at which time the peſtilent mortalitie began to rage) vntill dinner time, there died ſeuentie thouſand perſons. And now had the Angell of God ſtretched out his hand ouer Ieruſalem, readie to inflict puniſhment thereon, when as the king put on ſackcloth and proſtrated himſelfe on the ground, beſeeching and praying God that it would pleaſe him to ſurceaſe his wrath, and be pacified with the number of thoſe that were already conſumed by the peſtilence. Whileſt thus he prayed, lifting vp his eyes, he beheld the angell of God houering in the ayre ouer Ieruſalem, with his naked ſword: whereupon he beſought God and ſaid, that it was he that was the ſhepheard, who had deſerued to be puniſhed, and not his flocke; who ought to be fauoured in that they had not any waies offended, praying him to ſatisfie his diſpleaſure vpon him and his poſteritie, and to ſpare the people.

Hereupon God accepting his prayer, ſurceaſed the plague, and ſent the Prophet Gad vnto him, commanding him that he ſhould preſently repaire to the threſhing floore of Oronna the Iebuſite, and there build an altar, on which he ſhould offer ſacrifice vnto God. Which when Da-

A uid vnderſtood, he neglected not this ordinance, but went preſently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threſhed his corne) ſaw the king) accompanied by his ſonnes) comming towards him, he ranne out to meete him, and humbled himſelfe before him. This man was by nation a Iebuſite, and one of the greateſt friends that Dauid had (by meanes wherof he left him vnſpoiled at ſuch time as the fortreſſe of the Iebuſites was taken, as we haue heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cauſe his Lord came thus vnto him, who was his ſeruant? Dauid anſwered him that it was to this intent, that he might purchaſe his threſhing floore, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer ſacrifice vnto God. Oronna replied, that both his floore, charriots, and oxen were the kings to offer vp for a burnt ſacrifice, beſeeching GOD that he would graciouſly accept that offering. To this the king anſwered, that he highly eſteB med his ſimplicitie and magnanimitie, and that he fauourably reſpected the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleaſure that he ſhould receiue the price of the ſame, becauſe he held it an inconuenient to offer ſacrifice vnto God vpon other mens charges. To this Oronna anſwered, that his Maieſtie might doe as beſt pleaſed him. Hereupon he bought the foreſaid floore of him for fiftie ſicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place and offered ſacrifices thereon, as well burnt offerings as other ſacrifices for proſperitie: and by this meanes the diuine maieſtie was appeaſed, and euer after ſhewed himſelfe fauourable. (Now this place was the very ſame, whereto Abraham in times paſt had brought his ſonne Iſaac to offer him vp for a burnt ſacrifice vnto God, and as he was about to ſacrifice him, a Wether vpon the inſtant preſented it ſelf vnto the Altar, which Abraham offered vp in ſteede of his ſonne, as we haue heretofore made manifeſt.) Dauid ſeeing C that God had heard his prayer, and fauourably accepted his ſacrifice, decreed that in that place the generall Altar of the people ſhould ſtand, and that on the very ſame floore he would build a Temple vnto GOD: which words of his God afterwards ratified. For ſending his Prophet vnto him, he certified him that his ſonne that ſhould ſucceede him, ſhould build a Temple. After this propheticall declaration, the King commanded to number the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, and it was found that they were one hundreth and foureſcore thouſand men: of which number he appointed eightie thouſand to intend the hewing of ſtones; and ordered that the reſt of the common people ſhould beare ſtones vnto them: and he appointed three thouſaud and fiue hundreth, who ſhould gouerne them, and haue the ouerſeeing of the workes. He gathered alſo a great quantitie of yron and braſſe, to worke vpon, with ſtore of huge and mightie Cedar D trees, which they of Tyre and Sidon ſent him, whom he had put in truſt to furniſh him therewith; telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his ſonne ſhould fortune to gouerne after him, he might haue ſtuffe in a readineſſe for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet yong and vnexperimented, ſhould not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but hauing all things in a readineſſe, might finiſh the building of the Temple.

DAVID during his life time ſurrendreth the kingdome to SALOMON.

THEN calling vnto him his ſonne Salomon, he charged him that after his deceaſe, and his enſtalment in the kingdome, he ſhould build a temple vnto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to performe the ſame; yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had beene foyled with ſlaughters, and brought vp in warre. Adding further, that it was foreprophecied vnto him, that the finiſhing of that edifice was by Gods ordinance reſerued to his yonger ſon that ſhould be called Salomon, whom God ſhould not leſſe tender and care for, then the father doth his ſonne: and how the whole land of the Hebrews ſhould be made happy vnder this Prince; and among all other benefits, that they ſhould haue peace (which is an F eſpeciall prerogatiue and bleſſing) and not onely be freed from forraine wars, but alſo from ciuill diſſentions. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſince by God thou wert appointed King before thou waſt borne, indeuour thy ſelfe to be capable and worthy to be conducted by his prouidence, by honouring piety, iuſtice and fortitude, and keeping thoſe his ordinances and lawes, which he gaue vs by Moſes, and not permitting others to tranſgreſſe the ſame. And as touching the temple (which he will that thou ſhalt build when thou ſhalt obtaine the kingdome) enforce thy ſelf to diſcharge that duty towards God: neither be thou diſmaid or afraid at the greatnes of the work. shall depart out of this world, I will set all things in a readinesse for thee. Know therefore that I G haue already gathered ten thousand talents of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of siluer; of brasse and yron there is as much, which is a thing innumerable; of stone and of wood, a matter most incredible. Moreouer, thou shalt haue many thousands of masons and carpenters, and if ought be defectiue besides these, thou shalt thy selfe make prouision thereof: when thou hast performed this, thou shalt be gracious in Gods sight, who shal be thy soueraigne and safe conductor. He exhorted also the gouernours of the people to set to their helping hand, and yeeld their assistance to his sonne in finishing this worke, and in furthering the seruice of God without suspicion of any inconuenience; assuring them that they should enioy a firme peace, and a flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth vpon those that studie after pietie and iustice.) Moreouer he charged him to place the Arke within the Temple at such time as it should be finished, with all H other sacred vtensils, for the receit whereof the Temple should long since haue been builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods command, who had enioyned them, that at such time as they should possesse their enemies land, they should build him a Temple. These were Dauids exhortations, not onely vnto his sonne, but also to the other Princes.

Now when Dauid was very old, so that by reason of his yeeres his body was so cold and benumd, that notwithstanding the many couerings and clothes they laid vpon him, yet could he not be het or warmed: his Physitians assembled themselues together and consulted, and at last concluded, that one of the faireſt virgins that was in the countrey, might be chosen out to lie with the king: because by this meanes shee might warme his chill limbes, and comfort his decaying I heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damzell called Abisace, which surpassed all other in beautie, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was vnable to haue the vse of a woman. But of this virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

3. King. 1.

The fourth sonne of Dauid was a goodly tall yong man, called Adonias, the son of Aegistha, who (resembling Absalon in complexion and ambition) began to vsurpe, with a deliberation to make himselfe king: and amongst his ordinarie discourses which he vsed to his friends, he said that it behooued him to take possession of the kingdome. To this intent he prepared many chariots and horses, and fiftie men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of these his proceedings, reproued him not, neither crossed this his deliberation; neither demanded of him likewise, wherefore he presumed to attempt such vnseemely actions. Of this his reuolt he had

for his coadiutors Ioab the Generall, and the high Priest Abiathar: but they that contradicted K him, were the high Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaia the captaine of the guard, with Simei, Dauids friend: besides all other the valiant men at armes. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the Citie, and in the suburbs neere vnto the fountaine of the Parke royall, he inuited all his brethren vnto the same, except Salomon; and tooke with him Ioab and Abiathar, with the gouernours of the tribe of Iuda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan Banaia, and the rest of the contrary party; he called them not vnto the banquet. This did the prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabe, Salomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made king without the knowledge of Dauid, aduising her both to haue care of her owne securitie, and the estate and maiesty of her son (who by reason of Adonias vsurpation was like to be supplanted) wishing her in person to certifie the king thereof: and further promising, that while shee debated these L things with the king, hee would come in the meane while, and confirme that which hee had said. Bethsabe being thus perswaded by Nathan, came vnto the King, and humbling her selfe before him (and afterwards requiring licence to speake vnto him) shee certified him of all those things that had hapned, according as she had bin aduised by the Prophet: particularly deciphering vnto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what guestes he had inuited (namely Abiathar and Ioab, with the rest of his sonnes, except Salomon and his particular friends) vrging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should bee whom Dauid would nominate to succeed him: for which cause she earnestly besought Dauid, that he would prouide and foresee, that he who should succeed him in the gouernment, should neither seeke her blood, nor the death of her son Salomon. Whilst Bethsabe discoursed after this maner, the chamberlaines gaue the king to M vnderstand that Nathan attended to speake with him. Whereupon, Dauid commanded that hee should be called in, and as soone as he was entred, he asked the king if that day he had appointed Adonias to gouerne & succeed in the kingdom after him? for that (said he) he hath made a sumptuous feast; whereunto he hath inuited all thy sonnes, but Salomon; thither also hath he called Ioab: where, after the great cheere and banquetting, they haue proclaimed and cried, Long liue king Adonias. Furthermore (said he) he hath neither inuited me, nor the high Priest Sadoc, nor the

As soone as Nathan had made an end of his speech, Dauid commanded that Bethsabe should be called in (who had retired herselfe out of the Kings chamber, at such time as the Prophet entred into the same.) As soone as Bethsabe reentred the chamber, Dauid said vnto her, I sweare vnto thee by that great God, that thy sonne Salomon shall raigne after me, according as before this time I haue already sworne vnto thee, and he it is that shall sit vpon my throne, yea euen this present day. Vpon these words Bethsabe humbled herselfe, and besought God to grant the king long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc the high Priest, and Banaia Captaine of the guard, and gaue them in charge to take the Prophet Nathan with them, and all the men at armes that attended

B him in court; charging them to mount his sonne Salomon vpon the royall Moile, and to conduct him out of the Citie neere vnto the fountaine of Gehon: in which place (after they had annointed him with holy oyle) he willed them to proclaime Salomon king, commanding the high Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan to see his will performed; charging those that followed him thorow the Citie, with sound of trumpet and a loud voice to cry out, that Salomon was seated for euer on his fathers throne, to the intent that all the people might vnderstand, that by his fathers consent he was declared king. But as touching Salomon, he gaue him instructions how he ought to behaue himselfe with piety and iustice, in the gouernment of all the people of the Hebrewes, and of the tribe of Iuda. After this, Banaia besought God that it would please him to be fauourable vnto Salomon, and with all expedition Salomon was mounted vpon the kings Mule, and con-

So that Adonias and they that banquetted with him, hearing the noise, were all of them sore troubled; and Ioab in particular said, that those tunes and trumpettings did no waies content him.

Salomon is annointed king, and placed in his fathers throne.

Whilst thus they sate at the banquet, and euery man through amaze forbore to eate his meate (beeing distracted through variety of thoughts) Ionathan the sonne of Abiathar came hastily in

D amongst them. This yong man did Adonias most willingly behold, and said that he was a messenger of some glad tydings: but contrariwise he recited vnto them all that which had befallen Salomon, or had beene decreed by Dauid. Whereupon, Adonias and all his guests forsooke the banquet, and suddainly fledde euery man vnto his owne house. But Adonias fearing the Kings displeasure (by reason of his ambition and arrogancie) ranne vnto the Altar, and laying holde of it after the manner of a suppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reason had cause to doe.

Adonias for feare of the kings displeasure, flieth from his banquet, and taketh hold of the hornes of the Altar.

Now when these tydings were brought vnto Salomon, and what hee had done, and how hee required that Salomon would assure him, that hee would neuermore call to memory that which had hapned, but pardon his offence: Salomon answered him graciously and moderately, and pardoned him that fault; notwithstanding with this caution, that if hereafter it should appeare that

E he intended or acted any rebellion, it should be Adonias himselfe, who should be the author of his mischiefe: with this answer he sent some to deliuer him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Salomons presence and had saluted him, he was commanded to repaire home vnto his house, without suspect of any inconuenience: yet by the way was hee admonished to behaue himselfe vprightly for the time to come, if in any sort hee either respected his credit or profit.

But Dauid willing that his sonne should be accepted for their knowne and annointed King amongst the people, assembled the gouernours in Ierusalem, with the Priests and Leuites; and first of all taking the number of them, he found thirty three thousand men that were aboue thirty three yeeres old; 23000 of which, he appointed to take charge of the building of the temple, sixe thou-

So that separating the Priests from the rest of their tribe, he found foure and twenty families of them; sixteene of the house of Eleazar, and eight of the house of Ithamar, giuing order that one onely family should for the space of eight daies performe Gods seruice. And thus were all the families distributed by lotte in the presence of Dauid, of the high Priests Sadoc and Abiathar, and of the Gouernours. The first family that ascended the Temple was written first, the

the second next, and so successiuely the rest to the number of foure and twenty (and this law remaineth in the same sort euen vnto this day.) He made also twenty & foure diuisions of the tribe of Leui (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same maner as did the priests, euery eight day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posteritie: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasurie, and of those presents which the kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Leuites as Priests) should serue God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole army into twelue companies, with their Gouernours, Centurions and Conductors: euery squadron contained foure and twentie thousand men, whom hee appointed to guard and attend king Salomon, for the space of thirty dayes (continuing from the first vnto the last, with their captaines ouer thousands, and centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authority ouer euery squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surueiors, who should haue the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were vnnecessary to declare.) After that euery one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Gouernours of the Hebrewes (and in generall, all those that had any commission ouer the affaires or demaines of the kings) to a generall assembly, and seating himselfe in a high erected throne, he spake after this maner. My brethren & countrimen, I am desirous that you should know, that hauing determined with my selfe to build a temple vnto God, I haue made prouision of a great quantity of gold and siluer, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my hand hath bin soiled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne (who shall succeede me in my kingdome) shall erect a temple vnto him. Now therefore, sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelue sonnes of Iacob, Iuda, by the generall consent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my sixe brethren haue bin preferred and placed by God in the kingdome, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himselfe to be iniured: so do I also request that Salomon hauing obtained the Empire, my other sons, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselues nourish any vnnaturall hatreds & seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly subiect themselues to his dominion. For wheras if God so pleaseth, it is not to be misliked to submit our selues to forraine subiection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate & fauour your brother no otherwise, then if you were partakers of the same honours with him? Truely I desire nothing more then that Gods promises may be brought to effect, & that that felicity which attendeth this region (vnder the gouernment of Salomon) may presently bee dispersed, and perpetually indure in this countrey. Which without doubt will so fall out, and all things shall happily succeede, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of piety and iustice, and the ancient lawes and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise, if these be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortality and misery. After he had finished these sayings, he gaue his sonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houses & chambers, together with the number, height & breadth of the same. Hee also limited the waight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of gold or of siluer, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the same. Hee incouraged likewise the Gouernours & the tribe of Leui to assist him, both for that his yeeres had not as yet obtained their ripe maturity, as also for that by Gods diuine prouidence hee was admittted and elected king, and was appointed to build the temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no waies laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of siluer, and wood, besides a great multitude of carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantity likewise of Emeraulds, & other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present, he would bestow on thē to that vse, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out of his owne treasury to adorne the holy place, and the Charriot of GOD, and the Cherubins, that should stand vpon the Arke, and couer it with their wings.

The princes of the people gaue a huge sum of gold, siluer, brasse, and precious stone towards the building of the Temple.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Gouernours, Priests and Leuites according together, shewed a greater readinesse, and made many signall and heroicall offers. For they tied themselues to bring fiue thousand talents of gold and tenne thousand stateres; of siluer a hundred thousand, and of iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious stone, hee brought it and deliuered it to the treasurers custody, who was called Ialus, beeing one of Moses posterity. This thing highly contented all the people, & Dauid (seeing the affection and readinesse of the Gouernors and priests, and in generall of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator & father of this whole world, the fashioner both of diuine and

A and humane things,and the Preſident and Gouernour of the Hebrewes,and their felicity and the kingdome by him committed vnto him. After this,he praied for all the people that they might be bountifully bleſſed,and priuately he beſought God to giue his ſonne a good and iuſt mind,furniſhed and adorned with all vertue.He commanded the people likewiſe to ſing praiſes vnto God: which they performed,and proſtrated themſelues vpon the earth,and afterwards gaue thanks vnto Dauid, for all thoſe benefits they had receiued during the time of his gouernment. The next day,in way of ſacrifice vnto God,they offered vp a thouſand calues,a thouſand rams,and a thouſand lambes for ſacrifice and a burnt offering: in way of peace offerings alſo, they ſlue many thouſand other beaſts. The King celebrated a feaſt all that day with the whole people,and Salomon was annointed with oyle the ſecond time, and proclaimed King. Sadoc alſo was eſtabliſhed

After he had thus exhorted his ſonne,and had communicated with him all his affaires,both as touching his friends,as thoſe alſo whom he thought worthy of puniſhment,he gaue vp the ghoſt (after he had liued ſeauenty yeeres,and raigned in Hebron a Citie of Iuda for the ſpace of ſeauen yeeres and a halfe,and thirty three in Ieruſalem ouer the whole nation.) He was a iuſt man,adorned with all vertue, requiſite in a King that ſhould haue the gouernment of ſo many nations. For he was valiant beyond compariſon,and in thoſe battels which he fought for his ſubiects,hee was the firſt that thruſt himſelfe into danger,and exhorted his ſouldiers to behaue themſelues valiant-
F ly, not commanding them like their Gouernour, but trauelling and fighting with them as their fellow ſouldier. Hee was ſufficient both in knowledge and foreſight, both how to accept of the preſent,and how to mannage his future occaſions: hee was moderate and iuſt,courteous,and fauourable to thoſe that were afflicted,and both iuſt and gentle,which are thoſe ornaments wherewith Princes ought to be beautified: and in this great authority wherein he was placed, he ſtepped not any waies awry,but in reſpect of Vrias wife.He left as much or rather more riches behind him,then any other King of the Hebrewes,or other nations had done. him moſt royally in Ieruſalem, with all thoſe ceremonies which were accuſtomed in royall obſequies, and amongſt other things, he buried a great and huge value of riches with him: the incredible eſtimate whereof may bee coniectured by that which followeth. For one thouſand three hundred yeeres after, the high Prieſt Hircanus being beſieged by Antiochus ſurnamed the wicked (who was Demetrius ſonne) and willing to gratifie him with ſome ſumme of money (to the intent he might leuie the ſiege, and tranſport his army ſome other waies) and vnable to leuie money by any other meanes, he opened one Cabinet of the monuments of Dauid, from whence he drew three thouſand talents, which he deliuered to Antiochus, and by this meanes deliuered the Citie from the ſiege (as we haue declared in another place.) And againe a long time after this, Herod alſo opened another Cabinet, from whence he tooke out a great ſumme. And as touching the tombes of Princes, no man defaced them, becauſe they were moſt magnificently builded, for feare leaſt they ſhould be eſteemed deſtroiers of monuments. But for the preſent it ſufficeth that I haue certified thus much.

CHAP. I.

How SALOMON obtaining the kingdome, expulſed his enemies.

The yeare of the world, 2931. before Christs Natiuitie. 1033.

WEE haue declared in the former Booke what Dauid was, how great his vertue hath beene, what profits and benefits thoſe of his nation receiued by him, what warres and battels hee worthily exploited, and how happily at laſt (through extreamitie of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Salomon his ſonne (beeing at that time very yong) had obtained the kingdome, and was placed in his fathers throne (according as Dauid had determined, and the diuine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common courſe in the election of new Princes) with happy acclamations wiſhed him perpetuall felicitie in all his affaires, and after his well gouerned eſtate and royaltie, long, many and proſperous yeeres. But Adonias, who during his fathers life time, thought

A thought to poſſeſſe and ſeize himſelfe of the royall eſtate, came vnto the Kings mother, and with all humility & reuerence ſaluted her. To whom Bethſabe ſaid, that if there were any thing wherein ſhe might ſtead him, he ſhould manifeſt it vnto her, and that ſhe would grant it him willingly. Whereupon he began to ſay, that it was a thing very well knowne, that the kingdome appertained vnto him, both in regard of his age, as alſo in reſpect of the fauour and good liking of the people: but ſince that it had beene transferred vnto Salomon her ſonne by the will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his ſeruant, being very glad of the fortunate ſucceſſe of his affaires. He therefore beſought her that ſhe would ſolicite Salomon in his behalfe, and perſwade him to giue him Abiſace to wife, who had ſlept with Dauid, for that he had not any carnall companie with her by reaſon of his age, and that as yet ſhe was fully poſſeſſed of her virginitie. The yeare of the world, 2931. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 1033. Adonias requireth Abiſace to wife.

Bethſabe promiſed him to further his ſuite to the vtmoſt of her power, and willingly to employ
B her ſelfe toward the accompliſhing of the marriage, both for that the king was willing to gratifie her in whatſoeuer ſhe ſhould deſire, as alſo for that ſhee would inſtantly intreat him: ſo that he departed from her with aſſured hope of good ſucceſſe in reſpect of his marriage. Hereupon preſently did Bethſabe addreſſe her ſelfe to the king, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requeſted, and what ſhe had granted. When tidings came to Salomon that his mother came to viſite him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the royall treaſure was, he ſate him downe, and commanded his ſeruants to place a ſeat on his right hand, for his mother: who ſettled by him, ſpake vnto him after this manner. My ſonne, vouchſafe me one fauour that I ſhall requeſt at thy hands, and ſend me not hence diſcontented, and confuſed through thy refuſall. Salomon anſwered her, that ſhe ſhould command him,
C by reaſon that duty tied him to the ſatisfaction and fauour of his mothers ſuites, reproouing her for that inſinuation ſhe had vſed, by reaſon that thereby ſhe euidently expreſſed that ſhe was not thorowly aſſured to obtaine her demand; but that ſhe feared the refuſall and repulſe in the ſame: ſhe therefore required him to giue the Damzell Abiſace for wife to Adonias his brother. The king diſpleaſed at this her ſuite diſmiſſed his mother, alleadging that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, and that he wondred that in requiring Abiſace to wife, he had not requeſted Salomon likewiſe to giue him place in the kingdome: for Adonias was elder then he, and had more mightie friends then he had; namely, the Generall Ioab, and the high Prieſt Abiathar. For which cauſe he incontinently ſent Banaia captaine of his guard to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling vnto him the high Prieſt Abiathar: The paines (ſaid he) that thou haſt indured by accompany-
D ing my father Dauid, and attending and bearing the Arke with him, make thee eſcape from death: yet notwithſtanding, for that thou haſt bin an aſſiſtant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I condemne thee to depart from my preſence, charging thee not to ſee my face any more, but to retire thy ſelfe to thine owne houſe, and there to liue in thy countrey vntill thou haſt ended thy daies: for hauing in this ſort neglected me, it is not conuenient that thou ſhouldeſt be in honour with me. For this cauſe was the houſe of Ithamar depriued of the prieſtly dignitie (according as God had foreprophecied to Eli, one of the anceſtors of Abiathar) and tranſlated to the race of Phinees, and eſtabliſhed in Sadoc. Thoſe of the race of Phinees, who led a priuate life all that time that the Prieſthood remained in the familie of Ithamar (whereof Elie was the firſt) were theſe; Boccias the ſonne of Ioſeph, Ioatham the ſonne of Boccias, Maræoth the ſonne of Ioa-
E tham, Aropha the ſonne of Maræoth, Achitob the ſonne of Aropha, Sadoc the ſonne of Achitob, who was the firſt high Prieſt vnder king Dauid. Adonias is ſlaine. Abiathar is diſpoſſeſſed of the prieſthood. The genealogie of the high Prieſt Sadoc.

Ioab hauing tidings of the death of Adonias, was ſeized with ſuddaine and extreame feare: for he loued him more then king Salomon, and by reaſon of that friendſhip which he bare vnto him, he iuſtly and vpon good grounds apprehended his owne danger, and in this reſpect he fled vnto the Altar, hoping in that place to be ſecured in regard of that reuerence which the king bare vnto God. But when Ioabs reſolution was made knowne vnto the king, he ſent Banaia vnto him with commiſſion to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the iudgement ſeat, that he might in that place iuſtifie his actions: But Ioab ſaid that he would neuer abandon the Temple, but that he had rather die in that place then in another. When Banaia had certified the king of this
F his anſwer, he commanded him to cut off his head in the ſame place, according as he required, and that in that ſort he ſhould be puniſhed by reaſon of the two murthers, which he had curſedly committed vpon the perſons of Abner and Amaſa: commanding that his body ſhould be buried in the ſame place, to the end that his ſinnes ſhould neuer depart from his race, and that both Dauid and Salomon might be held guiltleſſe of the death of Ioab. This command of his Banaia executed, and was afterward made Generall of the men of warre. Moreouer, the king eſtabliſhed Ioab is ſlaine. Banaia is ſubſtituted in his place.

blished Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simei also G to build him a house in Ierusalem, to keepe himselfe therein, without passing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to breake that commandement, the penaltie which he should incurre, should be no lesse then death; and to the more serious performance of this his iniunction, he tied him by a solemne oath. Simei thanked Salomon for the charge he had imposed on him, and swore that he would fulfill the same: so that forsaking his owne countrey, he came and dwelt in Ierusalem, where after he had soiourned for the space of three yeeres, it hapned that he had newes that two of his fugitiue slaues had fled, and retired themselues into Geth: whereupon he went to find them out, and no sooner returned he backe againe with them, but that the king had intelligence that he had neglected his commandement; and that which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made vnto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cause calling him vnto him,

Of the wisedome, prudence, and riches of SALOMON, and how first of all he builded the Temple in Ierusalem.

God appeareth to Salomon by night in a dreame, and willeth him to aske that which most of all he desired.

AS soone as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vowes vnto God, on that brazen altar which was erected by Moses, and sacrificed thereon in burnt offerings a thousand head of cattell; which honourable deuotion of his was most acceptable vnto God. For the very same night, after he had appeared vnto him in a dreame, he commanded him to aske whatsoeuer blessing (as he imagined) sufficient to recompence this his pietie. But Salomon required a most high and excellent thing, which God doth most liberally bestow, and men in like sort very happily receiue. For he demanded neither gold nor siluer, nor any other kinde of riches (such as a youthfull man would require) for these are onely affected by the common sort, when the other are onely worthy of the diuine magnificence: But giue me (said he) O Lord, a ripe iudgement, and a good vnderstanding, to the intent that by these meanes, I may administer L

iustice to this people with truth and equity. With this demand of his God was greatly delighted, and promised him to giue him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glory, and aboue all these, such an vnderstanding and wisedome, as no one man either king or priuate hath had before him. Moreouer, that he would continue the kingdome in his family for many ages, if so be that he continued in the waies of iustice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers waies in imitating his chiefest vertues.

After that Salomon had receiued these blessings from God, and was made happy by these promises, he forsooke his bed, and worshipping God returned vnto Ierusalem, where he offered great sacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnifically feasted all those of his household. About M the same time a very difficult iudgement was brought him to decide; the resolution whereof, was very hard to be discouered. And I haue thought it necessarie to declare the occasions whereon at that present the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may vnderstand the difficultie of the cause in question, and that if they happen at any time to be assistant in such like affaires, they might draw as it were from the counterfeit of this Kings wisedome, a perfect module

A module whereby they may directly ſhape an anſwer to ſuch demands as ſhall be offered them. Two women of looſe and luſtfull conuerſation came vnto him, one of the which (who ſeemed to haue ſuffered the iniurie) began after this manner: I, O King (ſaid ſhe) and this woman dwell together in one chamber; but ſo it fortuned, that both of vs on one day, and at the ſame houre, bare each of vs a ſon: ſome three daies after we were brought a-bed, this woman lying by her infant, hath in ſleepe ouerlaid it, and ſtifled it, and hath taken my childe from betweene my knees and laid it by her, & ſettled the dead child whileſt I ſlept, in my boſome. Now on the morrow when I thought to offer the teate vnto mine infant, I found not mine owne, but perceiued that her child lay dead by me: for I knew it, becauſe I had exactly marked it. This my childe I haue demanded at her hands, and becauſe I could not recouer it, I haue made my recourſe vnto your Maie-

B ſties iuſtice, O king: for in that we were ſole women, and ſhe is obſtinate and feareth not to be conuicted by any, ſhe perſiſteth in her obſtinate deniall of the ſame. After the king had heard this her demand, he inquired of the other if ſhe had any thing to anſwer vnto this accuſation. But ſhe denying the act, and auerring that the childe which remained aliue, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and beſides that, ſince no man appeared that might determine the controuerſie, but all the aſſiſtants were amazed at the obſcuritie and difficultie of the debate; the king at laſt bethought him of this policie. He commanded that both the children ſhould be brought before his preſence as well the liuing as the dead; and calling one of his guard vnto him, he commanded him with his naked ſword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the halfe of the liuing, and the other halfe of the dead child.

C This ſentence of his was ſecretly condemned by all the people, accounting it very childiſh. In the meane time the true mother began to exclaime, and deſire that the matter might not paſſe ſo far, but rather that they ſhould giue the whole child that was aliue, vnto the other: for that it ſufficed her, ſo as ſhe might ſee him aliue, that he might be ſuppoſed to be an others. The aduerſe part offered her ſelfe to behold the diuiſion of the infant: and moreouer required that the true mother ſhould be puniſhed. But the king coniecturing by the diſcourſe, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was moſt vnfained; adiudged the infant vnto her that cried firſt, (for that in equitie ſhe was the true mother) and condemned the wickedneſſe of the other, who had murthered her owne childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people tooke this iudgement for an aſſured proofe and

D ſigne of the kings prudence and wiſedome; and from that time forwards they reſpected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a diuine ſpirit. The chieftaines and gouernours vnder him thorow all the kingdome were theſe: Vri gouerned the countrey of Ephraim, wherein was compriſed the rule of Bethleem. Aminadab commanded ouer the quarter of Dura, and the ſea coaſt, and had eſpouſed the daughter of Salomon. The great Plaine was ſubiected to Banaia the ſonne of Achila, who gouerned likewiſe all the countrey that extended towards Iordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulonites, as farre as the mountaine Libanus, and had vnder him ſixtie great Cities, and Forts. Achinadab gouerned all Galilee as farre as Sidon, and had eſpouſed alſo one of Salomons daughters called Baſima: Banacat had the countrey that confineth the ſea neere to the Citie of Arce: Saphat, the mountaines Itabyr, and Carmel, and the land of

E Galilee as farre as Iordan: Sonbeia gouerned the whole land of the Beniamites: Tabar had all the gouernment on the other ſide of Iordan, and was elected gouernour generall ouer them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrews wonderfully increaſe in riches, and the tribe of Iuda waxed opulent, by reaſon that the people addicted themſelues wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was vnder ſuch aſſurance, that being diſtracted by no warlike tumults, and beſides that fruitfully enioying a moſt deſired libertie, they eſpecially entended this thing onely, to encreaſe their priuate and particular eſtates. The king alſo had other gouernours who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other ſtrange nations, which are extended from Euphrates as farre as Ægypt, who gathered the tribute of thoſe nations for the king. Theſe Barbarians euery day furniſhed the king for his owne Table, and the maintenance of his houſhold, with

F thirtie Cores of fine floure, and ſixtie of the courſer: ten fat Oxen, and twenty graſſe Beeues, with a hundred fat lambes. All which things, beſides veniſon and buffalles taken in chaſe, birds, and fiſh, were furniſhed daily by the Barbarians to ſerue the kings houſhold. He had likewiſe a great number of charriots, ſo that he had fortie thouſand mangers wherein his coach horſes fed; and beſides theſe he had twelue thouſand horſemen, halfe whereof kept alwaies about the king in Ieruſalem, the reſt were billetted in diuerſe villages belonging to the king, and remained there. And they that had the charge to furniſh the kings expences, prouided likewiſe neceſſarie prouen-

der for the horſes, conueying it to that place whereſoeuer the king ſoiourned. But ſo great was the wiſedome and prudence which God had beſtowed vpon Salomon, that hee ſurpaſſed all his progenitors: and the Egyptians likewiſe, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt of all men, were farre behind him in wit. For he excelled all thoſe that in that time were in tthe greateſt account amongſt the Hebrewes, whoſe names I will not omit; and theſe they were, Ethan, Eman, Eman, Chalt and Dodan the ſonne of Imaon. He compoſed alſo a thouſand and fiue hundred books of odes & canticles, and thirty thouſand bookes of Parables and Similitudes; for to euery kind of plant he alluded his parable from hyſope, vnto the Cedar. The like did he of all liuing creatures that feed on the earth, ſwimme in the waters, or flie in the aire; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to ſearch their faculties in particular, but examined & diſcourſed on them all, and had an inward ſpeculation and knowledge of their ſeuetall and ſecret properties. Hee obtained alſo by inſpiration the Art of Magicke, for the profit and health of men, and the exorciſing and caſting out of diuels: for he deuiſed certen incantations, whereby the diſeaſed are cured, and left the methode of coniuration in writing, whereby the diuels are enchanted and expelled; ſo that neuer more they dare returne: And this kind of healing to this day, is very vſuall amongſt thoſe of our nation. For I ſaw a certaine popular and priuate man amongſt the Hebrewes, in the preſence of Veſpaſian, his ſonnes, tribunes, and other ſouldiers, that cured diuerſe that were poſſeſſed. And the manner of his cure was this: He applied to the noſe of the Demoniack a Ring; vnder the ſeale whereof, was a roote of thoſe things that Salomon had declared, which drew the diuell out of the noſtrils of the ſicke, as ſoone as he ſmelleth the roote: and as ſoone as the man was fallen, he adiured him neuer more to returne, intermixing ſome mention of Salomon, and rehearſing thoſe incantations that were inuented by him.

Salomons methode in coniuration whereby he caſt out diuels

The author in this place abuſeth the gifts of God beſtowed on Salomon, in extending the to thoſe artes which are forbidden by the expreſſe word of God.

A Iew caſteth out diuels.

After this, the ſaid Eleazar being deſirous to ſhew vnto them that were preſent, the efficacie of his Arte, he ſet a pot or pitcher of water not farre from the place where the poſſeſſed ſtood, and commanded the diuell at ſuch time as he forſooke thee man to ouerturne the pot, and thereby to giue a ſigne vnto the aſſiſtants, that he had forſaken the poſſeſſed: which act of his manifeſtly declareth how great the ſcience and wiſedome of Salomon was. For which cauſe I thought good in this place to make mention therof, that the worthy nature of this king might be knowne vnto all men; and how beloued he was of God, and how ſurpaſſing in all kindes of vertue. When Hiram king of Tyre vnderſtood that Salomon ſucceeded his father in the kingdome, he was glad thereof (for he was Dauids friend) for which cauſe he ſent meſſengers vnto him to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him: by whom Salomon returned an anſwer in theſe tearmes. Salomon to Hiram the king: Know thou, that my father hauing a will to build a Temple vnto God, hath beene withdrawne from the performance thereof, by the continuall warres and troubles he hath had: for he neuer tooke reſt before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries vnto him. For mine owne part, I thanke God for the peace which I poſſeſſe, and for that by the meanes thereof, I haue opportunitie (according to mine owne deſire) to build a temple vnto God: for he it is that foretold my father that this houſe ſhould be builded during my raigne. For which cauſe I pray you ſend ſome one of your skilfullеſt men with my ſeruants to the wood Libanus, to hew downe trees in that place: for the Sidonians are more skilfull in hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleauers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this letter, he was very glad to peruſe the contents of the ſame, and wrote backe againe vnto him to this effect.

Hirams Embaſſadors to Salomon.

3 Reg. 5. Salomon requireth carpenters and workemen from Hiram.

The king Hiram vnto king Salomon: Thou haſt cauſe to thanke God, in that he hath deliuered thy fathers kingdome into thy hands, to thee I ſay, who art a man wiſe and full of vertue. For which cauſe ſince no newes can come vnto me more gracious, nor office of loue more eſteemed then this, I will accompliſh all that thou requeſteſt: for after I haue cauſed a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut downe, I will ſend it thee by ſea by my ſeruants, whom I will command (and furniſh with conuenient veſſels of burthen) to the end they may deliuer the ſame, in what place of thy kingdome it ſhall beſt pleaſe thee, that afterwards thy ſubiects may tranſport them to Ieruſalem. You ſhall prouide to furniſh vs with corne, whereof we ſtand in neede, becauſe we inhabite an Iſland.

Hiram promiſeth Salomon wood, and in ſtead thereof requireth corne.

The copies are yet at this day kept, not onely by thoſe of that nation, but alſo by the Tyrians: ſo that if any man deſire exactly to know what they be, let him ſearch the publique records of the Tyrians, and he ſhall find in them matters accordant to that we haue ſaid. All which I ſay, to that end that the readers might be aſſured, that I outſtrip not the truth in any ſort, and that I inſert not in this hiſtorie matters that are meerely apparant and deceitfull, and onely faſhioned for delight;

A light;neither feare I that any man ſhall examine my writings; neither deſire I likewiſe that euery man giue credit at the firſt ſight to the ſame,or that I be held blameleſſe in ſuffering my ſelfe any waies to vary or improperly dilate ought in this hiſtory: but contrariwiſe, if I cannot approoue the truth by demonſtration, and ſufficient teſtimonies, I deſire not to be allowed. As ſoone as Salomon had receiued theſe letters from the king of the Tyrians,he praiſed his facilitie and beneuolence,and preſently ſent him that which he demanded: euery yeare therefore he ſent him two thouſand Cores of wheat,and the like number of Bads of oyle (this Bad containeth ſeuenty and two ſextaries.) He gaue him alſo the like meaſure of wine. From that time forward the frienſhip betwixt Hiram and Salomon increaſed more and more, ſo that both of them proteſted that it ſhould continue for euer. The king impoſed on his people the tribute of thirty thouſand workemen,whom he gaue in charge to trauell continually,and diſtributed them very diſcreetly. He or-
B dained that ten thouſand of them ſhould cut wood in Libanus for the ſpace of one moneth; and that then they ſhould reſt two moneths,returning euery man vnto his owne dwelling place: vntill ſuch time as the twenty thouſand had in their turne accompliſhed the taske in the time that was prefixed vnto them,and then the firſt 10000. renued their work,& followed the ſame in the fourth month. Adoram was conſtituted ſuperintendent ouer this tribute. Beſides theſe,there were 70000 men appointed to carry ſtones and wood, who were the inhabitants of that country,which Dauid had left. There were foureſcore thouſand hewers of ſtone, ouer which were 3200. commiſſaries; theſe had the king commanded to cut the greateſt ſtones, to make the foundations of the temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountaine, he commanded ſhould bee drawne and brought into the City,and not onely commanded hee his countrimen to performe
C this,but thoſe workemen alſo that were ſent him by Hiram.

Salomon began this building in the fourth yeare of his raigne,in the ſecond month which the Macedonians call Artemiſium,and the Hebrewes Iar; fiue hundreth ninety and two yeares after the departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt; one thouſand and twenty yeares, ſince the arriuall of Abraham in Meſopotamia; one thouſand foure hundred and fortie yeeres,after the Deluge: And ſince Adam the firſt man vntill Salomon (who builded the Temple) all the yeeres that are paſſed, haue beene three thouſand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleuenth yeere of the raigne of Hiram, who gouerned in Tyre: and ſince the firſt time that Tyre began to be inhabited, vntill the ſaid building of the Temple, there paſſed two hundred and fortie yeeres. The king therfore laid the foundations of the Temple,and
D made a moſt deep trench,and fortified it with moſt ſtrong ſtones,which might be able to reſiſt all the iniuries of time. Theſe ſtones were ſo cloſely ioyned the one vnto the other, that for the ſtrength of the foundations, they might ſerue to make the baſe and ground, both to fortifie the worke, as alſo to ſuſtaine that which ſhould be builded thereupon, either for embelliſhment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of leſſe ſtrength & hugenes, which were to ſuſtaine a ſumptuous pile of that height,greatnes,magnificence and ornament. The wals were made of white ſtone, and continued of the ſame matter euen vntill the roofe. The height of the Temple was ſixtie cubites, and the length as much, and the bredth twentie. Ouer that was another edifice, hauing the like dimenſions; ſo that the whole height of the Temple was ſixeſcore cubites: and the entrie thereof was to the Eaſt-ward. The porch that gaue entrie thereinto, had E twenty cubits in length (which was the bredth of the Temple) and in bredth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of ſixeſcore cubits. About the Temple were builded thirtie celles, which inuironed the circuit of the ſame on the outſide, and ſerued to ſuſtaine all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and paſſable the one into the other. The entries were made after the ſame manner, from whence a man might eaſily paſſe from the one to the other. Euery one of theſe Cels had twenty and fiue cubits in bredth,and as many in length,& twentie in height: and aboue them there were other builded: and others likewiſe aboue theſe of like number, and dimenſion: ſo that they were almoſt as high as the other buildings. Ouer theſe there were no buildings; only this,they were couered with Cedar: Euery Cel had his couer apart,& had no dependance on the other roofes. The reſt of the building of the temple was couered with long beames,mortized the F one within the other,which ſuſtained the whole: ſo that the wals being in this maner faſtned the one vnto the other,were the more ſtronger. To theſe beames were there faſtned certaine roofes of the ſame ſtuffe, which were curiouſly poliſhed,carued and guilded. The walles on the inſide were couered with Cedar planks intermixed with gold: ſo that all the Temple ſhined, and the burniſht gold lightned,aud dazled their eies that entred into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was moſt artificially made of ſtones moſt exactly carued, and moſt cloſely and cunningly ioyned together: ſo that they that curiouſly pried into the ſame,could not any waies obserue any stroke of the hammer, nor other workmans toole, but all the whole masse seemed to G be a naturall, and no artificiall frame; and rather gathered in that place of it selfe, then garnished by the hands of cunning workemen. As touching the ascent into the highest part of the Temple, the king in that sort deuised it, that in the thicknes of the wall hee included a paire of winding staires to that purpose. This part had not a great gate towards the Eastward, as the lower had, but in the sides there were little dores made: All the whole temple both within and without was co-uered with Cedar planks, tied together with strong chains to fortifie & strengthen the same. The Temple inwardly was diuided into two parts, the one whereof contained the sanctum sanctorum, of twenty cubits (which was vnaccessible) the rest of the space, of forty cubits was consecrated to the vse of the Priests. And in the midst of the wall made hee two gates of Cedar, inriched with store of gold, and diuers curious carued works, and hung them with tapistrie: wherein where embrodered diuers flowers of hyacinth, purple, & scarlet intermingled with most pure, white & deli- H cate linnen. He placed also vpon the holy of holiest (which was 20. cubits broad, & as many long)

2. Cherubins of massie gold, ech one 5. cubits hie, & each of thē had two wings that were spred 5.
cubits broad, by which means they were not far distant the one frō the other, but that the one of their wings touched the southren wal of the sacred place, & the other the northren wal: the other wings that touched one another, serued for a couer for the Ark which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impossible to expresse: he made the paue-ment of the Temple also, of plates of beaten gold. To the gate of the Temple also he fastned conuenient dores 20. cubits high, answerable in height to the wall, and couered with plates of gold.
In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garnished with gold: he likewise adorned the outside of the gates as he had done the inside. But the gate of the I porch had no such ornament. After this, Salomon sent vnto Hiram king of Tyre for one, who was a cunning workman called Vram, the son of a woman of the line of Nepthali; and of Vrias the Israelite. This man had great knowledge in all kind of works, but his especiall excellencie was in working gold, siluer and brasse, who made all that which couered the Temple, according as the king commanded. He made two pillars of brasse, foure fingers thicke, and eighteene cubits high, and twelue in the circumference; on the chapters of each of them, hee planted a founded lilly, of fiue cubits in height, which he enuironed with certain grates made of brasse after the maner of enterlaced nets, which couered the lillies on each side, on which there hung down two hundreth Pomegranats in two ranks. These pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Iachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded also the brazen Sea made after the maner of a Hemisphеare, & this vessel was called the sea, by reason of the hugenes K thereof. For it was a lauer that by measured line was ten cubits broad, the thicknes of a hand; the midst therof was sustained with a piller ten times twisted, whose bignesse was a cubite. This lauer was sustained by twelue heifers, which by three & three were placed directly opposite against the quarters of the foure winds: and the hindermost part of these heifers were set somewhat stooping, to the end that this round and ample vessell might be the more surely supported by them.
This sea contained three thousand Bads. He made also ten brazen bases foure square, for the la-uers, each one in length fiue cubits, in bredth foure, in height three; thus were the parts of this worke seuerally fashioned. There were foure little pillars square, and erected at euery corner one, in which the sides of the bases were adioyned, and diuided into three sorts, according to the place distinguished betweene the ioynts; with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in an other place an L Eagle. The pillars likewise were adorned with the same engrauing: and all this whole work hung vpon foure wheeles, which were made of cast worke, which had certaine naues or spoakes a cu-bite and a halfe in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to see the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly setled to the sides of the bases by their naues, or strakes. They were thus made: the corners or angels on the vpper part were sustained by certaine shoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which was there placed a spire, to which the lauar was fastned, being vpheld by the pawes of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were fashioned & so properly vnited, that they that beheld them would haue supposed them rather to be natural creatures then otherwise: and betwixt them also there were certaine palme trees figured. Such M was the composition of the ten lauers. Moreouer, he made ten other brazen lauers after the manner of a round cocle shell, each of which contained forty Choes: for they were in height foure cubites, and from brim to brim, there were likewise foure cubits: which lauers hee placed vpon ten bases or feete called Mechonoth, fiue of which stood on the left side of the Temple, that extended to the northward, the other fiue on the right hand toward the southward; yet so as they affronted the East. Here likewise placed he the sea full of water, to the intent that the

He builded likewise a brasen Altar of twenty cubites long, and as many in breadth, and tenne in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewise all the vessels that belonged thereunto of brasse: as kettels, water pots, hookes and forkes, and such like, that in brightnesse equalled the pure gold. The king also dedicated many tables, and amongst these, one great one of golde (on which the sacred bread was laide) the rest not farre inferiour, yet made after diuers manners, held ewers and platters of gold, to the number of twenty thousand, and of siluer forty thousand. He made likewise ten thousand candlestickes (according as Moses had commanded) whereof one he dedicated in the temple, that according to the law it might giue light there in the day time. Hee
B made a table also, on which the loaues of bread were laide, on the north side of the temple, hard by the candlestick, which was placed towards the South-ward. The altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were inclosed in that part of the temple that contained forty cubits, before the tapistry of the holy of holiest, where the Arke should be placed. The king also caused fourescore thousand pots, and a thousand hundreth of ewers of gold, & twice as many of siluer, to be made; and fourescore thousand plates of gold, and twice so many of siluer, to offer the kneaded flower in them vpon the altar; and threescore thousand cups of gold, and twice so many of siluer, to lay the flower mingled with oyle thereon; and two thousand measures of gold, and twenty thousand of siluer, resembling a Hin or an Epha of Moses. Twenty thousand of Censors also of gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the temple; and other censors like-
C wise in which they carried fire from the great altar, and laid it on the lesser which was within the temple, to the number of fiftie thousand. Hee prepared also a thousand vestments for the vse of the priests, with their surcots, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithstanding there was but one crowne wherein Moses had written the name of God, which hath continued euen vntill this day. He made also ten thousand stoales for the priests of fine linnen, with scarlet girdles, for euery one of them; two hundreth thousand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moses, and forty thousand instruments of musicke to record and praise God with (as the Psalterie and harpe of a mixt matter, the fift part gold, and the fourth part siluer.) All which Salomon most magnificently prepared for the seruice of God, sparing no cost, but imploying himselfe to the vttermost of his power, toward the ornament of the temple; which hee beautified and endowed
D with all these treasures. Hee enuironed the temple likewise with a certen wall some three cubits hie, which in our tongue we call Gison, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the priests only. Without this wall there stood a temple foure square with great and broad Iles, which opened with very great gates, euery one according to the quarter of the winde; and the doores therof were couered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewise that kept the ordinances of Moses. It may not be spoken or scarcely beleeued, although it were seen, how admirable that exteriour temple was: for he filled huge trenches, which by reason of their immeasurable depth, could not be lookt downe into without vehement apprehension of feare (for they were foure hundreth cubits deepe) yet notwithstanding he filled them, and raised them to the height of the hill, whereon the temple was built; and by this meanes
E it came to passe, that the walk without the temple, was equalled with the foundation of the same. This did he begirt with double porches, sustained by pillars of rich stone; the roofe wherof were of polished Cedar, and the gates were of Massiue siluer.

After that king Salomon had in seuen yeeres finished these so huge, faire, and magnificent buildings, and all the other necessaries which he had bestowed vpon the temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and confirmed his readines to be such, that that which at the first sight might require a mans whole life to finish, hee accomplished in few yeeres, in respect of the greatnes of the Temple: He wrote vnto the gouernours and elders of the Hebrewes, commanding them to assemble all the people in Ierusalem to behold the temple, and to bring in the Arke of God: and although this assembly was publikely proclaimed, yet scarcely did the people make their appea-
F rance in Ierusalem before the seuenth moneth, which wee call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feast of Tabernacles, which the Hebrewes most religiously obserue and honour with great festiuals. They therefore tooke the Arke and Tabernacle that Moses had before times made, with all those necessaries which appertained to the diuine seruice, and bare them into the temple. The king and all the people with the Leuites marched before, hauing their cattell ready to sacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of diuers slaughtered beasts, burning an infinit quantity of perfumes, wherewith the ayre was filled round about,

about, the sent whereof dispersed it selfe farre and neere, to make it knowne that God would be present in that new builded and consecrated place (if we may so speake of diuine things after a humane manner.) Thus ceased they not to sing and dance vntill they came vnto the temple: and after this sort conducted they the Arke. But when as it was to be carried into the holy of holiest, the rest of the multitude departed, and the Priests onely placed it vnder the two Cherubims, who embraced it with their wings, as if it had bin couered with a pauillion or some canapie: for they had bin expressely fashioned after that manner by the workeman. The Arke contained nought els but the two tables of stone, in which were kept in writing the ten commandements pronounced by God on the mount Sinai. For as touching the candlesticke, and the table, and altar of gold, he placed them in the temple before the most holy of holiest, in places correspondent to those where they stood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinarie sacrifices, and placed the brazen altar before the temple neere vnto the gate: so that when it was opened, the other stood in sight, and a man might see the seruice and magnificence that was vsed in the sacrifices. And as touching the other vtensils, he gathered them altogether, and placed them in the temple. But after the Priests (hauing giuen order for all things about the Arke) were departed from thence, sodainly there fell amidst the sanctuarie a thicke cloud, not pitchie nor such as resembleth winter clouds loaden with raine; but defused and temperate, which darkned the sight of the priests, so that they saw not one another. But thereby euery mans mind was easily induced, and his opinion confirmed, that God was descended into the temple, and willingly dwelled in the same: In effect all men had no other opinion: But king Salomon arising from his throne wherein he was seated, addressed his prayers vnto God, in such words as he thought both to be agreeable to the diuine nature, and conuenient for him to vse: O Lord (said he) thou hast an eternall house, neither are we ignorant that thou hast builded this whole masse of the vniuerse for thy selfe, which consisteth of heauen, earth, ayre and seas: which thou altogither fillest, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore haue we adorned and erected this temple to thy name, to the end that we might offer vp our sacrifices & praiers in the same, and send them vp to heauen (as a sweet sacrifice) to obtaine thy fauour, assuring our selues that thou art here present also, and wilt neuer be absent from this place. For whereas thou seest all things, heerest all things, yet forsakest thou not vs all: neither dost thou abandon the place where thou dost worthily inhabite; but rather thou art alwaies neere vnto all men, but in especiall present with those that thinke on thee day and night. These words spake he, looking vpwards towards God; and afterwards addressing himselfe vnto the people, he spake vnto them as touching his power and prouidence, how he had foretold his father Dauid of all that which should happen: the greater part wherof was already accomplished, and the rest was shortly to succeed. Furthermore, he declared how God himselfe had giuen him his name before he was borne, and that it was known how he should be called: and how at such time as he should be king after the decease of his father, hee should build him a temple; which things they saw brought to passe according as they were foretold: for which they ought to giue God thankes, and not to lose any hope of any of those things that had bin promised them in regard of their happines, hauing occasion of beliefe by the sight of those things which they then beheld.

When the King had spoken after this manner, vnto the people, hee turned againe and behelde the temple, and lifting vp his hands towards the people he began thus: It is impossible (said hee) for men to yeeld effectuall thankes vnto God for those benefites they haue receiued of him: for God (who is more aboundant then all men) hath no need of them: But (O Lord) it behoueth vs, that since of thy grace thou hast made vs more excellent thē other liuing creatures, we should blesse and giue thanks vnto thy maiestie, and in especiall it concerneth vs to honour thee for the benefits thou hast bestowed on our family, & all the Hebrew nation. But with what other means then ought we to appease thee when thou art displeased, and when we are to entertaine thy mercy, then by that voice which we draw from the ayre, and which as we know mounteth backe againe into the ayre? I ought therfore first of all to giue thee thanks in respect of my father, whom from obscuritie thou hast raised to high maiestie: next for that thou hast fulfilled all those things which thou hast foreprophecied of me, vntil this present day; I beseech thee for the time to come to furnish me with those things, that thou maiest giue vnto men that are deere vnto thee, which is, that thou encrease our house euery way, according as thou hast promised my father Dauid to performe during his life, and at such time as he was neere vnto his death: namely that the kingdome should continue in our family, and that his race should multiply in innumerable successions. Bestowe thou this benefite vpon vs, and bequeath vnto all mine, that vertue wherein thou Moreouer, I beſeech thee that a portion of thy ſpirit may come and dwell in the temple, to the intent that we may vnderſtand that thou dwelleſt vpon earth: for not onely this temple; but the whole heauen, and the depth of things that are vnder the ſame, are too little for thy habitation. B them from their aduerſities.

The yeere of the world, 2941. before Chriſts Nativity. 1013.

Salomon humbly beſeecheth God, that he will protect this Temple as his owne houſe.

Neither doe I onely intreat thee for the Hebrewes when they ſhall haue offended thee: but if it happen that any one arriue heere from any part of the world, of what countrey ſoeuer he be, to demand and require the fruition of this mercy, heare thou him I pray thee, and grant his requeſt: For by this meanes all men ſhall know, that it is thy will that thy houſe ſhould be builded in this place, and that we are not inhumane by nature, but that we haue deſired that thy help and the communication of thy bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed, not only on thoſe of our nation, but alſo on all the world. This ſaid, he caſt himſelfe flat vpon his face, and continued in prayer a long time, and afterwards riſing againe, he offered ſacrifices vpon the Altar; and hauing filled the temple with intire offrings, he knew moſt euidently that God did gratefully account & accept of his
C oblations: for a fire trilling thorow the ayre, and lighting vpon the altar in the ſight of all men, conſumed and deuoured the ſacrifice. When this viſion had hapned, the people manifeſtly coniectured that Gods aboad ſhould be in that temple, & with great ioy humbled themſelues on their faces, and lay proſtrate on the pauement. But the king began to praiſe God, and incited the people to do the like, conſidering they had already receiued the teſtimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwaies mercifull vnto them, & that he would keep them for euer in cleannes and vncorrupt minds, and that they might iuſtly and religiouſly lead their liues, in obſeruing thoſe commandements which he had giuen them by Moſes. For in ſo doing, the people of the Hebrewes ſhould proſper and grow more happie, then all the nations of the world. Moreouer, he exhorted them to keepe in their remembrance thoſe means, by which the benefits they
D poſſeſſed had beene gotten; aſſuring them that by the ſame they ſhould retaine continuance, increaſe, and multiplication thereof. For they ought to thinke that they receiued them not, but for their pietie and iuſtice; and that it was all one for men to get that which they wanted, and to keep that which was gotten, without defaulting in any thing. When the king had ſpoken after this manner vnto the people, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly (hauing firſt of all accompliſhed the ſacrifices both for himſelfe and the people, by offering vp twelue thouſand oxen and ſixeſcore thouſand ſheepe.) For then firſt of all was the temple embrued with the blood of the ſlaughterd ſacrifices, and all the Hebrewes with their wiues & children, were banqueted therein. The king alſo feaſting with the whole people, celebrated the ſolemnitie of the Tabernacles for the ſpace of 14. daies in great pompe and magnificence. And when as all things were ſufficiently performed, and nothing
E was deficient that concerned the ſeruice of God, euery one (diſmiſſed by the King) departed to his owne dwelling place, giuing him hartie thanks for the care he had of them, and for the works he had done for them, praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant their king Salomon a long life. And thus they returned home with ioy, praiſing and ſinging hymnes vnto God, ſo that they rid their way, and returned to their families with great treaſure, and without any trauell.

After then that they had conducted the Arke into the temple, and had beheld the greatnes and beauty of the ſame, and had celebrated moſt excellent ſacrifices, and made great ſolemnities, they returned euery one vnto his Citie. men, and runnagates in a forraine land. And as concerning the Temple which is builded at this present, I will (said he) deliuer it to the enemies to ransacke and burne it, and the Citie shall be destroyed by the hands of the enemies: and their miseries shall be so notorious thorow the world, and to such extreamitie shall they be driuen, as it shall hardly be belieued: so as their neighbours round about them, hearing tidings of their calamities shall be astonished, and shall seeke out the cause why the Hebrewes are thus hated by GOD, who before times haue beene so aduanced by him in riches and honours: and they shall vnderstand thereof by those that suruiue, in hearing them confesse their sinnes; and the transgressions they haue committed against the ordinance of their forefathers. These things that were declared vnto him in a dreame, are registred in the sacred letters. G

Hedio & Ruffinus chap. 5. Salomons palace finished in thirteene yeeres.

Seuen yeeres after the Temple had beene thus builded (as it hath beene heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he scarely finished in thirteene yeeres space (for he was not so intent and earnest in building thereof, as he was in the structure of the Temple.) For although the temple were very great, and of incredible and maruellous magnificence, yet so it is, that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workemen, it was thorowly finished within the terme of the yeeres aforesaid. But the royall Palaces, being farre lesser then was the Temple, were builded more slowly, because the stuffe had not beene prepared so long time before, neither with so great affection; and the rather, because the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Notwithstanding, this house was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the countrey and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it shal not be amisse if I declare all the order and disposition of the same house, that by the description thereof the Reader may both gather and consider the whole amplitude thereof: It was a great and goodly lodging, sustained by diuers pillars, prepared to receiue and containe much people at the time of their assemblies, wherein they intreated of affaires and held pleas. It was a hundred cubites in length, and in breadth fiftie, and in height thirtie, compriséd vnder sixteene square pillars couered with Corinthian worke, with staires of the like measure, and carued gates, both pleasant for sight, and fit for fortification. H I

The hall. The tribunal

In the midst of this space, and hard by the temple, there was another square Pauilion thirty cubits large, sustained with strong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunall, on which the King sate to giue iudgement: vnto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queene. All the chambers, as well those that were ordinarily in vse, as those for recreation after he had retired himselfe from publike affaires, were adorned with planks of carued Cedar, and were builded partly of stone ten cubits square, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought (such as are wont to adorne temples and palaces) and are found out by the most curious and cunning Masons. And that which made it more beautifull, were three panes of tapistry, and the fourth admirable for the artificiall engrauings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of diuers sorts, shadowed with their branches and leaues, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would haue thought that they shooke, the workmanship was so exquisite and curious that couered the stone. The rest, as farre as the roofe, was enchased, and flourished with diuers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleasure, with very long porches to beautifie the palace; amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make banquets and feasts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the necessaries belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of those that banquetted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugenesse and variety of these royall lodgings, both greater and lesser; of those that were hidden vnder the earth, as of those, which being lifted vp in the ayre, did most apparantly manifest their beautie: The pleasant arbors likewise delightfull to behold, and most contenting in summer, for that they were couered and warranted from the heate. To speake in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of gold, and of siluer: the floores and walles were figured with diuersitie of flowers and of precious stones, inchased in gold, after the manner of the temple of God, which shined with such like ornaments. There was likewise erected a most mightie throne, made in forme of a Tribunall, with sixe steps of pure Iuorie: on each side of which there stoode two ramping Lyons, and the like number were placed aboue. The stage of the throne was after the forme of hands, that laid hold on the King: and hee sate vpon a halfe Oxe looking backwards: and this throne was all inuironed with gold.

Salomon builded all this that hath beene spoken of, in the space of twenty yeeres, being furnished by Hiram King of the Tyrians for these his buildings, with great summes of gold, and farre more greater of siluer, besides a quantity of Cedar and Pine-trees. Salomon also remunerated him,

A him, and gaue him great preſents, and ſent him euery yeere ſufficient of corne, wine and oyle (as we haue heretofore declared) whereof he ſtood in great neede, by reaſon that his Countrey was an Iſland. And beſides that, he gaue him twentie Cities in Galilee, not farre diſtant from Tyre. Hiram hauing viſited them, and not well pleaſed with them, ſent vnto Salomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no vſe for his cities: and from that time forward they were called the countrey of Chebal, which is as much to ſay in the Phœnician tongue, as vnpleaſant. Hiram likewiſe ſent vnto Salomon certaine myſteries and difficult queſtions requiring him to decide the ſame, and to diſſolue thoſe doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Salomon beeing a man of ripe iudgement and vnderſtanding, pretermitted none of them; but after hee had attained their reſolution in his owne opinion, and had gathered the ſenſe, he expreſſed and opened the ſame. Of theſe two kings, Menander (who tranſlated the antiquities of the Tyrians out
B of the Phœnician tongue into the Greeke) maketh mention, ſpeaking after this manner. After the deceaſe of Abibale, Hiram his ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome, who liued fiftie and three yeeres, and raigned thirtie and foure. He annexed the field which is called Ample, vnto the Iſland, and dedicated a golden pillar in Iupiters Temple. He alſo cauſed a great quantitie of wood to be hewed downe in the mountaine Libanus, to make couers and roofes for Temples. For hauing pulled downe ſome ancient temples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Aſtrate, and made this firſt building of Hercules in the moneth Peritien, and made warre againſt the Eucecans, who refuſed to pay their tributes: and after he had once againe brought them vnder his ſubiection, he returned to his owne pallace. In his time liued the yong ſonne of Abdimon, who alwaies reſolued thoſe queſtions which Salomon king of Ieruſalem propoſed. Dius alſo maketh
C mention of him in theſe tearmes. After the deceaſe of Abibale, his ſonne Hiram raigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the Citie to the Eaſtward, and enlarged the ſame, and conioyned the Temple of Olympian Iupiter to the Citie, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place betweene them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of gold: and afterwards going vp to Libanus, he hewed downe timber to build temples withall. He ſaid alſo, that Salomon raigning at that time in Ieruſalem, ſent vnto Hiram certaine ſubtill queſtions, demanding the expoſition thereof vnder this condition, that if he declared them not, in way of penaltie he ſhould pay a great ſumme of money; and afterwards that a certaine Tyrian called Abdimon, expounded that which had beene propoſed: and in lieu thereof propoſed certaine others, which Salomon could not expound, and for that occaſion he paid a great ſumme of money
D vnto Hiram. This is it that Dius writeth.

The King ſeeing that the Citie wanted both bulwarks and towers to ſecure the ſame, and that the ſtrength of the ſame was no way anſwerable to the dignity therof, he repaired the walles, and erected great towers on the ſame. Moreouer he builded certaine Cities, which deſerue to be memorized among the moſt renowned, namely, Aſor and Magedon, and for the third, the citie of Gaza in the country of the Philiſtines: againſt which Pharao king of Ægypt led out his army, and tooke it by force, and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof to the ſword, hee deſtroyed the ſame, and afterwards hee gaue it in dower vnto his daughter, which married with Salomon. For which cauſe the king fortified it, ſeeing it to be already ſufficiently defenced by nature, and that it ſtood very commodiouſly for the war, and to hinder the inuaſions of the enemy that might hap-
E pen. Not far from thence he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Baleth. Beſides theſe he builded others, which were Cities of recreation and pleaſure, by reaſon of the good temperature of the aire, and the pleaſantneſſe of the fruits, and in eſpecially the ſweete ſtreamy riuers, wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the deſart that is aboue Syria, and conquering the ſame, hee builded another great Citie two daies iourney diſtant from the higher Syria, a daies iourney from Euphrates, and ſixe from the great Babylon. The cauſe why this Citie was inhabited farre from the ciuill and peopled quarters of Syria, was, becauſe in no place of the lower countrey there was water to be found, and in this Citie only there were fountaines and ſprings. Hee therefore builded this Citie, and begirt it with ſtrong walles, and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians tearme it by, euen at this day: and F amongſt the Greekes it is called Palmyra.) And theſe were Salomons works in that time. But for that there are diuers that demand the queſtion how it commeth to paſſe, that all the Kings of Ægypt that haue beene ſince Minæus the founder of Memphis, and who raigned diuers yeeres before our great anceſtor Abraham, who (I ſay) haue beene till Salomons time, for the ſpace of more then thirteene hundred yeeres, haue beene called Pharaohs, deriuing that name from one that raigned in the mid-time betweene both: I haue thought it requiſite to manifeſt the ſame to the the intent to resolue that doubt and expresse the cause of that name. The name of Pharao amongst the Ægyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I thinke that from their childhood they had other distinct names; and that afterwards when they are created kings, they take vpon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no lesse, then Authoritie. For the kings of Alexandria hauing beene before time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the kingdome, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first king.) The Romane Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they haue other names at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæsars; because the soueraignetie and honour whereunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was giuen them by their fathers is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I thinke) that although Herodotus of Halicarnesseus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there haue beene three hundred and thirtie kings of Ægypt; yet declareth he not their names, because they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a woman had obtained the kingdome, he called her by her owne proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who haue beene kings, were vsually called by this name, and that it had not beene communicated vnto this woman: for which cause it was necessarie to declare her owne first name. For mine owne part, I haue found in the bookes of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father in law to Salomon, no one of the kings of Ægypt haue beene called by that name: and that some little while after, the aforenamed woman came vnto Salomon, who raigned in Ægypt and Æthiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I haue made mention of it, to make it knowne that our records and the Chronicles of the Ægyptians, accord in many things.

But king Salomon conquered the Chanaanites (which till that time were not vnder his subiection) and those that inhabited the mountaine Libanus, as farre as the Citie of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them euery yeere such, as he might employ in seruile actions, and in domesticall businesse, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slaue: neither was it conuenient, that since God had subiected diuers nations vnder them (whom they might make slaues of) that they should tie those of their owne nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in armes, and rather tooke delight to mount Chariots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaues. Ouer the Chanaanites (whom he employed in his seruice) he appointed fiue hundreth and fiftie commissaries, who had their charge and authoritie from the king, and tasked them to those workes and handie labours wherein they imployed them. He builded a nauy also in the gulfe of Ægypt, in a certaine place of the red sea called Asiongaber, which is named Berenice, not farre from the Citie of Elana (which countrey in times past appertained to the Iewes.) And toward the building of this nauie, he obtained of Hiram king of Tyre, a very conuenient furtherance: for he sent him modules of ships, and men that were skilfull in nauigation, whom he charged to saile with his procurers and factors, to the countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this present the land of Gold, in the countrey of India, to bring gold from thence: who returned backe againe vnto the King, after they had gathered about foure hundreth talents.

The queene of Egypt and Ethiope resorteth to Salomon.

About this time the Queene of Ægypt and Æthiopia (a woman adorned with wisedome, and admirable in all other things) hauing heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Salomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person vnto the king, vnder purpose to confirme her beliefe by experience, and not by heare-say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is beleeued by one or other, and is but onely grounded on relation. She therefore resolued to come and see him, & especially to make triall of his wisedome: which she narrowly sifted, by proposing certain difficult questions vnto him, which she had conceiued in her mind. She therfore repaired vnto Ierusalem with great pompe, glorie, and riches; for she brought with her certaine Camels charged with gold, odors, and pretious stones of great value. After that the king had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, hee easily comprehended in his minde those doubts which she had proposed vnto him, and gaue her a more speedie solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was rauished with the incredible wisedome of Salomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in especiall she wondered at his palace, considering the greatnesse and beautie thereof; and aboue all, the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same; wherein she perceiued the great wisedome of the king: but aboue all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinarie table, and the apparell and seruice of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his seruants likewise, and the

O King (ſaid ſhe) all that which a man knoweth by heare-ſay may bee misbeleeued. But the renowne which is come vnto our eares as touching your riches, both thoſe which you haue in your ſelfe (I meane your wiſedome and prudence) as thoſe alſo which your kingdome hath brought you, is neither falſe nor fained; which notwithſtanding, yet doth it make your felicitie farre leſſe then that which I ſee before mine eyes: for re-

B port dependeth only on heare-ſay, neither giueth it ſo certaine a notice of things, as the ſight diſcouereth and repreſenteth, when one is neere vnto the ſame. For mine owne part, in that I gaue no credit to the greatneſſe and multitude of that I haue heard, I haue ſeene farre more then I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrewes to be moſt happy; and your ſeruants and friends moſt bleſſed, who are continuall witneſſes and hearers of your wiſedome. And each one of you ought to giue God thanks, that hee hath ſo much loued this region and the inhabitants thereof, that he hath eſtabliſhed you in the royall ſeat. I will diſcouer likewiſe, how beſides her words ſhe expreſſed her affection ſhe bare vnto the king, in teſtifying the ſame by diuers preſents which ſhee offered vnto him. When the Queene of Ægypt and Æthiopia had receiued theſe fauors at the kings hands (according as it hath beene ſpoken) and he likewiſe had magnificently requited her, ſhe returned backe againe into her owne countrey.

About the ſame time there was brought vnto the King from the countrey called the Region of gold, a quantity of precious ſtones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was imployed to make ſupporters in the Temple, and in the Kings houſe, and to make inſtruments of muſicke likewiſe, as Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Leuites might praiſe God. Amongſt all the gifts that were

D euer preſented vnto Salomon, that which was giuen him at that time, was moſt excellent in greatneſſe and beautie. But let no man thinke, that the Pine-wood (which we ſpeake of) had any reſemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants to delude their chapmen, ſell for the ſame. For they are like vnto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to manifeſt in this place, leaſt any man ſhould be deceiued thorow ignorance, in diſcerning the one from the other: becauſe the affaires of Salomon haue drawn vs to make mention of this matter. The waight of gold which this nauy brought vnto the King, was ſixe hundreth, ſixty and ſixe talents: beſide that which the merchants bought themſelues, or that which the kings and princes of Arabia had ſent vnto him in way of preſent. This gold cauſed he to be moulten downe, and made thereof two hundreth targets, each one waighing ſixe hun-

E dreth ſicles; and three hundreth bucklers, each of them waighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. Hee cauſed alſo diuers veſſels of gold and precious ſtones to be made for the vſe of his table, laboured with as curious conceit as might be; the reſt of his neceſſaries alſo were of gold: for nothing was either bought or ſold for ſiluer. For the king had many ſhips vpon the ſea called Tharſis, which vpon his command caried diuers merchandiſe into the remote countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and ſiluer, and much Iuory and Æthiopian Moores, and Apes, and this nauigation in ſayling to and fro, was finiſhed in three yeeres. The renowne and fame alſo of Salomons vertues and wiſedome ſpred farre and neere throughout all nations: ſo that the kings of what country ſoeuer they were, had a deſire to ſee his preſence, becauſe they beleeued not the report, and deſired to manifeſt their Ittan.

There was a certaine place called Ittan, some eight leagues distant off of Ierusalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleasant fountaines of water, whither he vsually and willingly retired himselfe for his pleasure, vsing in all things a most admirable prouidence and promptitude, and taking pleasure in those things that were well contriued. Hee forgot not likewise to make causeys, but caused the hie wayes that led to Ierusalem (where he made his abode) to be paued with blacke stone, both to the intent to make them more accessible for those that trauailed to and fro, as to shew the magnificence and riches of his gouernment. He then diuided his Chariots, and placed them in such sort, that in euery Citie there was a prefixed number, and some few he kept about himselfe, and those Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he stored Ierusalem also with abundance of siluer, so that it was as plentifull as stones; and with Cedar wood (whereof before that time there was no quantity) hee stored the countrey, that it was as plentifull to bee had as wilde fig-trees. Hee commanded the Merchants of Ægypt also, to buy him certaine chariots drawne by two horses, for the price of sixe hundreth dragmes of siluer, which hee sent vnto the Kings of Syria, and to those on the other side of Euphrates. H

Now although he were the most magnificent and intirely beloued of God, surpassing both in prudence and riches all those that before him had the gouernment ouer the Hebrewes; yet continued he not in this estate vntill the end. For, forsaking the obseruation of the ordinances of his fathers, his latter yeeres were not correspondent to his former conuersation, which heretofore we haue declared: for he grew altogither dissolute and immoderately giuen ouer to women, and was not content onely with those of his owne country, but tooke also strange women for his wiues, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby hee transgressed the lawes of marriage instituted by Moses, who inhibited to marrie with those of forraine nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods also, to gratifie and expresse the loue which he bare vnto them: which thing the law-maker foreseeing, hee had forbidden the Israelites to marrie with those that were not of their owne nation, for feare least conforming themselues vnto forraine fashions, they should fall and transgresse the ordinances of their forefathers: and vndertake to honour those gods, and forsake and forget the honour due vnto the true God. But Salomon transported with these brutish pleasures, made no account of these things, but tooke him wiues of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundreth concubines, besides the daughter of Pharao king of Egypt: by which meanes he was excessiuely ouercome by them, insomuch as he followed their examples, and was forced to giue a testimony of the good-will and extreame affection that he bare them, in ordring his life according to the fashion of their countries. As therefore hee increased in yeeres, and his iudgement grew weake, hee was in such sort misled, that hee could not retaine in memorie the customes of his countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worship of those gods which were introduced by his wiues. Before all this he chanced to sinne and default in the obseruation of the law, at such time as hee made the similitudes of beasts of brasse to vnderprop the vessell called the great sea, and those of Lyons, which he caused to bee set vnto his throne: For that action of his ill beseemed him, who had a most excellent and domesticall example of vertue in the person of his father, besides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithfull seruant of God; whence it came to passe, that by neglecting to follow his steppes (notwithstanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing vnto him at two seuerall times) he died most ignominiously. There came therefore vnto him a Prophet sent from God, telling him that his sinnes were manifest and notorious in Gods sight, threatning him that ere long hee should repent the wickednesse hee had committed. Yet notwithstanding the realme should not bee taken from him during his life, because God had promised Dauid that he should be his successour in the same: but after his decease his sonne should beare the penaltie of the same; not so as all the people should reuolt, but that he would giue ten tribes vnto his seruant, and leaue two vnto the grand-childe of Dauid, because hee had loued God, and by reason of the Citie of Ierusalem where it pleased him to make his habitation. Notwithſtanding therefore that he importuned and requeſted him diuers times, yet preuailed he nothing with him for that time. But when Salomons fortunes began to decline (by reaſon of his iniquities aboue mentioned, and the wrath of God prouoked againſt him) Ader by Gods permiſſion came into Idumæa, after he was licenced by Pharao to depart. But being vnable to mooue the people to reuolt from Salomon, by reaſon of the ſtrong garriſons he held; and knowing that without hazzard of his owne perſon, he could mooue no alterations or innouation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himſelfe with a certaine man called Raas (who was fled from his Maſter Adarezer, King of Sophone, and liued like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendſhip with him, and a great ſort of outlawes, and

The death of Salomon. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. al. 4. 3 Reg. 12.

BVT when Salomon was very old, he died, after he had raigned foureſcore yeeres, and liued ninetie foure, and was buried in Ieruſalem; of all Kings the moſt happy, rich, and prudent (except that ſinne whereunto hee was drawne by women in his old age) of whom and thoſe calamities that preſently after befell the Hebrewes, wee haue ſufficiently ſpoken. After the death of Salomon, as ſoone as his ſon Roboam (whom hee begat vpon an Ammonitiſh woman called Nooma) ſucceeded him in the kingdome, the Gouernours of the people ſent certaine meſſengers, into Ægypt to recall Ieroboam: who arriuing in the Citie of Sichem, Roboam came thither alſo, reſoluing himſelfe in that aſſembly of the Iſraelites, to take the kingdome vpon him by the peoples conſent. To him therefore the Princes of the people reſorted with Ieroboam, beſeeching him that he would remit ſomewhat of their ſeruitude, and ſhew himſelfe more mercifull then his father had beene: for that vnder his gouernment they had beene ſorely oppreſſed, aſſuring him that by that meanes his kingdome ſhould be the more aſſured, if ſo be hee had rather be beloued then feared. Hee ſome three dayes after promiſed them to returne an anſwer to their demands, and by that meanes drew them into ſuſpicion, that vpon the motion hee miſliked of the offers they had propoſed: for they thought it became his yeeres to be affable and ready to deſerue wel, yet remained there ſome hope in them, that they had not preſently ſuffered the repulſe. Meane while, hee calling about him his fathers friends, conſulted vpon the matter, what anſwer, hee ſhould giue the people: Who for that they wiſhed his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perſwaded him to ſpeake familiarly vnto the people, and remitting a little of his kingly auſterity, to apply himſelfe to the fauour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability he might the more eaſily draw their hearts vnto him, becauſe that by a naturall inclination, ſubiects take delight in thoſe kings that are curteous, who with a certaine decent familiaritie, entertaine themſelues amongſt them. But Roboam reiected this counſel of theirs (which was both good & profitable in all occaſions, but eſpecially at ſuch time, when it is vpon the point to be inſeated in a kingdome) and that not without Gods prouidence, ſince contrary to all reaſon he neglected the right courſe, and followed the peruerſe: ſo that calling vnto him certaine young men of his owne humour and diſpoſition, he certified them what the Elders had counſailed him, and willed them to diſcouer their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods permiſſion ſuffered them to knowe that which was expedient. For which cauſe they counſailed him to anſwer the people, that his little finger was more great then the loynes of his father, and that if they had experimented and indured grieuances vnder him, that he would be farre more rigorous, and if that his father had chaſtiſed them with the ſtroke of the whip, that they ſhould expect to be puniſhed by him with rude torments. The king delighted herewith, ſuppoſed the anſwer to be anſwerable to the dignity of his Empire. When as therefore the people were aſſembled on the third day to heare his reſolution, and all of them were in ſuſpence, expecting and deſirous to heare him ſpeak, from whom they hoped nought elſe but ſweetnes: Roboam contemning the counſell of his friends, propoſed vnto himſelfe that of the young men. All which hapned by the will of God, to the end that that which Achias had prophecied might be fulfilled.

The people require Roboam to mittigate their burthen.

The wholſom aduiſe of the Elders

The yeare of the world, 2971. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 993.

Roboam reiecteth the aduiſe of the Elders, and followeth the counſaile of the yonger.

The Iſraelites mooued with their repulſe, reuolt from Roboam.

They touched by theſe his anſwers, no leſſe then if they had bin wounded with the ſword, conceiued a moſt harty griefe, and were diſpleaſed with him, and no leſſe moued, then if they had already felt the miſchiefe that was threatned: ſo that they beganne all of them to cry with a loud voice, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Dauids alliance, neither with his ſucceſſion, telling him that they would onely leaue the temple his father had builded, vnto his charge, & threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were ſo hainouſly and grieuouſly incenſed, (that Roboam hauing ſent vnto them Adoram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perſwade them to pardon his youth, if hee had ſpoken any thing lightly, and vnreſpectiuely vnto them) they could not endure to heare him ſpeake, but ſlew and welnigh ouerwhelmed him with ſtones. Which when Roboam perceiued (ſuppoſing that it was himſelfe, who in the perſon of his officer was put to death, & ſtoned by the people) he feared leaſt in effect his life, and the fortune of his kingdome ſhould fall into the like diſaſter. For which cauſe he ſuddainly aſcended his chariot & fled to Ieruſalem, where the tribe of Iuda, and that of Beniamin (by their

A their common ſuffrages) made him king. But as touching the reſt of the people, from that day forward they reuolted from the ſucceſſors of Dauid, and proclaimed Ieroboam king of their eſtates. Roboam the ſonne of Salomon being ſore diſpleaſed herewith, aſſembled the two tribes of his obeiſance, with an intent to muſter one hundreth and foureſcore thouſand choſen men, to make warre on Ieroboam and his people, and to enforce them by warre to acknowledge him for their Soueraigne. But God reſtrained him by the meanes of a Prophet, who forbad him to make warre; ſaying, that it was ill befitting that warre ſhould be waged betwixt two parties of one nation, and the rather for that this their reuolt had hapned by the will of God: by which meanes and perſwaſion he diſmiſſed his army. But firſt of all I will rehearſe that which Ieroboam king of Iſrael did, and afterwards ſubſequently I will declare the acts of Roboam King of the two Tribes, and thus ſhall the courſe of the hiſtorie continue in due order euery waies.

Roboam intending to make warre on thoſe tribes that reuolted is inhibited.

B After that Ieroboam had planted his royall court in the citie of Sichem, he made his ordinarie aboad in that place, except that ſometimes he ſoiourned in the Citie of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feaſt of Tabernacles being at hand, Ieroboam (ſuppoſing that if he permitted the people to goe vp and worſhip God in Ieruſalem, and ſolemnize the feaſt in that place, they might either repent themſelues of the reuolt, or being retained and withdrawne by the temple and ſeruice that was celebrated therein, they might be perſwaded to forſake him, and ſubmit themſelues to their firſt King; and by that meanes he might be drawne into danger of his life) practiſed and plotted this inuention. He cauſed two golden calues to be caſt, and builded two ſeuerall temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan (which is ſituate neere vnto the ſource of little Iordan.) In each of the chappels of theſe two townes, he placed one of theſe calues, and afterwards aſſembling

Why Ieroboams calues were made.

C the ten tribes that were vnder his ſubiection, he ſpake vnto them in manner following: My friends and countrey-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he aſſiſteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth them not, that ſerue him with true affection: For which cauſe I thinke it not conuenient, that you goe vp vnto Ieruſalem at that time, which is a Citie enemie vnto vs; neither that you make ſo long a iourney in way of deuotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, euen as I haue conſecrated two golden calues, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that euery one of you that inhabite neere vnto thoſe Cities, tranſporting your ſelues to the ſame, may adore God. Neither ſhall you want Prieſts and Leuites: for I will elect ſome ſuch among you, to the intent you haue no more neede of the tribe of Leui, or the ſonnes of Aaron. Whoſoeuer therefore Ieroboam perſwadeth the people to Idolatrie.

D amongſt you would be a Prieſt, let him offer calues and muttons vnto God: which as it is reported Aaron the firſt Prieſt did. By ſuch like ſpeeches ſeduced he the people, and cauſed them to fall from their forefathers religion, and tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their countrey, and this was the beginning of all thoſe miſchiefes that afterwards fell vpon the Hebrewes: by which meanes being ouercome in warre, they fell into captiuitie and ſubiection of ſtrangers (whereof we will intreat further in place conuenient. Now when the feaſt of Tabernacles (which hapned in the ſeauenth moneth) was at hand; he himſelfe intended to celebrate in Bethel after the ſame manner, as the two other tribes had feaſted in Ieruſalem, and erected an altar before the calfe, and was himſelfe the high Prieſt, aſcending vp to the altar being aſſiſted by the Prieſts.

The neglect of Gods ſeruice is the cauſe of all euill.

Now at ſuch time as he was about to ſacrifice, and to offer vp burnt offerings in the ſight of the

E people, there came a Prophet and ſtood by him called Iadon (ſent from Ieruſalem by the commandement of God, who ſtanding vp in the midſt of the people, and in the hearing of the king, turned himſelfe towards the altar, and ſpake after this maner: Thou Altar, Thou Altar (thus ſaith the Lord) there ſhall a man riſe of the tribe of Dauid called Ioſias, he ſhall kill vpon thee the falſe prophets of his time, and ſhall burne the bones of the deceiuers and ſeducers vpon thee: And to the intent that each man may beleeue that this prophecie is true, it ſhall be confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar ſhall ſodainly breake, and the fat of the ſacrifices that are laid thereon, ſhall be powred on the ground. Ieroboam diſpleaſed with theſe words of the Prophet, ſtretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he ſtretched out, became in-

F ſtantly withered, ſo that he could no more draw it backe againe to himſelfe, but held it hanging down aſtoniſhed and mortified. On the other ſide, the altar cleft in twaine, and all that was thereon fell downe, according as the Prophet had foretold.) The king perceiuing that the man had a true and diuine ſpirit of Prophecie, beſought him to pray vnto God, that his hand might be reſtored him againe in his full ſtrength and vigor: which he performed: ſo that his hand recouered againe his naturall abilitie; wherewith Ieroboam was very much contented, and inuited the Prophet to dine with him. But Iadon anſwered him and ſaid, that he neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the Citie, becauſe God had prohibited him: further- G more he told him that it was not lawfull for him to returne the ſame way that he came. But the King admiring at the continencie of the man, began the more ſeriouſly to ſuſpect his eſtate, and (coniecturing by thoſe things which hee had both ſeene and heard) hee diuined the aſſured diſaſter of his eſtate and fortunes. There dwelt in that Citie a certaine falſe Prophet, whom Ieroboam held in great honour (in that hee ſoothed him vp in whatſoeuer was beſt pleaſing to his eares.) This man at that time lay ſicke vpon his bedde, beeing faint through age; and when hee was enformed by his ſonne that there was a Prophet come from Ieruſalem, and what wonders hee had wrought, and how Ieroboam by his prayers recouered againe his withered hand; hee fearing leaſt the King ſhould make more account of this ſtranger, then of himſelfe, commanded his ſonnes preſently to ſaddle his Aſſe, and to haue him in a readineſſe againſt his departure. Which when they had haſtily performed, hee mounted thereon, and went after the H Prophet, whom hee ouertooke, where hee reſted himſelfe vnder a thicke ſhadowie Oake; and vpon the firſt encountry, ſaluted him, and afterwards expoſtulated with him, for that hee had not viſited him, neither accepted of that hoſpitalitie which hee willingly would haue affoorded him. Iadon anſwered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taſte any kinde of ſuſtenance in any mans houſe, that dwelt within that citie. Truely, ſaid the other, with me thou mightſt eate, for I alſo am a Prophet, and honour the ſame God that thou doeſt: and now alſo come I vnto thee by his commandement, to conduct thee backe againe into my houſe, and to entertaine thee with a friendly dinner. Theſe words of the falſe Prophet made Iadon credulous, ſo that he turned backe againe with him. But as they ſate at their banquet and were making merry together, God appeared vnto Iadon and ſaid vnto him; that ſince he had broken his commandement, I hee ſhould ſuffer puniſhment for the ſame: and withall expreſſed vnto him the manner: which was, that in his returne homewards, he ſhould be torne in pieces by a Lyon; and that he ſhould not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Ieroboam ſhould not reſpect Iadons words, who had beene found a liar. As therefore Iadon returned backe to Ieruſalem, a Lyon met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Aſſe and ſlew him, yet offered he no violence to the Aſſe that bare him, which he preſerued with the body of the Prophet, ſtanding faſt by the ſame, vntill ſuch time as certaine paſſengers beholding the ſpectacle, brought newes thereof into the towne vnto the falſe Prophet, who ſent his ſonnes to bring backe the body: which by their aſſiſtance hee honourably buried, charging them that after his death they ſhould burie his body by him, aſſuring them that all that which he had prophecied againſt that Citie, againſt the altar, the Prieſts, and falſe prophets, was K very true. And as touching himſelfe, he commanded that after his deceaſe they ſhould bury him by him, becauſe that beeing buried with him, there might no difference bee made betwixt their bones, and his tombe might be more honoured. When as therefore he had interred the Prophet and giuen his ſonne theſe things in charge (beeing other waies a moſt wicked and impious man) he addreſſed himſelfe vnto Ieroboam, and ſaid vnto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his hand, and " aſſured him that he accounted him a true and diuine Prophet, and one ſent by God. But the falſe " prophet began moſt maliciouſly to ouerthrow his opinion, and diſguiſe the truth of that which " hapned, by his perſwaſiue words. For hee inforced himſelfe to inferre, that his hand was aſtoniſhed through the trauell he had taken in bearing the ſacrifices, and that after he had a little reſted, L

" that it came into his owne naturall eſtate againe: and that the Altar being freſhly built, and diuers
" great ſacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twaine, and fell downe through the waightineſſe of
" the charge. Conſequently he declared vnto him the death of him, that had foretold theſe ſignes
" that were to come, and how he had beene ſlaine by a Lyon: For which cauſe he perſwaded him " to thinke that he in no ſort was a Prophet, neither any waies partaking with the truth of prophecie. By ſuch like allegations he made the King beleeue that which hee ſaid; and hauing wholly diſtracted his thoughts from God and good workes, and obſeruation of Gods lawes, he drew him to all wickedneſſe and impietie: by which act of his he outraged God, and offended his lawes, and ſought daily after no other thing, then to inuent ſome new and curſed wickedneſſe, that was farre M more hainous then all that which before time he had attempted. This is all that at this time wee haue to write, as concerning Ieroboam.

As touching Roboam Salomons ſonne (who was King of the two Tribes, as wee haue before this declared) hee builded theſe great and ſtrong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethſur, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Mareſa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and Hebron, which

A which being within the confines of Iuda, he builded firſt. He builded alſo other great Cities in the countrey of the Beniamites, which he walled, and placed garriſons and gouernours in euery one of them, and great ſtore of corne, wine and oyle: and generally in euery Citie he made a great ſtore-houſe with all ſorts of prouiſion, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets and launces. To him the Prieſts and Leuites annexed themſelues, who were diſperſed thorow Iſrael, who came and dwelt in Ieruſalem. For they tooke no pleaſure to adore by compulſion thoſe calues that Ioroboam had erected; and during the terme of three yeeres, they increaſed the kingdome of Roboam: who being married to one of his owne line had three children, and was afterwards married alſo with Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Abſalon, who was of his parentage likewiſe, of whom he begat his ſonne called Abiah. He had alſo diuers other children

B by other women; but aboue all the reſt, he loued Maacha moſt entirely. He had eighteene legitimate wiues, married vnto him according to the law, and thirtie concubines: he had eight and twentie ſonnes and threeſcore daughters, and declared for his ſucceſſour in the kingdome Abiah the ſonne of Maacha, and committed all his treaſures and ſtrong forts vnto his hands. But mortall men moſt vſually are corrupted by the vntoward flatteries of wauering fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Roboam ſeeing his kingdome thus increaſed, he bent himſelfe to all vniuſt and impious actions, and contemned the ſeruice of God: the people alſo conformed themſelues to his impieties. For the life of the ſubiect is oftentimes peruerted, by reaſon of the corrupt and diſſolute life of their princes; and thoſe that are inferiours, beholding the ryot of their ſuperiours, will eaſily be withdrawne from all modeſtie, and follow thoſe vices they profeſſe, as if they had b'n

C their profeſſed vertues: for ſhould they do the contrary, they ſhould ſeeme to diſanull and miſlike the actions of their Princes: As it hapned vnder the gouernment of Roboam, wherein the ſubiects addicted themſelues to impietie, and all errors: for they would not make profeſſion of honeſtie, for feare leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to ſtudie the meanes to be offenſiue vnto the king.

SVSAC king of Aegypt after the ſpoile of Ieruſalem, tranſporteth the riches of that Citie into Aegypt.

D BVT God ſent Suſac king of Ægypt to take vengeance for that exceſſe, which was committed againſt his maieſtie by Roboam (whoſe actions Herodotus wrongfully aſcribeth to Seſoſtris.) For this Suſac in the fift yeere of Roboams raigne, aſſembled a huge army of diuers thouſands of men, and brought them out againſt Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelue hundreth chariots, threeſcore thouſand horſemen, and foure hundreth thouſand footmen. The greater part of theſe were Libyans, and Æthiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrewes countrey with this power, without ſtroke-ſtriking he ſeized the ſtrongeſt places of the kingdome of Roboam, and fortified them, and at laſt came and incamped before Ieruſalem. But Roboam and his aſſociates, ſeeing themſelues begirt with a ſtrong ſiege on euery ſide by Suſacs army; at laſt had his recourſe vnto prayers: yet could he not mooue God to encline and fauor

E him with the victorie. For the prophet Samæas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like ſort, as they had forſaken him and his ſeruice. Which when they heard, they ſodainly loſt their hearts, and ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, they all of them began to confeſſe that God had iuſtly forſaken them, becauſe they had ſhewed their impietie againſt him, and had peruerted all his lawes. But God ſeeing them thus diſpoſed, and making confeſſion of their ſinnes, ſaid vnto the Prophet, that he would not vtterly deſtroy them: yet notwithſtanding that he would deliuer them into the hands of the Ægyptians, to the end that they might learne whether it were more difficult to ſerue God, or men. When as therefore king Suſac had without bloodſhed or reſiſt taken and ſurpriſed the City, and was receiued into the ſame by diſcomforted Roboam; he kept not thoſe conuentions that were made betwixt them, but ſpoiled the Temple,

F and tooke away with him thoſe treaſures that were dedicated vnto God, and the ſeruice of the King, rauiſhing from thence innumerable thouſands of gold and ſiluer, not leauing any thing behind him. He carried away alſo thoſe Target and bucklers of gold, which were made by king Salomon: neither left he behind him the quiuer of gold, which was offered by Dauid, and receiued by him of the king of Sopheni: Which done, he retired back againe into his own countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnaſſus maketh mention (who differeth only in the name of the king) and ſaith that he aſſailed diuers nations, and ſubdued Paleſtina and Syria, and tooke many men prisoners without any resist: whereby it is manifest that he meaneth no lesse then that our nation hath beene ouercome by the Ægyptian. For he saith that in their gates who yeelded themselues vp vnto him without inforcement, he erected pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. But our king Roboam yeelded vp the Citie into his hands without contradiction. It is said that the Æthiopians haue learnt of the Ægyptians the vse of circumcision of the prepuce. For the Phenicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confesse that they haue learnt it of the Ægyptians. But it is a matter very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestine of Syria, but our selues. But let each one speake of these things, according as him list. G

After the retreat of Sisac, king Roboam made shields and bucklers of brasse, in stead of those of gold, and gaue the like number vnto his guard: and in stead of liuing in a braue army, in a royall and princely estate, he raigned after a seruile and fearefull manner, being all his life time enemy to Ieroboam. He died after he had liued fiftie seauen yeeres, whereof he raigned seuenteene. He was a haughtie and vndiscreet man, who lost his estate, because he would not giue credite to his fathers friends. He was buried in Ierusalem in the sepulcher of the kings, and his sonne Abias succeeded him in his raigne, at such time as Ieroboam had already raigned eighteene yeeres ouer the tenne tribes. H

Thus were these things terminated. It behoueth now at this present to declare that which Ieroboam did afterwards, and how he died. He, obseruing no meane or end of his impietie, imployed himselfe continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrificers. But God with-held not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posteritie. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimes was sicke about that time, he commanded his wife to lay aside her royall garment, and to apparell her selfe like a common woman, and afterwards to goe to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be king: for which cause he willed her to repaire vnto him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her sonne should escape that sickenesse. Whereupon shee disguised her selfe according as her husband had commanded her, and came vnto the Citie of Silo where Achias dwelt: and as she was vpon entring his house (notwithstanding he had lost his sight thorow age) God appeared vnto him, and certified him in these two points: first that Ieroboams wife came vnto him; and next, all that he should answer to her demand. At such time therefore as she entred into his house, after the guise of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loude voice; Enter thou wife of Ieroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy selfe? Thou canst not hide thy selfe from God, who hath certified me of thy comming, and hath informed me what answer I shall giue vnto thee. He therefore said vnto her, that she should returne vnto her husband, and certifie him of Gods answer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I haue made thee great; and hauing dismembred the kingdome from Dauids posteritie, I haue giuen it vnto thee: but thou hast forgotten the same; and hauing forsaken my seruice, hast molten downe new gods, whom thou honourest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posteritie, and cast them off for a prey vnto dogs, and fowles of the ayre. For I will constitute a king ouer my people that shall leaue no one of Ieroboams race aliue. The people also shall haue part of this punishment, and shall be depriued of this their fruitfull countrey, and be scattered among the regions on the other side of Euphrates, because they haue followed the impieties of their king, and adoring those gods that were forged by him, haue giuen ouer my sacrifice. And, as concerning thy selfe (O woman) haste thee, and certifie thy husband of these things. For thou shalt finde thy sonne dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the Citie, but he shall finish his daies. He shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in generall. For he onely was good of all the race of Ieroboam. I K L

The haste which she vsed was importunate, because of her sonne whom she should see dead; by so much the sooner she hasted homeward, but it behooued her to vse expedition in the behalfe of her husband. When as therefore she was arriued, she found her sonne expiring, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited the rest vnto Ieroboam. M

Alias chap. 6. The expedition of Ieroboam against Abias King of Iuda.

BVT Ieroboam was nothing mooued therewith, but leuied a great armie, with an intent to make warre against Abias the sonne of Roboam, who had obtained his fathers kingdome ouer the two tribes. For he despised him because he was yong in yeeres. This notwithstanding, the yong King was no whit dismaid (although hee vnderstood of Ieroboams comming)

B but with greater wisedome then was incident to his yeeres, and beyond all expectation of his forward aduersarie, hee leuied an army of two tribes, with which hee encountred Ieroboam at the mountaine of Samaria; where incamping his host neere vnto him, hee prouided all things in a readinesse that were requisite for the battell, and had with him foure hundreth thousand fighting men, but Ieroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to giue the allarum and charge, Abias stood vp in a certaine high place from whence hee might bee seene and heard, and making a signe with his hand, hee required that Ieroboam and the people would first of all heare him peaceably: which granted to him, and each one attending in silence, he brake out into these words; There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promised the kingdome to Dauid and his posterity for euer; I therefore greatly admire how you haue reuol-

C ted from my father, to submit your selues to Ieroboam his seruant, whom at this present you accompany to warre against those whom God hath ordained to raigne, and to take the kingdome from them, the greater part whereof Ieroboam vsurpeth vniustly euen at this day, and which, as I suppose he shall not enioy long time. For he shall be punished by God, and shall cease to contradict his lawes, and to dishonour them as hee doth continually, in perswading you to doe the like. You haue receiued no iniurie at my fathers hands; but by reason that he was misled by the sinister counsailes of certaine wicked persons, and spake vnto you certaine words which in apparance seemed vnfitting in your eares, you haue forsaken him in your displeasure: but in effect, you haue separated your selues from God and his commandements. Truely you should haue pardoned a yong man vntrained and vntaught in Oratorie, not onely for the rude words which hee vsed, but

D although his youth and ignorance should haue mooued him to commit some churlish and indiscreet action and errour, yet should you haue indured the same. For the fathers demerits ought to serue and satisfie the childrens defects. But you haue had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this present, but lead forth a great army against vs. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your calues of gold? It it on your Altars on the mountaines, which are witnesses of your impietie and irreligion? Is it your great number that surpasseth ours by far, that maketh you confident? Truely the force of many thousands is of no value, whereas the army fighteth in an vniust quarrell. For in onely iustice and pietie towards God, consisteth the most assured hope of obtaining victory ouer a mans enemies: which must needes bee on our side, who obserue at all times the ordinances and seruices of our God, whom mens hands haue not fashio-

E ned of corruptible matter, nor the subtiltie of a cunning King could not forge to deceiue a communaltie, but such a one, whose worke is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore aduise you, that presently you repent your selues, and that taking a better way you desist from your warre, and acknowledge the lawes of your forefathers; finally, those ordinances, which haue aduanced you to so great felicitie.

Thus spake Abias to the people. But whilst he yet continued his discourse, Ieroboam sent certaine of his souldiers by by-waies to inclose Abias within two streights, before his followers could discouer them. Now when Abias was thus inclosed in the midst of his enemies, his armie began to bee discomforted, and to lose their courage: but hee incouraged them, and exhorted them to put their trust in God, who could not be inclosed by his enemies: so that all together hauing cal-

F led vpon God to assist them, and after that the Priests had sounded the trumpet, they thrust in amongst their enemies with a great shout, and God so blinded the vnderstanding, and abated the force of Ieroboams souldiers, that they fled, and those on Abias side had the vpper hand. Neuer was there war recorded by the historians either amongst the Greekes or Barbarians, that was pursued with so great a slaughter as the army of Ieroboam: whereby it appeared that this wonderfull and admirable victory came from God. For they discomfited fiue hundred thousand of their enemies, and tooke their most defenced places by force and spoiled them. Bethel and Ithan also with their lands and signiories belonging vnto them: so that as long as Abias liued, Ieroboam was neuer after of force to raise any power since the losse he receiued. Abias surviued after this his victory, onely for the space of 3. yeeres; and was buried in Ierusalem, in the Sepulcher of his ancestors, leauing twenty two sons and sixteene daughters behind him, all which he begat on sixteene women. His sonne Asa succeeded him in the kingdome, whose mother was called Maacha: vnder his gouernment the countrey of Israel enioyed a firme peace for the space of ten yeeres. This is that which we haue obserued of Abias, sonne of Roboam, the son of Salomon: Iereboam the king of the tenne Tribes died likewise, after he had raigned twenty two yeeres, and Nadab his son succeeded him, at such time as Asa had already raigned two yeeres. The sonne of Ieroboam gouerned two yeeres, resembling his father in impietie and wickednesse. During these two yeeres, he made war against Gaban, a City of the Philistines, and encamped thereabout to surprise it by force: but being betraied by the trecherie of a certen friend of his called Baasa, the son of Machil, he died. This Baasa taking possession of the kingdome, exterminated all the posterity of Ieroboam: and it came to passe that they of Ieroboams race that died in the Citie, were torne in pieces, and deuoured by dogges; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey vnto birds, according as Gods prophet had pronounced. By this meanes the house of Ieroboam suffered a deserued punishment, for their impietie and wickednesse.

The Ethiopians besiege Ierusalem during the raigne of ASA, and are ouercome. I

Hedio & Rufinus. chap. 12. al 8.

Asas pietie.

BVT Asa king of Ierusalem, was a man of vpright and honest life, and such a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprised he any thing, that had not a naturall relation to pietie, and the prescript of the lawes. He corrected whatsoeuer was vitious and irregular in his kingdome, redressing whatsoeuer was erronious in the same, and purging it from all impietie. He had an army of three hundred thousand men of the tribe of Iuda, armed with bucklers & iauelins, and two hundred and fiftie thousand of the tribe of Beniamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After he had raigned ten yeeres, Zaræus king of Ethiopia came out against him, with a great army of nine hundred thousand footmen, and one hundred thousand horsmen with three hundred charriots, and destroied all the land as farre as Maresa, a City of Iuda: in which place Asa came and met with him, and opposed army against army in the valley of Saphath, not far from the City. Where seeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he besought God that he would giue him the victory and slaughter of diuers thousands of his enemies: for he said that he came out against Zaræus, not assuring himself in any other thing, except onely of Gods assistance, who had the power to make a handfull of men superiours ouer many, and the feeble to ouercome the mightie.

3. Reg. 15. The Ethiopians warre against Asa.

K

Whilst Asa praied thus vnto God, a certaine signe of victory was giuen him; so that, reioyced and confirmed in that God had giuen him a token that he would assist him, hee assailed his enemies, and slew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the rest that were put to flight, he pursued them as farre as the countrey of Gerar; and after they had conquered their enemies, they sacked the city of Gerar, and brought from thence a great masse of gold, and a huge quantity of booty, with Camels, Dromodaries, and herds of diuers kinds of cattell.

When Asa and his had thus by this means obtained at Gods hands such a victory, and so great riches, they returned back againe to Ierusalem: and when they drew neere vnto the city, the prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who staied them, and beganne after this manner to speake vnto them: That sith they had obtained from God so notable a victory, they ought to behaue themselues like vertuous men, and such as feared God, conforming themselues vnto his will in all things; protesting that if they persisted in the same, God would giue them the continuall victory ouer their enemies; and besides that, happy life: but if they forsooke the seruice of God, that all things should fal out contrary vnto them. That the time should come, when neither true prophet or priest should be found amongst them, that should instruct them in righteousnesse, when their Cities should be ouerthrowne, and their nation should bee scattered ouer the face of the whole earth, and liue like wanderers and vagabonds. In the meane while therfore, while they had time, he counselled thē to liue vprightly, wishing them that they would not deprive themselues of that fauour which God bare vnto them. When the King and all the people heard these words, they were very ioyfull, and euery one both in generall and particular, were carefull to serue God. The

Now will I returne to Baſa king of the multitude of Iſrael, who (hauing ſlaine Madab the ſon of Ieroboam) vſurped the kingdome. He made his aboad in the city of Therſa, and raigned foure and twenty yeares, ſhewing himſelfe more wicked and impious, then either Ieroboam or his ſonne had bin. He plagued the people many waies, and diſhonored God very greatly, who ſent the prophet Gimon vnto him, to foretell him that his whole race ſhould periſh, and that his houſe ſhould be perſecuted with as many miſeries as himſelfe had inflicted on Ieroboams poſteritie: becauſe that hauing receiued the gouernment from God, he ſhewed himſelfe vngratefull vnto him for his goodneſſe, and gouerned his people impiouſly and vniuſtly: wheras iuſtice and piety are both profitable vnto thoſe that practiſe them, and wel-pleaſing vnto God. For the army which beſieged Gabathan, hearing newes of the kings death, and that Zamri had murthered him, and ſeiſed the kingdome, they made Amri generall of the army, and annointed him for their king: who leuying the ſiege before Gabathan, came before the royall city of Therſa, which hee beſieged and tooke perforce. Zamri ſeeing the city deſtitute of defence, had retired himſelfe into the moſt

Suddainly after this, the Iſraelites fell at controuerſie amongſt themſelues, becauſe that ſome of them ſought to preferre Thaman to the kingdome, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amries ſide had the better, and beeing of the better ſort, ſlew Thaman, and made Amri ſoueraigne ouer the people. The thirteenth yeere of Aſa, Amri began his raigne, and was king for twelue yeeres ſpace; ſixe yeere gouerned he in Therſa, and ſixe in Mareon (which the Greekes call Samaria) himſelfe impoſed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had giuen him the land on which he builded this City. He differed in nothing from the other kings his predeceſſors, but in that he was worſer then any of them: for all of them buſied their heads on this thing onely, that by daily impieties they might alien the people from God. For which cauſe God being diſpleaſed, cauſed the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguiſhed both the poſterity and name of one another. Hereby a man may truely and eaſily perceiue, what care the diuine maieſtie hath of humane affaires, and how he loueth the vertuous, and vtterly rooteth out the vicious. For the kings of Iſrael, through their impietie, in a ſhort and ſucceſſiue courſe the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with al their families. But Aſa (king of Ieruſalem and the two Tribes) liuing happily in the fauour of God, for his piety and iuſtice attained to a reuerend and old age: and after he had raigned one and forty yeeres, he died a good death. And after his death, Ioſaphat his ſonne (whom he begat on his mother Abida) ſucceeded him; who in all things that concerned either piety or fortitude, ſeemed to emulate and equall his grandfather Dauid, according as it ſhal be declared hereafter. But Achab king of Iſrael made his aboad in Samaria, & gouerned the kingdome for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres, without any alteration of thoſe ordinances which his progenitors kings of Iſrael had eſtabliſhed; but that he exceeded them daily in complotting worſer wickedneſſe. For he imitated all their impieties and wickedneſſe (but eſpecially the Apoſtaſie of Ieroboam) for he adored thoſe calues that were erected by him; and beſides that, hee added farre worſe impieties then the former. He tooke to wife Iezabel the daughter of Ithobal king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learned to adore the gods of her nation: for ſhee was a buſie and audacious woman, and of ſuch immeaſurable madneſſe, that ſhee feared not to build a temple in honour of Bel the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furniſhed with all kinde of trees, and to ordaine prieſts and falſe prophets alſo in honor of that god. The king alſo tooke delight to haue theſe kinds of men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other kings before him in madnes and malice. To him came a certaine prophet ſent by the Almighty God, that was borne in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he foreprophecied, that neither deaw nor rain ſhould fall on the earth a long time, vntill that himſelfe, who was prepared to depart from him, ſhould appeare againe vnto him: and binding the ſame with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himſelfe to the Southward, where he liued by a certaine riuer, from whence he fetcht his drinke: for his meat was daily brought him by certaine Crowes.

Now when the riuer thorow want of raine was waxen dry, God commanded him to repaire vnto Sareptha (a City not farre from Sidon and Tyre, and ſituate in the midſt betweene them both) where he ſhould find a widdow-woman, who would furniſh him with food. As ſoone therfore as he drew neere vnto the gate, he ſaw a woman that liued by her labour, gathering of ſticks; and God gaue him to vnderſtand that it was ſhe who ſhould nouriſh him. Whereupon he came vnto her and ſaluted her, praying her that ſhe would bring him ſome water to coole his thirſt; and as ſhe was ready to depart, he called her backe againe, and willed her to bring him ſome bread alſo. Whereupon ſhe ſwore that ſhe had nothing in her houſe, but a handfull of flower and a little oyle, and that ſhe was come forth to gather ſticks, to the end ſhe might bake the ſame, and make bread for her ſelfe and her ſonne, and when they had eaten the ſame, they muſt needly periſh thorow famine, becauſe they had not any thing more left them. Go, ſaid the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceiue better hopes, and when thou haſt prepared meate for me, bring it me: for I tell thee that thy pitcher of meale ſhall neither faile, nor thy pot of oyle be empty, vntill that God ſend raine vpon the earth. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, ſhee approched neere vnto him, and performed that which he commanded, and ſhe her ſelfe had ſufficient to feede vpon, and ſhe gaue the reſt vnto her ſonne and to the Prophet: ſo that they wanted nothing ſo long as the drought continued.

Menander of the famine during the time of Elias.

Menander maketh mention of this default of raine, in the acts of Ithobal king of the Tyrians, ſpeaking after this manner. In this time there was a ſeaſon without raine, from the moneth of October

A October vntill October in the next yeere after, but vpon his ſupplication and requeſt there fell great ſtore of thunder. He builded the citie of Botris in Phenicia and Auzate in Libya. Doubtleſſe he expreſſed hereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Ithobale raigned ouer the Tyrians, as Menander teſtifieth in his hiſtorie. The woman (of whom we haue ſpoken heretofore, that nouriſhed the Prophet) ſeeing her ſonne fallen ſicke, and lying ſenſeleſſe, as if he had bin already dead, or yeelding vp of the ghoſt; wept, and brake out into ſuch paſſionate laments, as were anſwerable to her deſolate eſtate; and ſaid, that the cauſe of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her houſe, and had diſcouered her ſinnes, and that for the ſame cauſe her ſonne was dead. But he recomforted her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the childe vnto him, aſſuring her that he would reſtore him to life. The yeere of the world, 2038. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 917.

Now when ſhe had brought him, he tooke the childe and bare him into his lodging where he B remained, and laid him on his bed, and cryed out vnto God, ſaying, that he had but ſlenderly recompenced her that had receiued and nouriſhed him, if ſo be her ſon ſhould be taken from her: he therefore beſought him, that he would returne the ſoule into the body, and reſtore life vnto the infant. Whereupon, GOD hauing compaſſion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might ſuppoſe that he came vnto her to endomage her; he reſtored the childe to life beyond all expectation. For which the mother gaue thankes vnto the Prophet, ſaying, that by this meanes ſhe was thorowly perſwaded, that GOD had ſpoken vnto him. Not long after, he ſought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him vnderſtand that he ſhould haue raine. At that time the famine raigned ouer the whole countrey, and there was great want of neceſſary victuals, ſo that men did not onely faint for want C of bread; but the earth alſo for want of raine, could not bring forth that which was requiſite for the ſuſtenance of horſes and other cattell. The king therefore calling Obediah vnto him (who was the maſter of his heards) he commanded him that he ſhould each way ſeeke out for fountaines and brookes, willing him that if he found out any graſſe, he ſhould mowe the ſame, and giue it to his cattell for their ſuſtenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was ſought in diuers places, and could not be found: he willed Obediah alſo to follow him. So taking both of them ſeuerall waies, the king followed one, and the maſter of the cattell another. Elias reſtoreth the widdowes ſonne to life. 3. King. 18. Elias is ſent by God to prophecie raine to Achab. The yeere of the world, 3040. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 924.

This Obediah was a godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and ſuſtained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the king, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certi- D fied him, he humbled himſelfe on his face before him. Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the king, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein he had offended him, that he would make him a miniſter and meſſenger vnto him, who had ſought to kill him, and had by-laid the countrey to apprehend him? For there was not any ſtreight, whither he ſent not ſome of his men to finde out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they ſhould put him to death. Now it may ſo be (ſaid he) that whilſt I repaire vnto the king, the Spirit of GOD wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the king not finding thee heere, and fruſtrate of his deſire, will reuenge himſelfe on my head. Be thou not therfore ſo ſecure by my danger, whereas thou maiſt know how carefull I am of ſuch holy men as thou art, who haue deliuered a hundred Prophets from Iezabels furie, and now at this time conceale and ſuſtaine them in ſecret pla- E ces. Notwithſtanding all theſe words, Elias commanded him to repaire vnto the king, and to caſt off all feare, ſwearing vnto him by an oath, how that day he would make himſelfe ſeene and knowne vnto Achab. Achab ſeeketh for Elias. Obediah concealeth and ſuſtaineth a hundred prophets.

When Obediah had certified the king that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being fraught with indignation, ſaid vnto him. Is it thou that heapeſt ſo much miſchiefe on the Hebrewes heads? Art thou the man that art the cauſe of this ſterilitie? To whom Elias replied without flattering him any waies, that it was he and his race that were the occaſions of theſe miſchiefes, becauſe they had brought ſtrange Gods into their countrey; whom they adored, and had forſaken the true God, who was and is onely to be worſhipped. He therefore willed him preſent- F ly to aſſemble all the people on the mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife & her prophets, whoſe number he reckoned vp: the Prophets likewiſe of the woods, who were in number foure hundred. When as therefore all of them being ſummoned by the king were gathered together in that place: Elias ſtood vp in the midſt of them and ſaid; How long will you liue thus, hauing both your ſoules and opinions diſmembred and diuided? For, if you thinke that the Hebrewes God is the true and onely GOD, why follow you him not? and why keepe you not his commandements? But if you thinke that the honour belongeth not to him, but to forraine Achab accuſeth Elias of impietie. Elias reprooueth the ſuperſtition of the people.

gods, follow you them. When Elias perceiued that the people replied nothing hereunto, hee G prayed them (in confirmation of that infinite and distinct power of God from that of strange gods) that whereas he was but one onely Prophet of the true GOD at that time present, and the other were foure hundred that worshipped the false; that he might take an Oxe and kill the same, and lay it vpon wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the sacrifice; and that they also might doe the like, and call vpon their gods, and beseech them to send downe fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they should doe and confirme the same by miracle, that then the true nature of their gods should be knowne.

This counsell of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false Prophets first of all to chuse themselues an Oxe, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call vpon the assistant of their gods: and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and inuocation was of no force; Elias began to mock them, saying, Why call you not out vpon your gods with a loud H voice? for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleepe. Whilst thus they had inuocated from the morning vntill mid-day (cutting themselues with kniues and launcers, according to the custome of their countrey) Elias that was to make his sacrifice, commanded the false Prophets to stand aside, willing the people to draw neere vnto him, and obserue, for feare least secretly he should conuey fire vnder the wood. When the people were approched, he tooke 12. stones, according to the number of the 12. tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deepe trench round about the same; and afterwards heaping wood vpon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commanded them to fill foure tunnes with fountaine water, and to poure it vpon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receiue and drinke vp the water. Which done, he began to pray and call vpon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power I vnto his people, who had so long time run astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heauen vpon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried vp. Which when the Israelites beheld they fell downe on their faces vpon the earth, adoring one onely God: confessing him to be the most mighty and only true God, and auowing that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an euill and truthlesse opinion; and laying hands themselues vpon their false Prophets, they slew them by the commandement of Elias. He willed the king also to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him raine; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him downe on the earth, leaning his head vpon his knees: whilest thus he sate, he commanded his seruant also to get vp vpon a certaine rock, and to looke towards the sea, and to tell him if he saw any K cloudes arise in any part (for til that time the ayre had bin alwaies cleere.) His seruant hauing often ascended the rocke, and returned him answer that he saw nothing: at length mounting vp the seauenth time, in descending he returned him this newes; that he saw some blacke appearance in the ayre, not much vnlike to a mans footstep. When Elias vnderstood this, he sent vnto Achab, wishing him to retire himselfe within the Citie before the raine fell: who had no sooner recouered the citie of Iezrael, but that the ayre was presently clouded and couered with a shower, and a vehement wind intermixed with raine fell vpon the earth, and the Prophet seised by the Spirit of God, ranne with the kings chariot as far as Iezrael a citie of Asser. When Iezebel, Achabs wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slaine her prophets, she was sore displeased, and sent messengers vnto him, threatning him in like sort to reuenge her selfe on him, L as he had slaine her prophets. Which for that Elias feared, he fled into the citie of Bersabe, which is vpon the borders of the tribe of Iuda, bounding vpon Idumæa: in which place he left his seruant, and retired himselfe into the desart: where, whilest he praied God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was no better then others, for which cause he should desire to liue after them; he fell asleepe vnder a certaine tree, and after that some one had awaked him, he arose and found bread and water ready prepared by him. When as therefore he had eaten and was recomforted, he went vnto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses receiued the lawes from God) where finding out a hollow caue, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certaine voice which spake vnto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he M remained in that place, and forsooke the citie; He answered, for that he had slaine the prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cause he was sought for by the kings wife, that he might be done to death. The voice replied againe, and commanded him to shew himselfe openly, assuring him that he should vnderstand that which it behoued him to performe.

Hereupon,

A Hereupon as ſoone as it was day, hee forſooke the caue, hee heard an earthquake, and ſaw a light: and after all things were appeaſed, the heauenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he ſhould in no waies be diſcomforted with that which he ſaw: for that no one of his enemies ſhould haue power to hurt him; charging him to returne vnto his houſe, to the intent to proclaime Iehu the ſon of Nimſi King of the people, and Azael of Damaſco King of the Syrians; certifying him that in his place, Elizeus of the citie of Abela ſhould be Prophet; and that the wicked people ſhould be deſtroied, the one by Azael, and the other by Iehu. When Elias had heard theſe things, hee returned into the countrey of the Hebrewes, and met Elizeus the ſon of Saphat at the cart, and with him diuers others driuing before them twelue couple of oxen: him did he approach, and caſt vpon him his garment, who inſtantly began thereupon to prophetize, ſo that forſaking his oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required hee him, that before his departure, hee B might take leaue of his parents; which licence when he had obtained, he committed them vnto God and followed Elias, attending on him during all the terme of his life like his diſciple and ſeruant. This iſſue had the affaires of this ſo excellent a Prophet. But a certaine Citizen called Naboth of the Citie of Azar, had a vineyard neere vnto the lands of Achab, who required him that hee would ſell him the ſame, at what price he thought conuenient at his owne election, to the intent he might annexe the ſame to his owne lands, and make them all but one poſſeſſion: wiſhing him, that if hee would not ſell it him for ſiluer, to chooſe in exchange thereof, any one field of his that beſt liked him. Naboth anſwered him, that he would not doe it, but that hee intended to gather the fruit of his owne land himſelfe, which he had receiued as an inheritance from his father. The King no leſſe tormented then if he had loſt his owne inheritance (in that hee might not bee C maſter of an other mans patrimony) would neither waſh nor receiue any ſuſtenance. For which cauſe Iezabel his wife queſtioned with him as touching the cauſe of his diſcontent, and how it came to paſſe that he neither waſht, din'd, nor ſupt: who told her of Naboths rude behauiour, and how hauing vſed all iuſt and reaſonable compoſition vnto him, in abaſing himſelfe more then his royall authority permitted, hee had beene outraged by him, in that hee obtained not the thing which hee requeſted at his hands. Hereupon Iezabel willed him to bee of good cheere, aduiſing him, that diſmiſſing his diſpleaſure hee ſhould continue his ordinarie entertainment, becauſe ſhee her ſelfe would take vpon her to reuenge him on Naboth. Wherupon ſhe preſently ſent letters in Achabs name to the gouernours of the countrey, whereby ſhee enioyned them to celebrate a faſt, and to aſſemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth ſhould haue a ſeate prepared D for him, by reaſon of his birth and nobilitie; willing them afterwards, that ſuborning three impudent and falſe witneſſes to depoſe againſt him, that he had blaſphemed againſt God and the king: they ſhould by this meanes and for this occaſion, cauſe him to be ſtoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed, according as the Queene had written, and Naboth (conuinced by falſe witneſſe, for ſcandalizing both God and the King) was ſtoned by the people and put to death. When Iezabel had tidings hereof, ſhe repaired to the Kings preſence, and told him that he ſhould enioy Naboths vineyard, and diſburſe nothing for the ſame.

But God diſpleaſed with this her wickedneſſe, ſent the Prophet Elias purpoſely to meete with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him that hee iniuſtly poſſeſſed the lawfull inheritance of a legitimate heire, whom he had done to death. As ſoone as the king perceiued that he came vn- E to him, ſuppoſing it to be vnſeemely for a king to be reproued, he firſt of all confeſſed the fault, and offered him to make reſtitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretell him that in the ſame place where Naboths carcaſſe was conſumed by dogs, that both his and his Queenes blood ſhould be ſhed, and that all his race ſhould be deſtroyed, for that they durſt commit ſuch an impietie, and ſo wickedly ſlaughter (againſt all law) ſo good and guiltleſſe a Citizen. At length Achab vpon theſe words was ſeized with diſpleaſure, and repented for the offence hee had committed: ſo that apparelling himſelfe in ſackcloth, and walking barefoote, hee taſted not any meate, but confeſſed his ſinnes, vnder hope to appeaſe Gods wrath. For which cauſe God certified him by the Prophet, that during his life time the puniſhment of his race ſhould be deferred, becauſe hee had repented him of his miſdeeds: but that the threats and menaces ſhould take F effect in his ſonnes time; all which Elias ſignified vnto the King.

ADAD King of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two seuerall times with ACHAB, and is ouerthrowne by him.

3 Reg 20. Adads warre against Achab

WHILEST Achabs affaires were after this manner disposed, the sonne of Adad (that raigned ouer the Syrians, and those of Damasco) assembled the forces of his whole countrey, and associated with himselfe two and thirty other Kings, with whom hee came and made warre against Achab. Who beeing farre inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battell, but closing vp his souldiers in his strongest Cities, hee himselfe retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very strong wall, and generally very hard to be surprised.) For which cause the Syrian (taking his army with him) resorted to Samaria, and H encamping before the same, intended to scale and batter the Citie. But first of all hee sent a Herault to Achab, to require him to giue audience to his embassadours which hee would send vnto him, by whom he should be certified what his resolution was. As soone as the King of Israel had granted them free accesse, the embassadours came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife should be at Adads command: which if hee would confesse, and suffer him to seize so many of them as best liked him, hee would leuie the siege and batter the Citie no more. Achab gaue the embassadours commission to certifie the King of Syria, that both himselfe, and all whatsoeuer was his, was at his command. Vpon which answer the King sent a second message vnto Achab, enioyning him the next day to admit such of his seruants as hee should send vnto him, to search his royall palace, and the houses of his friends and kinsmen, I and take from thence that which was best liking, and in greatest estimate with them, and leaue the rest with him whereof they made least reckoning.

The Syrians embassage to Achab.

Achab amazed at this second embassage of the King of Syria, assembled his people, and certified them, that he was ready to deliuer vp into the enemies hands his wiues and children, for their safetie and repose; and to abandon all that likewise which was in his possession (for that the Syrian had demanded no lesse at his hands in his first embassage: But that now he required that his seruants might be admitted to ransacke all their houses, to the end they may leaue nothing therin that was worthy regard; willing by this meanes to take a pretext of making warre, knowing well (said he) that I will spare nothing that is mine for your safety. At this present he proffereth and seeketh occasion of hostility, proposing vnto you a thing, which is vnpleasing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithstanding, I will doe whatsoeuer you shall thinke good of. To this the K people answered, that they could not endure that any of his demands should bee listned vnto, or respected; but that the King should prepare for warre. Whereupon he called for the embassadors and dismissed them with this answer, That they should report vnto their Master, that Achab persisted in those things, which of all were required by him (because he had a desire of the conseruation of his subiects:) but as touching his second demand, that hee would no waies condescend thereunto: and thus sent he them away. When Adad heard this answer, he was sore mooued and sent vnto Achab the third time, threatning him that his souldiers should make a bulwarke more high then the walles (hee so much trusted in) yea though onely each of them should bring but a handfull of earth, with them (which boast hee vsed towards him to terrifie him, and to expresse thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppose against him.) But Achab answered, that L he ought not to glory in his army, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battell. When the embassadors were returned backe, they found the king at dinner with 32. kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achabs answer. Hereupon Adad gaue commandement to begirt the Citie with Pallisadoes, and to raise bulwarks of earth, and busily to intend the siege. Whilest these things were in hand, Achab was grieuously troubled, and all the people with him: but at length hee grew confident, and cast off all his feare, through the arriuall of a certaine Prophet, who said vnto him, that God promised to deliuer all those thousands of souldiers, and his boastfull enemies which he beheld, into his hands. The same Prophet being afterwards demanded by him, by whose meanes this victory might be gained? Hee said, that it should bee by the M sonnes of the gouernours, whom the king himselfe should lead forth, by reason of their vnexperience. Achab therefore calling vnto him the gouernours sonnes, found that their number amounted to two hundreth thirty and two: and hauing notice that the Syrians intended nought else but pleasure and banquetting, hee opened the Citie gates, and sent these yong men out against them. Now when the sentinels of the aduerse part had discouerd them, they certified Adad there-

Now had Achab within the City arraunged another army, and kept them in a readines. When as therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard, and ſlaine a great number of them, and had purſued the reſt euen vnto their owne camp; Achab ſpying his preſent victory and aduantage, cauſed his whole army to breake foorth; who giuing an vnexpected charge vpon the enemies, diſcomfited the Syrians (who little expected for ſuch a ſtratageme from the Hebrewes) and aſſailed them diſarmed and drunken: ſo that they left both armour and weapon behind them; and fled from their campe; and their king likewiſe was ſo hotly purſued, that he ſcarcely had opportunity to ſaue himſelfe by the ſwiftnes of his horſe. Achab B made a long chace in following the Syrians and ſlaughtering them that fled: hee ſpoiled their campe likewiſe; and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantity of gold and ſiluer. Hee tooke Adads charriots and horſes alſo, and with them returned backe into the city.

Achabs victory againſt the Syrians.

But whereas by the aduice of the ſaid Prophet, he was perſwaded to prepare and keepe an army in readines againſt the next yeere (for that the Syrians was like, nay rather reſolued to charge him againe) the King intermitted no preparation that concerned the warre. For Adad (beeing eſcaped from the fight with thoſe few forces that remained after the battell) conſulted with his friends, how hee might warre againſt the Iſraelites. Who aduiſed him from thenceforth neuer more to fight with thē in mountainous places, for that their God was powerfull vpon the mountaines, and for that cauſe they had beene ouercome by them: but if he fought with them in the C Plaine, both he and his ſhould bee aſſured to haue their vpper hand. Moreouer they counſelled him, that he ſhould diſmiſſe thoſe kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might returne into his owne countrey, and that in their ſtead he ſhould retaine their forces, ouer which he ſhould ordaine Chiefetaines; beſides (to ſupply their places that were loſt) they aduiſed him to leuy horſmen and chariots through al his country. Adad ſuppoſing that they had diſcreetly counſelled him in this matter, ordered and leuied his army according as they had aduiſed him. And as ſoone as the ſpring-time was come, he aſſembled his army, & led them forth againſt the Iſraelites; and arriuing neere vnto the city of Aphec, he incamped in a plaine field. But Achab with his forces (marching out to meet with him) pitched his tents and arraunged his battell neer vnto him (although he were far inferior both in force and number.) To him the prophet D appeared anew, telling him that God would once more haue the victory, to make it knowne that his power was not onely in the mountaines (as the Syrians perſwaded themſelues) but in the Plaines alſo. Thus continued both the armies, oppoſed and encamped the one againſt the other, for the ſpace of ſixe daies. On the ſeuenth, when the enemy forſooke their trenches early in the morning, and placed themſelues in battell ray; Achab drew out his army and affronted them, and preſently charged them: where after a long and dangerous fight betweene them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them ſlaine in the chace. For ſome of them were intangled with their owne charriots, otherſome ſlew one another pell-mell; and ſome few of them found the meanes to flie vnto their city of Aphec, who periſhed likewiſe to the number of ſeuen and twenty thouſand (beeing ſlaine by the ruine of the walles that fell vpon them) beſides one hundreth E thouſand men that gaue vp the ghoſt in that fight. But Adad attended by ſome of his faithfull friends, went and hid himſelfe in a certaine caue vnder the ground: who proteſting vnto him, and concluding amongſt themſelues, that the kings of Iſrael were curteous and mercifull, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of ſuppliants they might be attired and ſent vnto him) Adad permitted them: Whereupon they incontinently preſented themſelues to Achab cloathed in ſackecloath, and hauing their necks wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of ſuppliants amongſt the Syrians) telling him that Adad beſought his maieſty to grant him his life; promiſing on his behalfe, that from thencefoorth hee would alwaies continue his ſeruant, and acknowledge his fauour. Achab anſwered them, that highly contented him that their king was as yet aliue, and had eſcaped from the fury of the fight, offering him by them F that good will and honour, which one brother ought to ſhew vnto another. After this they drew an oath from Achab, that he ſhould offer him no wrong, if ſo be he diſcouered himſelfe vnto him, & withall preſently reſorted vnto Adad; whom they drew out of the place where he was hidden, and afterwards brought him vnto Achab, who was mounted vpon a charriot. Adad proſtrated himſelfe before him: but Achab ſtretching out his hand made him incontinently mount vp with him into his charriot, and kiſſed him, willing him to bee of good courage, aſſuring him that hee ſhould receiue neither iniurie nor iniuſtice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gaue him thanks, proteſting testing that during his life time he would neuer be forgetful of his fauours: promising him more- G

ouer to restore vnto him those cities which his predecessors, kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gaue him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as before time his ancestors had the credit to repaire vnto Samaria.) When these accords were made and confirmed by oath, Achab gaue him many worthy presents, and sent him backe into his kingdome. Thus ended the war betwixt Adad and the king of the Israelites. After this a certen prophet called Micheas came vnto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him vpon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, he prophecied vnto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods commandement, he should meet with a Lion, which should rent him in pieces. Which comming to passe, according as it was foretold, the Prophet addressed himselfe againe vnto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound vp the wound & came H vnto the king, telling him that he had bin in warre, and had receiued a prisoner in charge from his Captains hands: and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) he feared least he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he had threatned no lesse. Achab answered him, that he was iustly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discouered his head, and made it knowne who he was. And to this intent vsed the Prophet this policy, that his words might be of greater force and value. For he told the king that God would bend himselfe against him, because he had permitted the blasphemer Adad to depart vnpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slaine by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to bee slaughtered by the Syrian army. The king displeased with the liberty and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison: and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home vnto his house. Of IOSAPHAT King of Ierusalem.

The yeere of the world, 3042. before Christs Natiuitie, 924.

HITHERTO haue we spoken of Achabs estate: but now I must return vnto Iosaphat king of Ierusalem; who hauing inlarged his kingdome, & planted garrisons in those cities that were subiect vnto him (and in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Ieroboam raigned ouer the ten tribes. This king had perpetuall assistance and fauor at Gods hands, in that he was a iust and vertuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more, then how he might please and honor God. The kings his neigh- K bors round about him honored him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent. In the third yeere of his raigne he assembled the gouernours and priests of his country, enioyning them to ride their circuit about the prouinces, and to teach the inhabitants of euery city the law of Moses, training them vp in the obseruance thereof, aud in the study of pietie. Which all the Citizens embraced and entertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and striue the one with the other, which of them should exceede the rest in the seruice of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loued Iosaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him euery yeere with sixe hundreth and threescore lambes, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of L war and armes against the enemy. He mustered in the tribe of Iuda three hundred thousand men, ouer whom he placed Edraus Generall, & two hundred thousand vnder the conduct of Iohanan. Who besides these had two hundred thousand Archers on foote of the tribe of Beniamin. Another Chieftaine called Ochobat leuied and led for the king one hundred and fourescore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which hee sent into defenced cities.) Hee married his sonne Ioram to Athalia the daughter of Achab king of the ten tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab receiued him very curteously, and magnificently entertained his army with bread, wine, and flesh in all aboundance; requiring him to yeeld him his assistance against the king of Syria, to the intent he might recouer the city of Ramath in the country of Galaad, which M Adads father had wonne and conquered from his father. Iosaphat promised to assist him: and being no waies inferiour vnto him in force, hee sent his army from Ierusalem to Samaria. When these two kings were departed out of the city, and each of them were seated vpon their thrones, they distributed their pay to euery one of their souldiers. At that time Iosaphat commanded, that if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to giue notice

CHAP. X.

ACHAB fighteth against the Syrians, and is ouercome and slaine in the battell.

B HEREVPON Achab called for the Prophets (who were in number foure hundreth) and commanded them to enquire of God whether hee would giue him the victory in that battell which he enterprised against Adad or no, and whether he should recouer the Citie which hee intended to besiege? Who answered and counselled him to hazzard the battell in that he should haue the vpper hand ouer the Syrian, and should take him prisoner as he had done before time. Iosaphat vnderstanding by their words that they were false Prophets, asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certifie him of that which might succeed. Achab answered, that he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him because he prophecied nought else but mishap and misery vnto him, and had foretold him that if he should fight against the Syrian, he should be ouercome and slaine; and for that cause he held him at that time in prison, signifying vnto him that his name was Micheas the sonne of Imlah. Iosaphat required C that he might be brought into his presence (which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, that all the other prophets had prophecied to the king victory.) But Micheas told him that it was not lawfull for him to lie against God, but that it concerned him to speake that which God should informe him of, concerning the king. As soone as he came before Achab, and was adiured to speake the truth, he said that God had shewed him the Israelites put to flight, and dispersed by the Syrians, that pursued them no otherwise then sheepe without their shepheard. All which signified (he said) no lesse (said hee) but that the rest of the people returning home in safetie, Achab onely should be slaine in the battell. When Micheas had spoken after this manner; Achab turning himselfe towards Iosaphat, said vnto him, I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas constantly auowed, that he prophecied D nothing but that which God had commanded him to speake, assuring Achab that he was sollicited by the false prophets vnto warre vnder hope of victory, whereas he should assuredly perish in the battell. These words of his made Achab much discomforted. But Sedechias one of the false prophets stepped forth, and exhorted him to set light by Micheas words, the rather for that hee spake vntruely. And in confirmation of this his allegation hee alleadged Elias, who was a farre more skilfull Prophet in foretelling things to come, then Micheas was) yet that the same Elias had foretold that the dogs should licke Achabs bloud in the citie of Iezarel in the field of Naboth, because Naboth had beene stoned to death by the instance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifestly, that since he contradicted a Prophet so excellent as he was, he lyed in saying that the king should die within three daies. Moreouer (said he) it shall appeare whether he be truely sent from E God or no, if as soone as he shall receiue a buffet from me, he cause my hand to wither, according as Iadon made Ieroboams hand shrinke, at such time as he thought to apprehend him. For I thinke (said he) O King, that thou art assuredly informed hereof: which said, hee strooke him, and for that no inconuenient fell vpon him, by reason of that his audacious attempt, Achab assured himselfe, and recouered his courage, and forwardly set forth against the Assyrian army. For as it is to be supposed, the will of God was of such power, that it caused the false prophets to triumph ouer the true: which was the cause that the false prophets were trusted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained will might be fulfilled. But Sedechias made him yron hornes, and said vnto Achab, that God by them signified vnto him that he should ruinate all Syria. But Micheas prophecied to the contrary, that within very few daies Sedechias should walke from caue to caue F to hide himselfe, and auoide the punishment of his falshood. Achab displeased hereat, commanded that he should be led thence, and kept prisoner with Achmon the Gouernour of the citie, yeelding him no other allowance but bread and water for his sustenance. Thus marched these two kings with their armies against Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the king of Syria vnderstood, he drew his army into the field, and came out to meete with them, and incamped neere vnto Ramath. Now was it concluded betwixt these two confederate Kings, that Achab should enter the battell in a priuate habite, and Iosaphat should bee inuested with the royall ornaments, and supply

As ſoone as charge was giuen, the Syrians perceiuing Ioſaphat in the front of the army, and coniecturing that it was Achab, they made head altogether againſt him, and hauing inuironed and preſſed him very neerely, they perceiued that it was not he: for which cauſe they retyred backe againe. But although they had fought from the morning vntill the euening, and had the vpper hand; yet ſlew they no man (becauſe they ſought after no other but Achab to put him to the ſword (whom notwithſtanding they could by no meanes meete withall. At length one of Adads ſeruants called Aman, ſhot at random amongſt the enemies, and by fortune hurt Achab in the breaſt, and ſhot him thorow the lungs. This hurt of his concealed he from his ſouldiers, for feare leaſt they ſhould be diſcomforted. For which cauſe he commanded his coachman to driue his charriot out of the battell, for that he felt himſelfe grieuouſly and mortally wounded: and although he were terribly pained, yet ſat he in his chariot vntill ſunne-ſet; at which time his heart failed him, and he gaue vp the ghoſt. When night came, the Syrian army withdrew themſelues into their campe: and receiuing tidings by an Herault, that Achab was dead, euery one retired home vnto his houſe: but Achabs body was conueyed to Samaria, and interred in that place. As for his charriot, it was waſhed in the fountaine of Iezrael, becauſe it had beene bebloodied, by reaſon of the kings hurt: whereby the truth of Elias prediction was ratified, and confirmed: for the dogs lickt his blood; and from that time forward the common women continually waſhed themſelues in that fountaine. He died alſo in Ramath (according as Micheas had foreprophecied.) Whereas therefore all things befortuned Achab, according as two Prophets had foretold him, it appeareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Maieſtie of God in all places, and to reuerence his prophecies deliuered by them, and to aſcribe alwaies more credit vnto them, then to the vaine and plauſible ſpeech of ſuch as curry fauour; and no leſſe to reſpect them, then things of infinite profit, ſince by them we are diuinely admoniſhed what we ought to take heed of. It behoooueth vs alſo to conſider what force the ordinance of God is of, by examining thoſe things which befell Achab. For it is impoſſible to auoide the preordinance of God, notwithſtanding that men flatter and nouriſh themſelues with vaine hopes, which inueigle them ſo farre, that finally they are ouertaken in the ſnares thereof. For this careleſſe inconſideration was fatall to king Achab, in that he beleeued not his death which was foretold him; but being deceiued by the flattering perſwaſions of falſe Prophets, ran headlong vpon his owne danger and death. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Ochozias. H I K

CHAP. I.

IORAM ACHABS ſonne, ouercommeth the Moabites in battell.

C AS ſoone as King Ioſaphat was returned backe againe to Ieruſalem (from the warre wherein he had giuen ſuccour to Achab againſt Adad the king of Syria, as we haue heretofore declared) the Prophet Iehu (in his returne) came forth and met him, and reproued him becauſe he had giuen Achab (who had bin a man both impious and wicked) his aſſiſtance, aſſuring him that God was diſpleaſed with that his confederacy; yet notwithſtanding that he of his goodneſſe had deliuered him from his enemies, although contrary vnto his dutie, he had demeaned himſelfe vniuſtly. After this admonition, Ioſaphat began to celebrate ſacrifices, and to offer vp thankeſgiuings and peace offerings vnto God: Which done, he rode in progreſſe and circuit round about thoſe countries that were vnder his dominion, giuing order that the people ſhould be inſtructed in thoſe ordinances which were deliuered from God by the hands of Moſes, and exhorted his ſubiects to the practiſe of pietie, contained in the ſame. He planted iudges likewiſe in euery city, commanding them to execute iuſtice vnto the people, without reſpect of any thing, but onely iuſtice. He charged them likewiſe, that they ſhould not be corrupted with rewards, or ſeduced by dignitie, riches, or nobilitie, but that they ſhould doe iuſtice
D indifferently vnto all men, knowing that God ſeeth all things, how ſecretly ſoeuer they be carried or contriued. Hauing in this ſort ordered euery thing in each Citie of the two Tribes, he returned againe into Ieruſalem, where he likewiſe choſe iudges from amongſt the Prieſts and Leuites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to giue vpright and exact iudgement. And if they of other cities had any cauſes of greater conſequence (which ſhould be referred to their finall determination) he charged them with earneſt induſtrie, to decide them with as vpright and iuſt meaſure as might be: for that it was very conuenient that the moſt exact and accompliſhed ſentences ſhould be deliuered in that citie, where as God had his temple, and the King made his ordinarie aboad. Ouer all theſe he placed his two friends, Amaſias the Prieſt, and Zabadias of the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did the King diſpoſe of his eſtate.

Iehu the Prophet reprehended Ioſaphat for helping Achab.

Ioſaphat reneweth the true ſeruice of God.

Ioſaphat placed iudges and Magiſtrates in euery citie.

E About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) aſſaulted and aſſembled themſelues againſt him, and encamped themſelues neere vnto Engaddi (a Citie ſituate neere vnto the lake Aſphaltites, and diſtant from Ieruſalem ſome three hundreth ſtounds) in which place flouriſh thoſe goodly and holeſome Palme-trees, whence diſtilleth the pure and perfect liquor of Balme. When Ioſaphat had intelligence that the enemies had paſt the lake, and were already farre entred into his countrey, he was afraid, and aſſembled the people of Ieruſalem in the temple, and ſtanding vpright, and turning his face toward the propitiatorie, he beſought and requeſted God that he would giue him power and force to ouercome his enemies. For ſuch had beene the forme of their ſupplication, who in times
F paſt builded the temple: namely, that it might pleaſe him to fight for that Citie, and oppoſe himſelfe againſt thoſe that durſt attempt or aſſault that place, to the intent to diſpoſſeſſe them of that country which he himſelfe had giuen them in poſſeſſion; and in pronouncing this praier he wept: and all the people likewiſe both men, women and children made their requeſts vnto God. Preſently vpon this, a certaine Prophet called Iaziel aroſe vp in the midſt of the congregation, and cried out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their praiers, and promiſed them to fight for them againſt their enemies, enioyning them the next day to ſally out in armes, and go & make head againſt their aduerſaries, whom they ſhould encounter in the mountaine taine ſituate betwixt Ieruſalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillocke of Sis (which place in Hebrew ſignifieth Eminency) willing them not to fight againſt them, but onely to arreſt in that place, and ſee how GOD would fight and make warre for them. When the Prophet had ſpoken theſe words, the king and all the people proſtrated themſelues vpon their faces, giuing thanks vnto God and adoring: meane while the Leuites ſung continuall hymnes, with inſtruments and voices. About the beginning of the day, the king departed into the deſart that is vnder the city of Thecoa, aduiſing the people to beleeue al that which the Prophet had ſaid vnto them, and not to arrange themſelues in battell ray: hee commanded the Prieſts to march before them with their trumpets, and the Leuites that they ſhould ſing hymnes and thankſgiuing vnto God, as if (ſaid he) our countrey were already deliuered from our enemies. G

The manner and weapons wherby Ioſaphat ouercame his enemies.

This aduiſe of the kings ſeemed pleaſing vnto them all; ſo that they performed whatſoeuer he counſelled them. But God ſent a great terror & diſorder among the Barbarians: ſo that ſuppoſing themſelues to be enemies the one againſt the other, they ſlew one another in ſuch ſort, that of ſo great and huge an hoſt, there was not one that eſcaped. But Ioſaphat looking downe into the vally (wherin the enemies had pitcht their tents) and ſeeing it full of dead men, reioyced greatly at the vnexpected ſuccors that God had ſent him, who had giuen them the victory, not by the dint of their owne ſwords, but by his prouidence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies camp, and to ſpoile the dead; and ſo great was the multitude of them that were ſlaine, that ſcarcely they could gather the ſpoiles of them in three daies ſpace. On the fourth day, the people aſſembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they bleſſed God for the power and ſuccours he had ſent them, by reaſon whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the king led backe his army into Ieruſalem, and for diuers daies hee ſpent the time in offering ſacrifices and making feaſts. After this diſcomfiture of his enemies was publiſhed abroad in the eares of forraine nations, they were all of them afraid, ſuppoſing that God did manifeſtly expreſſe his power, and extend his fauour towards him. And from that time forwards, Ioſaphat liued in great glory, in iuſtice, and piety. He likewiſe was a friend to the king of Iſrael that raigned at that time, who was Achabs ſon, with whom he aduentured in a voyage by ſea, intending to traffique with certaine Merchants of Tharſis, but he had a great loſſe: for his ſhips were caſt away by reaſon they were ouer-great; and for this cauſe hee had neuer more minde to exerciſe nauigation. Hitherto haue we ſpoken of Ioſaphat king of Ieruſalem. H

Ochozias Achabs ſonne king of Iſrael.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs ſonne, who raigned ouer Iſrael, and was reſident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and reſembled his father and mother euery way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Ieroboam in wickednes, who firſt fell from God, and made the Iſraelites reuolt from him. The tenth yeere of his raigne, the king of the Moabites rebelled againſt him, and denied to pay him thoſe tributes which he was wont to pay vnto Achab his father. But it came to paſſe, that as Ochozias aſcended the ſtaires of his palace, he fell downe from the top thereof: and being ſick of the fall, he ſent to Accaron vnto the God called the Myiodis or flie, to enquire whither he ſhould recouer that ſickneſſe or no. But the God of the Hebrewes appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to goe and meet thoſe meſſengers that were ſent by Ochozias, and to aske them if the people of the Iſraelites had not a God, but that the king ſent to forraine gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to returne and declare vnto their king, that he ſhould not eſcape that ſickneſſe. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the meſſengers of the king hauing vnderſtood that which was declared vnto them, returned backe againe with all expedition vnto him. 4. Reg. 1.

Ochozias hauing a grieuous fall, ſeeketh to be informed of a falſe Oracle, and is reproued by Elias.

Ochozias maruailing much at their ſuddaine repaire, asked them the cauſe thereof: who anſwered him, that a certaine man came vnto them, who forbad them to paſſe any further, but to ſhorten their way to let your Maieſtie know (ſaid they) from God, that your ſicknes ſhall waxe worſe and worſe. Hereupon the king commanded them to deſcribe what manner of man he was that ſpake theſe words vnto them: who anſwered, that he was a hairy man, girded with a leatherne belt. And vnderſtanding hereby that it was Elias, he ſent a captaine with fiftie ſoldiers vnto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet priſoner vnto him. This captaine that was ſent, perceiuing Elias ſitting on the top of a mountaine, commanded him to come downe and repaire vnto the king, who had ſent for him; which if he performed not preſently and willingly, he threatned him to make him doe it perforce. Elias anſwered and ſaid vnto him: To the end thou maiſt know by thine owne experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heauen, and conſume both thee and thy ſouldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell downe from heauen, and conſumed both the captaine and his ſouldiers. M

A When the king had tidings of this losse, he was sore displeased, and sent another captaine to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatned the Prophet that if he wold not willingly come downe, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias prayed that fire might fall from heauen, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had vnderstanding likewise how his second messengers had sped, he sent a third vnto him, who being a discreet man, and curteous in condition, arriuing in the place where by chance Elias was, he saluted him very curteously, and said vnto him, that contrarie to his owne will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the kings pleasure, he was come vnto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command: He therefore required him to haue compassion both of him and of his souldiers, and to vouchsafe to come downe, and to come after them vnto the king. Elias tooke pleasure in this his discreet and curteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as he came before the kings pre-

B sence, he prophecied, and told him that God said, that sith he had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had beene no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sickenesse; but that he had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the successe of his sickenesse: Know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophecie) he died in such manner as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Ioram succeeded him in the kingdome, because he departed without issue.

Ochozias dying without issue, Ioram his brother raigned in his steade.

This Ioram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the seruice of the true God, he restored strange gods. In all things else he was a man of execution. In his time Elias was no more seene amongst men, and vntill this day no man knoweth what his end was. But

C he left a disciple behind him called Elizeus (as we haue heretofore declared.) It is written in holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath knowne of their deaths. After that Ioram had taken possession of the kingdome, he resolued to make war vpon Misa the king of the Moabites (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheepe bearing wooll.) When as therefore he had assembled his forces, he sent vnto Iosaphat, requiring him that sith he had beene his fathers friend, he would likewise second and send him aide in his intended warre against the Moabites, who had as then newly reuolted from his gouernment. Iosaphat not onely promised him to yeeld him succours, but moreouer he assured him that he would draw the king of Idumæa (who was his subiect) into their association. Now when they had marched some seauen daies iourney, they found a great scarcity of water amongst them, both to water their horses, and to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especiall Ioram, who by reason of the necessity wherewith hee was pressed, cried vnto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his hee would betray three such kings as were there present, into the hands of the king of Moab without

But Iosaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the armie to know whether there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battell, to the intent (said he) that we may vnderstand by God what we ought to doe: and whereas one of the seruants of Ioram said, that he had seene Elizeus the sonne of Saphat, the disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the sollicitation of Iosaphat) resorted vnto him. Now when they drew neere vnto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the army? and Ioram in especiall questioned with him. F that he would prophecie, and continue the preseruation of the army, and the defence of his life: but Elizeus sware by the liuing GOD, that hee would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an vpright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling vnto them a certaine man that could cunningly play vpon instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilst he sung, Elizeus was rauished with a diuine spirit, and enioyned the Kings to make certaine trenches in the channell of the riuer: for (said hee) you shall see the riuer full of water without either winde, cloud, or raine: so that both the whole Armie and all their Cattell shall be saued, the vpper hand of your enemies also; and you shall surprise the faireſt and strongeſt Cities of the Moabites; and you shall cut downe their trees, ruinate their countrey, and fill vp their fountaines and riuers. When the Prophet had spoken thus, the next day before sunne rise the riuer flowed aboundantly with water: for some three daies iourney off, God had suffered a very strong and set-led raine to fall in Idumæa; so that both the souldiers and their horses were sufficiently refreshed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three kings came out against them, and tooke their way thorow the desart, their king presently assembled his armie, and commanded another, and that the riuer flowed with their blood. Being in this sort seduced with this imagination, they besought the king to giue them leaue to gather their enemies spoiles: which when they had obtained, they altogether considerately marched forth as if to a prey alreadie prepared for them, and came vnto the kings campes vnder hope to finde no man to resist them. But their hope deceiued them: for their enemies enuironed them round about, and some of them were cut in peeces, the rest turned backe and fled towards their owne countrey, and the three kings en-tring into the territories of the Moabites destroyed their Cities, pillaged the champaine countrey, disfigured their inclosures, filling them with stones and mud taken out of the riuer, cut I

IORAM obtaining the kingdome of Ierusalem, slew his brothers and his fathers friends.

HE left behind him diuers children, the eldest of whom he appointed his successor in the L kingdom, who was called Ioram (as his vncle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs sonne whilome king of Israel.) The king of the ten tribes turning backe vnto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whose actions I will here recite, because they are no-

tures. Obedias wife (who was sometime steward of Achabs house) came vnto him & told him, that he was not ignorant that in that persecution wherein Iezabel sought to murther the Prophets, how her husband saued one hundreth of them, for whose priuate maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men; and that now being dead, his creditors stroue to draw both her & her children into seruitude. For which cause she besought him in consideration of this act, to haue compassion on her husband, and to yeeld her some succour. Hereon Elizeus asked her if she had M earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow diuers emptie (vessels of her neighbour: that done, he willed her to locke vp her doores, and to poure oyle into the vessels, in that it was Gods pleasure to fill them all. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the vessels were found full, so as none of them were emptie: whereof when she had certified the Prophet, he aduised her to goe and deliuer her oyle, and pay her debts,

By this meanes Elizeus discharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditors intended against her. He admonished Ioram likewise, by certaine messengers, that he should take heed of a certaine place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: hy meanes of which admonition the king went not out on hunting. But Adad being sore displeased, because his ambushment was discouered, began to suspect his owne followers: whereupon calling vnto him his houshold seruants, hee maliciously tearmed them traitors; and furthermore threatned them with death, for that they had discouered a matter, which was only committed to their trust, vnto his enemy. Wherupon one of the assistants told him, that he ought not to conceiue that false opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discouered his intended ambush to cut off his e-

Wherupon he sent out his souldiers with an expresse charge, to know in what City Elizeus made his ordinary aboad: who returning backe, brought him newes that he remained in Dothaim: For which cause Adad sent a great number of horsemen and chariots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the city by night, and laide watch round about the walles, that no man might escape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets seruant had notice hereof, and was aduertised that the enemies sought to surprise Elizeus, he fearefully hasted and discouered their intent to his master, who encouraged him and commanded him to shake off his feare, for that he held himself both secured and assured of Gods help: wherupon he praied God that at that present he would shew his power and assistance both

At that time God hearing his praier, presented to the Prophets seruants sight, a number of chariots, and horsemen that inuironed Elizeus; so that he laid his feare aside, and was assured when hee perceiued these succors. That done, Elizeus besought God againe that he would blind his enemies eies, and to cause a thicke cloud to fall vpon them, to the end they might not discouer him. Which done, he presently thrust himself amongst the thickest of his enemies, demanding of them whom they came to seeke for? When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed king Ioram to locke the gates and to inuiron the Syrians with his souldiers. This performed, he prayed God that he would cleere the Syrians sight, and take away the cloud that obscured their eies, who being deliuered from their blindnesse, perceiued that they were in the midst of their enemies. Whereas being sore astonied, and vncertaine whence this diuine and vnexpected act had befallen them, King Ioram asked the Prophet whether he should kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbad him to doe so: for (said he) it is a iust and conuenient matter, that they who are taken by order of warre should lose their life, but that they had done no euill vnto his countrey; but by Gods prouidence came thither without their owne knowledge: for which cause he counsailed him to giue them presents and present them meate, and afterwards to suffer them to depart without any iniurie.

E Ioram giuing credit to the Prophets words, entertayned the Syrians magnificently and with great humanity, and sent them backe vnto Adad their king, to whom vpon their arriuall they declared all that which had hapned vnto them. Adad astonished at this vnexpected euent, and wondring at the apparition and power of the God of the Israelites; lastly admiring the Prophet whom God so wondrously assisted; he concluded from that time forward, neuer more to attempt the king of Israel in secret, because he feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open warre against him, hoping to haue the vpper hand of his enemies, by meanes of the great number and force of his army: So that he issued out with a mighty power against Ioram; who supposing himselfe to be ouermatched by the Syrian army, locked himselfe vp within Samaria, putting his trust and confidence in the fortification and strength of the wals thereof. Adad hoping to surprise the

But Ioram was so destitute of conuenient supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of victuals, an Asses head was sold in Samaria for eightie pieces of siluer, and a measure of pigions doung at fiue peeces of siluer, which they vsed in stead of salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the king, then that hee feared least some one constrained by famine, should deliuer or betray the City vnto the enemy. For which cause hee euery day walked the round round about the walles,and visited the Sentinels of the city, for feare least any one should lie hid- G den within: and with al care and diligence he gaue order, that if any one had such a siniſter intent, the meanes to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certaine woman cried out vnto him. Haue mercy vpon me, O King; he incensed with wrath,and supposing that she asked him some meat,began to raile on her,telling her that he had neither grange nor presse wherby he might any waies supply her necessity.

The woman answered him,that she had no neede thereof, and that shee was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: Whereupon he commanded her to expresse and declare what shee required. Hereupon

she said,that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbor and friend, that sith the famine and scarcitie was such, as they could find no redresse for the same, that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another euery day. H
As for my selfe(said she) I haue first of all strangled mine,and we haue both of vs yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like,but breaketh the accord betwixt vs, and concealeth her child. Ioram was grieuously tormented to heare these words,and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice,and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he deuised in his heart to put him to death, because he praied not vnto God to grant him meanes to escape those euils that inuironed them round about: so that he sent a man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himselfe with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house,he told them that Ioram the murtherers son sent a man to take away his head: but(said he) when as he that hath the matter in charge shall come hither,suffer him not to enter,but make him attend and stay at the gate; for the king I will follow him,and will resort to me in his owne person,hauing altered his resolution: and they according as they were commanded,shut him out of the doores whom the king had sent. Ioram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceiued against the Prophet, and fearing least he that had the commission to murther him should speedily execute the same, hasted himselfe all that he might to hinder the slaughter,and saue Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence,he accused him,for that he had not besought God to deliuer them from those many euils which they suffered; considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnesse, they were miserably consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day(about the same houre that the king came vnto him)that he should haue so great aboundance of victuals,that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicle,and a measure of flower for a sicle.

By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, and K made no difficultie to beleeue the Prophet, because that before time they had beene ascertained by their experience of the truth of his prophecies; and the expectation of this day,was the cause that the necessitie and miserie of the present was more patiently endured. But a certaine friend of the kings,and the gouernor of the third part of his army (on whose shoulder the king at that time

" matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine down heapes of barley and floure from heaue
" uen,so cannot that which thou speakest come to passe. To whom the Prophet replied: Thou thy selfe(said he)shalt see the issue hereof,but shalt partake no part therof. Which prediction of his had a most certaine effect,according as hereafter it appeareth.

It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie should liue without L
the City walles,for feare least their conuersation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreame famine that raigned within the City)they receiued no reliefe or sustenance out of the same,& whether they had licence to returne into the City, or whether they contained themselues in their houses,they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine; decreede amongst themselues to submit themselues to the enemies mercy,to the end that if they spared them, they might liue; and if it hapned otherwise,that they might die with lesse torture. Now hauing resolued vpon this deliberation amongst themselues,they repaired by night vnto the enemies campe.

The enemies flight by reason of a terror that God sent among them.

At that time God began to terrifie and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their eares with a noise of M chariots and armes,as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspicious, and were so moued,that they forsooke their tents, and ranne vnto Adad,and told him that Ioram King of the Israelites had entertained the king of Egypt,and the king of the Iles for his confederates,whom he led out against them,& how already they had heard the noise of them that approched to bid them the battell. Adad(whose eares were filled with no lesse rumor then those of the people)

A people) was amated and amazed at their ſayings: ſo that all of them abandoned their campe, their horſes, beaſts of carriage, and riches, and betooke them to flight with diſorder & confuſion. Thoſe lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies campe (and of whom wee haue heretofore made ſome mention) being neer vnto the camp, perceiued that there was great ſilence in the ſame, and no leſſe aboundance of all things: for which cauſe approching the ſame, and entring into a tent, they found no body therein: for which cauſe they fel to eating and drinking, and that done to beare away a quantity of rayment, and gold which they hid without the campe. Afterward reſorting to another tent, they bare away likewiſe that which was therein, and did the like by foure others without any encountry or contradiction of any man: and coniecturing thereby that the enemies were retyred, they began to accuſe themſelues, becauſe they had not giuen
B notice thereof to Ioram, and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cauſe drawing neere vnto the walles of the City, they cried out vnto the watch, giuing them to vnderſtand in what eſtate they had found the enemies campe, who ſignified no leſſe to Iorams guard, ſo that at laſt it came vnto his eares. Whereupon he preſently ſent for his friends and captaines, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him ſuſpect ſome ſtratageme or ambuſh: for they (ſaid he) hauing loſt their hope to ſurpriſe vs by famine, are retired vnder an intent, that when we ſhall iſſue and fall a ſpoiling of their campe, they may come vpon vs, and kill vs; and afterwards take our city without any ſtroke ſtrooken. For which cauſe (ſaid he) I aduiſe you to keepe good guard within the City, and let this retreat of our enemies make vs the more conſiderate. Some one of his councell praiſed this aduiſe of his, and allowed his foreſight, aduiſing him to ſend out two ſcouts
C vpon horſebacke, to ſearch euery quarter betwixt that and Iordan, to the end that if they ſhould be taken and ſlaine by the enemies ambuſhment, their fall might be a preſident to the whole army to ſtand vpon their guard) for feare leaſt they ſhould be ſurpriſed in like manner:) vrging this for a concluſion, that the loſſe of two horſemen ſhould not bee very great, ſince perhaps they might otherwaies haue beene cut off by famine. This aduiſe of his was allowed by the king, and ratified by his aſſiſtants: ſo that preſently there were two ſpies ſent out, who rode along without encountring any enemy; but they met with great quantity of victuals, and armes caſt away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away the more lightly. Which when the king vnderſtood, hee ſuffered the people to iſſue out, and ſpoile the campe, who recouered things of no ſmall valew therein, but much gold and ſiluer, and troupes of all ſorts of cattell: and
D beſides that, they found ſo great a quantity of wheat and barley, that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they deliuered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was ſo great quantity of corne, that two meaſures of barley were ſold but for one ſicle, and a meaſure of wheat flower for a ſicle; according as Elizeus had prophecied. Now the meaſure which we call Sat containeth an Italian buſhell and the halfe. But the captaine of the third part of the army, was he onely that enioyed no part of this benefit: for being appointed by the king to haue the keeping of the gate, and to reſtraine the multitude from headlong preſſing out, for feare leaſt thruſting one an other, ſome of them ſhould bee troden vnder foote and ſlaine, he himſelfe was troden vpon and ſlaine (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he only amongſt the reſt, would not giue credit to that which hee had ſaid, as touching the great aboun-
E dance of victuals that ſhould happen.

When Adad King of the Syrians was ſafely returned to Damaſco, and knew that God had ſuffered ſuch a confuſion and feare to fall both on him and his army, and that it had not hapned by reaſon that the enemy ſallied out vpon him; he was ſore diſcouraged to ſee that God was ſo diſpleaſed with him, and through anguiſh and agony of minde fell ſicke: And for that (at that very time) Elizeus was come into Damaſco; Adad vnderſtanding thereof, ſent Azael (who was one of his moſt truſty ſeruants) vnto him to preſent him, and conſult with him vpon his ſickneſſe, whether he ſhould recouer or no.

Hereupon Azael loaded forty Camels with the moſt faireſt and moſt honourableſt preſents, that either Damaſco, or the Princes royall court affoorded; and repairing to Elizeus, ſaluted him very courteouſly, telling him that hee was ſent vnto him by King Adad, firſt of all to preſent
F him, and afterwards to aske counſaile of him as touching his malady, whether hee might eaſily be healed. The Prophet commanding the meſſenger to carry no euill tidings vnto the King, did notwithſtanding tell him that hee ſhould die. Azael hearing thereof was ſore grieued, and Elizeus himſelfe began to weepe, ſo that the teares fell from his eies aboundantly, in that he foreſaw how many euils the people ſhould ſuffer after the deceaſe of Adad. And when as Azael demanded him the cauſe wherefore he was ſo diſcomforted; I weepe (ſaid he) for the compaſſion that I

The King of Damasco warreth against the King of Israel.

IORAM King of Israel, hoping after the death of Adad to recouer Ramath in Galaad from the Assyrians, after he had made greater preparation and apparation for the war, he led his army against the same. In this siege he was hurt by an arrow which was shot by a certaine Syrian, but not vnto the death, and retired himselfe into the Citie of Iezrael vntill he were recouered
B of his wounds (leauing behind him his whole army at the siege of Ramath vnder the conduct of Iehu the sonne of Nimsi, who tooke the Citie by force) intending vpon his recouery to make warre against the Syrians. But the Prophet Elizeus sent one of his disciples to Ramath, and gaue him the holy oyle, and willed him to annoint Iehu, and to say vnto him that God had chosen and annointed him for King: and after hee had informed him likewise in certaine other instructions, he commanded him to depart after the manner of one that flieth, making no man priuy of his departure. When this disciple of his came vnto the appointed citie, he found Iehu sitting in the midst of the captaines at warre (according as Elizeus had told him) and drawing neere vnto him, hee told him that he would communicate certaine secrets with him, for which cause he arose and followed him into his chamber. Wherupon the yong man taking out the oile powred it on his head, C saying, that God had chosen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and reuenge the blood of the Prophets vniustly murthered by Iezabel: and that both hee and his house might bee brought to nought in like sort, as the sonnes of Ieroboam the sonne of Nabat, and the children of Basa were extinguished for their impietie; so that no one of the race of Achab might suruiue in the world. As soone as he had spoken thus, he issued out of the chamber with all speed, endeuouring that he might not be discouered by any of the army. Now when as Iehu was come out, hee returned to his place where hee sate with his captaines, who demanded of him, and besought him to declare vnto them, wherefore the yong man came vnto him (alledging that they supposed him to be out of his wits.) Truely (said he) you haue diuined well: for he hath talked vnto me after the manner of a mad man: wherein (they desirous to vnderstand wherefore he came, and beseeching him to D expresse the cause) hee told them what he had said vnto him, namely, how God had chosen him to be King ouer the people.

As soone as he had spoken these words, euery one of them cast off their garments and spred them before him, and sounding a trumpet, they proclaimed Iehu King; who assembling his army, determined to conduct them toward the Citie of Iezrael against Ioram) who lay there to recouer his wound which he had receiued at the siege of Ramath in Galaad, as wee haue heretofore declared.) Thither also was resorted in the way of friendship and consanguinitie, Ochozias King of Ierusalem, both to visite Ioram, and to see how he was recouered of his wound: for he was his nephew and sonne vnto his sister, as wee haue said before. Iehu desirous to surprise Ioram and his followers on the sodaine, made an ordinance, by which he prohibited that none of the souldiers
E should runne before to giue any intelligence of his repaire vnto Ioram; alledging that it should be a manifest demonstration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwise, they that did otherwise, declared that they held him not for their King.

IORAM with all his race is slaine by IEHV: OCHOZIAS King of Ierusalem is likewise slaine with him.

F THE men of war were very ioyfull to execute this his ordinance, and guarded the waies, to the intent that no man might secretly steale into Iezrael, and beare tidings to the inhabitants of that which had hapned. Meane while, Iehu attended by certaine of his choisest horsemen, and mounted in his owne person vpon a chariot, marched towards Iezrael. And when as he drew neere vnto the Citie, the sentinell that was appointed by Ioram to discouer those that repaired to the Citie, perceiued Iehu resorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Ioram that a troupe of horsemen were at hand. who they were; who drawing neere vnto Iehu, asked him what newes there was in the army, telling him that the King was desirous to know the same: Iehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The sentinell perceiuing this, certified Ioram that the messenger whom he had sent, trouped along with them that came, and followed their Generall. Whereupon the King set out a messenger the second time; and Iehu commanded him to attend him as he did the first: which the sentinell signified to Ioram likewise, who finally mounted his charriot to goe out to meet them, accompanied with Ochozias King of Ierusalem, who (as we haue said) was come into the citie, to see how the King recouered vpon his hurt, because hee was neerely allied vnto him. But Iehu marched on softly and in goodly array, till Ioram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did? Who in stead of answer, reuiled him bitterly, and called him the sonne of a poysoner and of a harlot. For which cause Ioram (fearing his turbulent spirit, and suspecting least he hammered vpon some sinister intent) turned his backe, and fled away as swiftly as his charriot could bee driuen; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprised by treason: but Iehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Ioram instantly fell vpon his knees, and died. Hereupon Iehu commanded Badac (who gouerned the third part of his army) to cast Iorams body into Naboths field, remembring him of the prophecie of Elias foretold by him to Achab, who murthered Naboth: namely, that hee and his race should die in that field. For sitting behind Achabs charriot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophecied. When Ioram was fallen downe, Ochozias was affraid to bee slaine: for which cause hee turned his charriot to take an other way, hoping that Iehu would not discouer him. But he was pursued and ouertaken in a certaine steepy way, and was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forsooke his charriot, and being mounted vpon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had been searched and dressed some few daies, hee deceased, and was carried to Ierusalem and buried there, after hee had raigned one yeere, and surpassed his father in wickednesse.

IEHV raigneth ouer Israel, and keepeth his court in Samaria; and after him his progeny to the fourth generation.

AT such time as Iehu arriued at Iezrael, Iezabel being on the top of a tower in her princely robes, cried out: O trusty seruant (said shee) that hath slaine his Master! Hee looking vpward, asked her what shee was, commanding her to come downe vnto him: at length he charged her Eunuches to cast her downe from the top of the tower; who in her falling bebloodied the walles: and no sooner fell she vpon the ground, but that her body was trampled vnder the horses feete, vntill shee died. That done, Iehu repaired to the palace with his friends, and reposed himselfe therein, commanding his seruants that they should bury Iezabel (in respect of the royall race from whence shee was descended) but they to whom the charge of the obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was deuoured by dogs. Iehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecie of Elias, who had foretold that Iezabel should die in that sort in Iezrael.

Now in that Achabs seuentie sonnes were brought vp in Samaria, Iehu sent two letters, the one vnto the Masters of the infants, the other to the gouernours of the Citie, giuing them to vnderstand, that they should choose one of the most vertuous amongst Achabs children, to raigne as King ouer them, because they had a multitude of strong charriots, horses, armour, men, and strong Cities; to the end that in so doing, they might take reuenge on those that slew their Lord and Master. (This did he vnder a colour to sound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the gouernours and tutors had receiued these letters, they were affraid, and made account that they could preuale nothing against him, who had preuailed already against two mightie Kings. For which cause they wrote backe vnto him, acknowledging him for their soueraigne; and offering themselues in all dutie, to bee vnder his subiection. Whereupon Iehu sent backe vnto them againe, commanding them, that (to expresse their obedience) they should send him the heads of Achabs children, diuided from their shoulders. Which command of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed vp the heads in panniers, and sent them vnto him to Iezrael. As soone as they were brought thither, tidings therof was carried to Iehu, as he sate at supper with his friends, who commanded that they should bee laid in two heapes, at the citie gates on either side thereof. Which done, he issued out as soone as it was day, to see them; and beholding them, hee began began to tell thoſe that accompanied him,that he had voluntarily armed himſelfe againſt his maſter,and ſlew him : but as touching thoſe whom they ſaw there, hee had no waies laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men ſhould know, that all that which hapned vnto Achabs race,was done by the ordinance of God,and that his houſe was deſtroyed according as Elias had foretold.And after he had ſlaine and diſpatched both theſe and all thoſe that were found to be of Achabs race amongſt the Iſraelites,he went vnto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias houſhold ſeruants (who was King of Ieruſalem) he asked them whither they went? who anſwered him,that they went to ſalute Ioram and their king Ochozias (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them ſlaine.) Hereupon Iehu commanded his ſeruants to lay hands on them, and put them to the ſword,notwithſtanding they were forty two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Ionadab (who in times paſt had beene his ancient friend,who embracing him, praiſed his forwardneſſe, in that hee had performed all things according to the will of God, in aboliſhing Achabs houſe. Iehu cauſed him to mount vp with him in his charriot,and accompany him to Samaria,telling him that hee ſhould well perceiue, that hee would ſpare no one wicked man,but would puniſh all the falſe Prophets,and tellers of lies,and abuſers of the people, who had made them forſake the true ſeruice of God, and adore ſtrange gods : becauſe the moſt laudable and allowed ſpectacle that might encounter a good mans eye,was to ſee the puniſhment of the wicked. Ionadab perſwaded by theſe words,mounted vp into his charriot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Iehu had ſought out Achabs kinred,hee put them to death : and intending that no one of his falſe prophets and prieſts,ſhould eſcape his hands,hee aſſembled them together by a ſubtill policie. For gathering the people together, he proteſted that hee would haue twiſe as many gods as Achab had had : willing that all the prieſts and miniſters that belonged vnto them,ſhould preſent themſelues,for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent ſacrifices to Achabs gods; proteſting that whatſoeuer Prieſt ſhould be abſent,hee ſhould loſe his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured,was called Baal. Hauing in this ſort aſſigned a day wherein he would offer ſacrifice,hee ſent thorow all the countrey of Iſrael,charging all Baals prieſts to repaire vnto him,and commanding that each of them might haue their veſtments giuen them.As ſoone as they were apparelled,hee reſorted to his lodging,accompanied with his friend Ionadab, and commanded that a ſearch ſhould bee made amongſt them, to eſpie whether any one of contrary quality or condition were medled with them; for that he intended that no ſtranger ſhould be amongſt the prieſts. When as therefore hee vnderſtood that none but the prieſts were in that aſſembly, euen at ſuch time as they began to offer ſacrifice, hee cauſed them to bee incloſed by foureſcore ſouldiers (whom he eſteemed to be moſt truſty) whom he cõmanded to kill the falſe prophets, and to puniſh them according to the cuſtome of their forefathers, which had already too long time beene neglected; dreadfully threatning all thoſe,who ſhould any waies intermit to roote out the name and memorie of theſe wretches out of the world. They therefore ſlew all theſe prieſts, and inuironed the Kings palace; and in ſo doing cleered Samaria of forraine gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the king of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he aſſigned prieſts, and honoured him with all ſorts of ſacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Iehu ſuffered the Iſraelites to adore golden calues. When this execution was performed in puniſhing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Iehu by his Prophet, that his children ſhould obtaine the kingdome of Iſrael to the fourth generation. ATHALIA raigned fiue yeeres in Ieruſalem : and after ſhe was ſlaine by the hie Prieſt, IOAS is proclaimed King.

Athalia Achabs daughter,hearing newes of the death of her brother Ioram,and her ſon Ochozias,together with the vtter ruine of all the royall poſterity,bethought her ſelfe to extinguiſh Dauids memory, and in ſuch ſort to root it out,that no one of that line ſhould remaine aliue to enioy the kingdome hereafter: which when ſhe had concluded in her heart,ſhe began to put it in execution. Yet notwithſtanding one of Ochozias ſonnes eſcaped her bloody hands, by this meanes that inſueth. Ochozias had a ſiſter by his fathers ſide, whoſe name was Ioſabetha, who was married to Ioiada the hie prieſt; who entring into the Kings palace, and finding Ioas at that time but one yeere of age hidden with his nurſe amongſt the dead, ſhee tooke both him and his nurſe,and locked them vp in a cloſet within the temple, where Ioiada her husband and ſhe did

About the seuenth yeere, Ioiada entred into discourse with fiue Centurions, and perswaded them to oppose themselues with mutuall consent against Athalias proceedings, and to assure the kingdome to little Ioas. Whereupon giuing and receiuing faithfull promises of secrecie the one vnto the other, they confidently addressed themselues to execute their intended purposes, after this manner: They whom the high Priest had chosen to execute this act, went thorow all the countrey, and gathered the Priests and Leuites together, with all the gouernours of the tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Ierusalem to the high Priest, who made them sweare an oath, that they would keepe secret that which he should enforme them of, as a thing that required silence, and men of execution to performe the same. As soone as he had assured them by oath, he brought forth the little childe whom he had nourished (who was of Dauids line) and H said vnto them: Behold your king, who is of that race which (as you know) was chosen by God to raigne ouer you for euer: I therefore thinke it fit that the third part of your guard and keepe him within the temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the same. An other company shall haue the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the palace: as for the rest of the people, let them remaine disarmed within the Temple, and suffer no armed man to enter therein-to, except the Priest onely. Hee appointed also another company of Priests and Leuites to bee about the King, with Iauelins, and drawne swords, charging them that whosoeuer durst be so bold to enter the Temple armed, they should presently put him to the sword, and laying all feare aside, to attend the safety and guard of the Kings person. They beeing obedient to that which the hie Priest had commanded them, in effect expressed their readinesse: whereupon Ioiada opening the I Arcenall, (which in times past was prepared by Dauid) distributed amongst the Centurions, Leuites and Priests, all the iauelins, quiuers, and all other sorts of armes that were therein, and disposed all them that were armed, round about the people, ioyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entring in amongst them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the infant Ioas into the midst of the company, they set the royall crowne on his head, and Ioiada after he had annointed him with oyle, proclaimed him king: whereupon all the people reioyced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God saue the King.

The yeare of the world 3067. before Christs Natiuity. 897.

Athalia hearing this noise and applause, beyond all hope, was greatly troubled, and with those souldiers which she had about her, she hastily issued out of the palace, and arriuing in the temple the priests admitted her: as for the rest of the men of war that followed her, they that by the high Priests ordinance circuited the temple, would not suffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia saw the child standing before the Tabernacle with the royall crowne on his head, she rent her garments, and storming thorow despite, she cried out and commanded that the traitor should be slaine, that had thus betraied her and sought to dispossesse her of her kingdome. But Ioiada called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out vnto the brooke Cedron, and there to kill her (because he would not permit that the temple should be defiled with her cursed blood.) Moreouer he charged them, that if any one should attempt to rescue her, they should kill them likewise. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) tooke her, and led her without the gate of the kings mules, and there slew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Ioiada assembled the people and the men of warre in the temple, binding them all by an oath, to yeeld the king their faithfull seruice, and to procure the prosperitie and increase of his kingdome. Secondly, he made the king sweare in like manner, that he would maintaine the seruice of God, and in no manner disannull Moses lawes. That done, they ranne vnto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Ioram had built to the dishonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and leuelled it with the ground, and put to death their high Priest called Mathan. The charge and guard of the temple, Ioiada committed to the Priests and Leuites, according to the order established by Dauid, with commandement twise a day to offer their ordinarie burnt offerings, and consequently to make perfumes according to the law. He appointed also certaine of the Leuites to be porters to guard the temple, to the intent that no vncleane thing should enter the same vnespied: and after he had ordained these things with the Centurions & gouernours and with all the people, he tooke Ioas and led him out of the M temple, and attended him to the palace, and hauing placed him in his royall throne, all the people cried, God saue the king, and banquetted and feasted for diuers daies. Thus after the death of Athalia the citie was in quiet. Ioas was 7. yeeres old at such time as he was made king, his mother was called Sabia, & was of the towne Bersabe. CHAP. VIII.

AZAEL King of Damaſco leuieth an army, and firſt of all aſſaulteth the Iſraelites, and after marcheth forward againſt Ieruſalem.

B BVT Azael king of Syria making warre againſt the Iſraelites, and againſt their king Iehu, deſtroyed the countrey on the other ſide of Iordan, and all the eaſterne tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manaſſites. Furthermore, he burnt and ſpoiled Galaad, and Bathanæa, violenting and outraging all thoſe that hee met withall. For Iehu went not out againſt him to reſiſt him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a deſpiſer of pietie, and his lawes) he died after he had raigned ſeuen and twenty yeeres ouer the Iſraelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Ioas his ſonne to ſucceede him in his kingdome. But Ioas King of Ieruſalem conceiued a certaine deſire to renew the Temple: for which cauſe, calling vnto him Ioiada the high Prieſt, he commanded him to ſend thorow all the countrey the Leuites and Prieſts, and to leuie vpon euery one of their heads halfe a ſicle of ſiluer for the building and reparation of the Temple, which was fallen to decay in Ioram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the high C Prieſt would not obey him herein, knowing well that no man would willingly disburſe mony. But in the three and twentieth yeere of his raigne, the king ſent both for Ioiada, and the Leuites alſo, and expoſtulated with them for diſobeying his commandement, enioyning them from that time foorth to prouide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the high Prieſt vſed preſent diſpatch in leuying the mony, wherewith the people were highly contented. He therefore made a cheſt of wood cloſed on euery ſide (except that on the vpper lid thereof, there was a little crannie left open) which he placed neere vnto the Altar, commanding that euery one ſhould offer according to his deuotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranny into the coffer, to be imployed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people ſhewed themſelues affectionate: ſo that they gathered together a great quantity of gold and ſiluer, with great zeale; and when the D coffer was filled it was emptied, and the account thereof taken and ſumd vp by the Secretary, and high Prieſt in the kings preſence, and afterwards al was brought together into one aſſigned place: which order was obſerued euery day. And when as it was ſuppoſed that there was ſufficient money gathered, the high Prieſt Ioiada and King Ioas hired maſons, and carpenters, and prepared great beames of excellent timber.

The reſtoring of the temple.

After that the temple was repaired, they imploied the remainder of golde and ſiluer (which was of no ſmall quantity) to make cups, pots, and veſſels, and other vtenſils: and euery day offered they ſacrifice of great value vpon the Altar, and this cuſtome was continued ſo long as Ioiada liued. But after his deceaſe (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth yeere of his age, after he had liued a iuſt and vpright life, & was interred in the ſepulcher of Dauid in Ieruſalem, becauſe he E had eſtabliſhed the kingdome in Dauids poſterity) king Ioas had no more care to ſerue God, and with him the reſt of the Gouernours of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the lawes and ordinances, which they knew were very conuenient for them. For which cauſe God being prouoked by this change, and incenſed againſt the king and the reſt, ſent his Prophets vnto them, to proteſt, to expoſtulate with them for their offences, & to withdraw them from their iniquity. But they purſued ſin the more vehemently; ſo that neither the puniſhments, by which they, who had offended G O D before times, had beene plagued, with all their poſterities; neither all the aduertiſements giuen them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend, or to forſake thoſe ſinnes wherein they were engaged: but that which is worſt; king Ioas ſtoned Zachary Ioiadas ſon, and put him to death in the temple, forgetting himſelfe moſt vngratefully of the benefites he had F receiued by his father. And the occaſion was, for that Zachary hauing receiued a charge frō God to prophecy, came into the midſt of the people, & counſelled both them & him to follow iuſtice, foretelling them that they ſhould be grieuouſly puniſhed except they did beleeue. This Zachary did at his death call God to witnes and iudge of thoſe calamities he endured, in dying grieuouſly and violently for the good counſell which he had giuen them, and the benefites which his father had in times paſt done vnto Ioas. But many daies paſſed not before the king ſuffered due puniſhment

4. Reg. 14. Amatias king of Ieruſalem.

AMASIAS his ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome. But in the 21. yeere of Ioas raigne, Ioachas, the ſonne of Iehu, tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Iſrael in Samaria, and was ſeized thereof for the ſpace of ſeuenteene yeeres. But he followed not his fathers ſteps, but rather behauing himſelfe impiouſly, according as his predeceſſors in the kingdome, and contemners of God had done: For which cauſe the king of Syria ſubdued him, and cut off a great part of his dominions, and tooke his greateſt cities from him, and defeated his armies:
ſo that at length he had but ten thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen. All which hap- I

God (that reſpecteth the repentant, as if they had bin innocent, and that gently checketh thoſe whom he might vtterly exterminate, if he ſo pleaſed) gaue him aſſurance againſt this warre and danger, ſo that the countrey (hauing obtained peace) recouered preſently her former eſtate and raigne ouer the Iſraelites in Samaria, in the 37. yeere of Ioas king of Iuda. (For this king of Iſrael was called Ioas, as well as he that raigned in Ieruſalem) hee gouerned the kingdome ſixteene K yeeres. He was a good man, and had no correſpondence with his father in diſpoſition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell ſicke: to him reſorted the king of Iſrael to viſite him, and finding him in the extreamitie, and paſt hope of recouerie, he began to weepe and lament himſelfe, calling him his father, and his armour, becauſe that during his life, he had neuer occaſion to vſe the ſword againſt the enemy; but that by meanes of his predictions, he had alwaies the vpper hand of them without ſtroke ſtriking: that now he departed this life, and left him diſarmed to the mercie of the Syrians, and other his enemies; ſo that he had neither ſecuritie of libertie, nor life, but that he rather wiſhed to die with him, then to liue in thoſe dangers.

Syrians: and ſith thou haſt contented thy ſelfe with three ſhoots onely, thou ſhalt ouerthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou ſhalt fight againſt them, and ſhalt recouer the countrey they

AMASIAS making warre againſt IOAS king of Iſrael, is ouercome,

B THE tenth yeere of the raigne of Ioas king of Iſrael, Amaſias raigned ouer the Tribe of Iuda in Ieruſalem: his mother was called Iudan, and was a citizen of Ieruſalem. Hee was wondrouſly carefull to maintaine iuſtice (notwithſtanding hee was very young.) And hauing taken vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome, hee reſolued with himſelfe, that he ought firſt of all to reuenge the death of his father Ioas, who was traiterouſly ſlaine hy his friends: he therefore laid hands on them,and put them all to the ſword (yet extended hee not his diſpleaſure to their children,but conformed his actions according to the lawes of Moſes; which ſaith,that it is not lawfull to puniſh the children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards leuyed an army of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin,and choſe the men that were in their flowring yeeres, and about twenty yeeres of age : the number of whom amounted to three hundred thouſand men, whom he diuided into Centuries. Hee ſent alſo to the king of Iſrael, and waged a hundred C thouſand of his armed men for a hundred talents of ſiluer,becauſe hee intended to make war vpon the Amalechites,Idumæans, and Gabelites. Now whilſt hee made this preparation,and was in a readines to vndertake this exploit; a certen prophet counſelled him to diſmiſſe the Iſraelites that he had with him, becauſe they had no piety in them, ſignifying vnto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that war,he ſhould be ouercome: and contrariwiſe, that he ſhould haue the vpper hand ouer his enemies,if hee fought with a few men,according to Gods direction.Hereupon the king was ſore moued(becauſe he had already paied the Iſraelites their wages) but the prophet ceaſed not to exhort him to do that which was pleaſant in Gods ſight,who wold giue him ſiluer in aboundance.For this cauſe he diſmiſſed them, telling them that he freely gaue them their pay; and he with the forces of his kingdome marched out againſt thoſe nations, and D fought with them, and ouercame them, and ſlew ten thouſand of them, and tooke no leſſe number of priſoners aliue (whom he afterwards cauſed to be led to a high rocke that bounded vpon Arabia, and from thence caſt them downe headlong) and from all theſe nations he recouered a great bootie,and brought home much riches.

Whilſt Amaſias ſtood vpon theſe tearmes, the Iſraelites (that had taken wages of him, and were caſhiered by him) conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt him, ſuppoſing themſelues to be iniured by him,as if he had diſmiſſed them for men of ſmall reſolution.For which cauſe they inuaded his countrey,and ſpoiled it as farre as Bethſemer,and carried away a great quantity of cattel,and ſlew three thouſand men.This victorie and proſperitie made Amaſias proud,ſo that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof,and continued the honor of thoſe gods which he brought E from the countrey of the Amalechites. For which cauſe a prophet came vnto him and ſaid,that he wondred that he ſhould eſteeme them for gods,who had ſo litle auailed them who honoured them,and had deliuered them into his hands; ſo that diuers of them were put to death,and diuers led away priſoners, which they themſelues had brought vnto Ieruſalem, according to the cuſtome of war.Theſe words moued the King vnto diſpleaſure,ſo that he commanded the prophet to ſilence, threatning him to puniſh him, if he intermedled with his affaires any more. Who anſwered him, that he would no further vrge him; yet withall he foreprophecied vnto him, that God would not ſuffer this his innouation to reſt vnpuniſhed. Anone after, Amaſias (not able to keep a moderation amidſt his affluence and proſperity: but waxing more inſolent againſt almightie God,by whom he poſſeſſed the bleſſings he inioyed) iu height of his pride wrote to Ioas king F of Iſrael, commanding him and his to yeeld him homage,according as in times paſt the Iſraelits were ſubiect to Dauid and Salomon; threatning him, that if he refuſed to doe him voluntarie ſeruice,he would enforce him to decide the different by armes: to whom the Iſraelite replied thus. King Ioas to King Amaſias.There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres tree of great height, to whom a little thiſtle wrote,demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his ſon.But during this interparlee betwixt them,there came a certaine wilde beaſt,that troad downe the thiſtle. Let this example admoniſh and diſſwade thee from attempting of too mighty matters,neither growing

ing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, least thorow thy presumption thou expose both thy life and fortune to the incertaine hazzard of warre. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more whetted vnto warre (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore he had drawne his army into the field, and both the armies were vpon the point to wage the battell, a suddaine feare and discouragement seised him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias armie turne their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceiued) they were scattered before they came to handie strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Ioas threaten, that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Ierusalem to open their gates, and to receiue both him and his armie into the citie, he would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessitie and feare of death) wrought so much as his enemies were receiued into Ierusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; and there-thorow Amasias was led captiue into Ierusalem. In this manner was Ioas made master of the Citie, who afterwards carried away the treasures of the temple, and tooke away the gold and siluer that Amasias had in his Palace: and hauing in this sort ransomed him from captiuitie, he returned backe againe into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the Citie of Lachis, to auoide the conspiracie of his domesticall friends, by whom notwithstanding hee was surprised, and slaine by them that were sent to doe the deede: his body was brought and royally entombed in Ierusalem. Thus died Amasias for introducing inuocations in contempt of God; he liued fiftie foure yeeres, and raigned twentie and nine: his sonne Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

BVT in the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of Amasias, Ieroboam, Ioas sonne, began to raigne ouer the Israelites in Samaria, and enioyed the kingdome for the space of fortie yeeres. This king dishonoured God, and offended him grieuously in obseruance of Idols, and diuers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped ten thousand mischiefes and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certaine Prophet called Ionas, who prophecied vnto him, that he should make warre against the Syrians, and that he should ouercome them, and enlarge his kingdome to the Northward, as farre as the City of Amatha; and to the Southward as farre as the lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the countrey of Chanaan, according as the generall Iosuah had confined them.) Ieroboam encouraged by this prophecy, led foorth his armie against the Syrians, and spoiled all their countrey (according to the prophecy of Ionas.) And for that I haue promised to yeeld an exact history in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, me thinkes it shall not be amisse to declare that, which I haue found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man (being commanded by God to repaire vnto the kingdome of Ninus, and to proclaime that which should happen to the city of Niniuie; namely, that the gouernment thereof should be abolished) thorow feare which he conceiued repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a city called Ioppa; where finding a shippe, he entred the same and sailed towards Tharsis in Cicilia. But there arose so vehement a tempest vpon the sea, that the vessell was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master, and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thanksgiuing vnto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Ionas hid himselfe, and couered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waues incensed by violent windes, increased more and more; the mariners and passengers beganne to imagine amongst themselues, that some one of them in that Barke had caused that tempest: whereupon they agreed amongst themselues to cast lots, to know which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fell vpon Ionas: who being demanded whence he was, and for what businesse he trauelled: answered them, that he was an Hebrew by nation, and a Prophet of the most high God; and counselled them, that if they would be warranted from that danger, they should cast him into the sea, because it was hee onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not performe that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impietie, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had beene committed to their trust. But for that the storme more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little of imminent shipwracke; and being besides that incited by Ionas himselfe, and whetted on likewise

There beſought he GOD that he would pardon him the ſinne which he had committed: and afterwards he reſorted to the Citie of Niniuie, where aſcending a place from whence he might be heard, he publiſhed with a loud voice vnto them, that they ſhould loſe the Empire of Aſia: which after he had pronounced, he returned backe againe. King Ieroboam hauing paſſed all his life time in proſperitie, and raigned for the ſpace of fortie
B yeeres, departed this life, and was intombed in Samaria, and Zachary his ſonne ſucceeded him in his kingdome. At the ſame time, Ozias the ſonne of Amaſias raigned in Ieruſalem ouer the two tribes, after that Ieroboam had already raigned foureteene yeeres; his mother was called Achia, and was of the Citie of Ieruſalem. He was a man of a good nature, and ſuch a one as loued iuſtice, of noble courage, and very laborious in prouiding for all occurrences: he made warre againſt the Philiſtines, and after that he had ouercome them in battell, he tooke Ita, and Amnia, two of their ſtrong forts, and raced them. This exploit done, he ſet vpon the Arabians that neighboured vpon Ægypt, and after that (hauing built a citie vpon the red ſea) he planted a garriſon therein. He afterwards diſcomfited the Ammonites, conſtraining them to pay him tribute, and ſubdued all as farre as the marſhes of Ægypt. After that, he began to prouide for the citie of Ieruſalem: for he
C built it anew, and repaired the walles thereof, that had beene beaten downe or decaied, either by continuance of time, or by the negligence of thoſe kings who were his predeceſſors: he repaired thoſe alſo which the King of Iſrael had beaten downe, at ſuch time as hauing taken Amaſias priſoner, he rode in triumph into the Citie. Beſides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fiftie cubits high. Theſe incloſed he with walles to ſet garriſons therein, and in diuers barren places he cauſed diuers fountaine heads to be made: for he had an infinite multitude of beaſts of carriage and other cattell, in that the countrey was fit for paſture. He tooke pleaſure alſo in tillage, for which cauſe he was often buſied about his land, ſowing, and planting the ſame. He had about him a choſen armie, to the number of three hundred and ſeauentie thouſand fighting men, whoſe Generals, Conductors, and Captaines, were valiant and inuincible
D men, and were in number two thouſand.

Ozias riches and armie.

He taught his ſouldiers to march in a ſquare battell (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with ſwords, targets, and corſelets of braſſe, with arrowes and darts. Hee made alſo great preparation of diuers engins to batter Cities, and to ſhoote ſtones and darts, beſides diuers hookes, and other ſuch like inſtruments. But whil'ſt he was intent on theſe ſtudies and preparations, he grew inſolent and proud, and being puffed vp with mortall arrogance, he contemned the immortall force, which endureth for euer (which is pietie towards God, and the obſeruation of his commandements.) For which cauſe he was ouerthrowne by his proſperitie, and fell into his fathers ſins, thorow the happineſſe and greatneſſe of his eſtate, wherein he could not moderately containe himſelfe. So that vpon a certaine ſolemne feaſt day wherein all the people
E were aſſembled together, he attired himſelfe in the high Prieſts veſtments, and entred into the temple to offer ſacrifice vnto God vpon the golden altar; which notwithſtanding the high Prieſt Azarias (accompanied with foureſcore Prieſts) inhibited him the ſame, telling him that it was not lawfull for him to ſacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in thoſe that were of the poſteritie of the high Prieſt Aaron.

Ozias tranſgreſſeth his vocation, and is puniſhed with a leproſie and compelled to depart out of the citie.

Whil'ſt after this manner Azarias expoſtulated with him, commanding him to goe out of the Temple, and not to contradict the ordinances of God; the king waxed wroth, and threatned to take his life from him, except he kept himſelfe quiet. Whereupon there fell a great trembling and earthquake, and the temple cleft in twaine, and a great light of the ſunne entred thereinto, and reflected on the kings face in ſuch manner, that all his body was inſtantly couered with a le-
F proſie, and before the Citie (in a place called Eroge) the halfe of a mountaine (that ſtood to the Eaſtward) brake and fell, and rowled and remooued for the ſpace of foure ſtadia, towards the orientall mountaine, where it reſted: ſo that the publique waies were ſhut vp, and choaked, and the kings gardens of pleaſure were wholly ruinated & disfigured. When the Prieſts beheld the kings face couered with a leproſie, they told him what inconuenient had hapned vnto him, and enioyned him to depart out of the towne, according to the cuſtome of men that were polluted. Wherupon he (wholly confuſed at ſo grieuous an accident, and hauing no more audacitie to ſpeake) obeyed the commandement that was giuen him, enduring a pittifull and lamentable punishment for being elate and proud more then became humanitie, and for that he committed such impietie against God. He therefore remained without the Citie for a certaine time, and led a priuate life, and his sonne Iotham succeeded him in the kingdome. Finally, he died thorow griefe and discontent, after he had accomplished threescore and eight yeeres, whereof he raigned fiftie two, and was onely buried in his garden. G

Zachary, Ieroboams sonne, hauing raigned sixe moneths ouer the Israelites, was slaine by treason complotted against him by a familiar friend of his called Sellum, the sonne of Iabes, who possessing the kingdome after him, enioyed not the same aboue thirtie daies. For the Generall Manahem, being at that time in the Citie of Tharsa, and vnderstanding of that which had hapned to Zachary, departed thence with all his force, and came to Samaria, and in a battell which hee fought, he slew Sellum: And afterwards obtaining the crowne, he went from thence towards the Citie of Tapsa, the inhabitants whereof locked and barred their gates against him, and would not receiue him: in reuenge whereof he spoiled all the countrey round about, and tooke the Citie by force, and (being highly incensed against the Tapsians for their insolence) he put them all to the sword, not sparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous crueltie in him.) Manahem raigned in this manner for the space of ten yeeres, continuing a most cruell and vnbridled tyrannie ouer the people. Afterwards being assailed by Phul king of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither practised to resist him, but procured his peace for the sum of a thousand talents of siluer, which in way of composition he paid vnto him. The people furnished Manahem with this sum, in way of contribution, paying fiftie drachmes a peece. H I

Anone after he died, and was buried in Samaria, leauing behind him a sonne to succeed him in the kingdome, whose name was Phaceias, who imitating his fathers crueltie, possessed the soueraigntie but two yeeres: for he was slaine at a feast in the midst of his friends, by a treason practised against him by Phaceias the sonne of Romelias, who enioyed the kingdome for the space of 20. yeeres, addicting himselfe to all impietie and wickednesse. But Teglaphalasser king of Assyria, led forth his armie against the Israelites, and spoiled all the countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Iordan, and Galilee, Cydida and Asor also, and led all the inhabitants thereof prisoners, and transported the kingdome to himselfe. This is that which we haue thought good to write as touching the king of Assyria.

Phaceias. The translation of the Israelites.

Iotham the sonne of Ozias raigned in Ierusalem ouer the tribe of Iuda: he was the sonne of a daughter of Ierusalem called Iereса. There was no vertue deficient in this King, for hee was deuout towards God, iust towards men, and carefull to repaire the Citie: for he willingly imployed himselfe in restoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built galleries and porches about the Temple, and repaired the walles that were fallen downe: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he restored all that which was deficient in his kingdome. He made warre vpon the Ammonites; and ouercomming them in battell, he made all their nation tributarie, and constrained them to pay him yeerely a hundred talents, and ten thousand Cores of wheat, and as many of barley: and his kingdome in such sort increased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the same time there liued a certaine Prophet called Naum, who prophecied the ouerthrow of the Assyrians, and of the Citie of Niniue, and spake to this effect. All the people thereof shall be tossed and troubled, and be put to flight; and shall say the one vnto the toher: Stay and abide, take gold and siluer, and there shall be none that will receiue it. For they shall haue more care to saue their bodies, then their goods: for there shall bee a great debate amongst them with lamentation: their members shall lose their vigour, and their faces shall be altogether swart through feare: where shall the repaire of Lyons be? or where shall the mother of Lyons whelpe rest her? Niniue (God saith vnto thee) I will destroy thee, neither shall the Lyons that issue from thee, gouerne the world any more. To this effect did he prophecy, and spake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeat. For I haue omitted it purposely, because I would not be troublesome to the Readers. But all those things which hee foretold as touching Niniue, came to passe one hundred and fifteene yeeres after. But this is sufficient for the manifestation of this matter. K L M

RASIN king of Damasco maketh warre against Ierusalem: ACHAZ sendeth for the King of Assyria to assist him.

The yeare of the world, 3204. before Christs birth. 760.

AFTER that Iotham had liued one and forty yeares, and raigned sixteene, he died, and was buried in the sepulchre of the kings: after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his sonne, who was a contemner of God, and a transgressour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himselfe to the customes of the Kings of Israel: for hee erected Altars in the City of Ierusalem, and sacrificed vnto Idols, offering vp his owne sonne vnto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated diuers such like offences. During these impious idolatries of his, Rasin King of Syria and Damasco, and Phaceias King of Israel made warre against him (for these two were confederates) leading therefore both their armies against Ierusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reason the walles were very strong. But the King of Syria hauing seized the City of Elath, neere vnto the red sea, and slaine all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garrisons likewise to the sword, and all the Iewes round about, and carried away with him a great bootie into Damasco, and afterwards returned home with his army. The king of Ierusalem vnderstanding that the Syrians were retyred, and supposing himselfe to be sufficient to fight against the King of Israel, led foorth his forces against him, and was ouercome in battell (because that God was incensed against him for his wickednesses, which were both detestable and infinite.) For in that battell the Israelites slue about sixescore thousand men: amongst whom was Zacharias the sonne of Achaz, whom the generall of the armie of the Israelites called Amias slue, with Ericam the gouernour of the whole Realme, and he tooke Elcan the generall of the tribe of Iuda prisoner also. They led away likewise a great number of women, and children, with a great bootie, and afterwards returned vnto Samaria. At that time there was a certaine Prophet liuing in Samaria, whose name was Obel, who comming out to meete the armie, cried with a loud voice vnto the people, that the victory which they had, did not happen vnto them thorow their valour, but by reason of the wrath of God conceiued against Achaz king of Iuda. He furthermore reproued them, for that not contenting themselues with the good hap of that victory, they had so farre presumed as to hold them of Iuda and Beniamin prisoners, who were of their owne alliance: hee therefore counselled them to send them backe vnto their houses, without any iniurie by vniustice offered vnto them; threatning them, that if they did the contrary, they might be assured that God would punish them.

For those sinnes (said they) which we haue already committed, and against which the Prophets haue exclaimed, are cause enough to incense God; so that we haue no cause to annexe new impieties to the precedent. When the souldiers heard these words, they permitted them to execute all that which they held conuenient to be done. For which cause the abouenamed tooke the prisoners, and discharged them, and entertained them courteously, and gaue them meanes and money to furnish them in their iourney, and sent them home without offence: and besides that, these foure persons conducted them onwards of their iourney, as farre as Iericho; and when they drew neere vnto Ierusalem, they returned backe to Samaria.

This King was ſo ſenſeleſſe and ignorant of his owne profit, that although he were ouerpreſſed by warre by the Syrians, yet ceaſed he not to adore their gods, but perſiſted in their honour, as if he expected the victory by their meanes. And although he were ouercome againe, yet intended he the honor of the Aſſyrian gods; chooſing rather to reuerence any,then the true God, whom his forefathers worſhipped: Yea ſo farre grew he in contempt and neglect of all true pietie, that at length he ſhut vp the temple gates, and prohibited the ordinary ſacrifices, hauing before that taken all the precious preſents out of the ſame. After hee had in this ſort committed theſe outrages againſt God,he died,when he was thirty and ſixe yeeres old;and after he had raigned ſixteene yeeres,and left his ſon Ezechias to ſucceed him in the kingdome. A Ezechias aſcended into the Temple accompanied with the gouernours, and all the people, and offered there ſeuen bulles, ſeuen rammes, and as many goates: and after that hee, and all the gouernours had laid their hands vpon the heads of the ſacrifice, they deliuered them to the Prieſt, according as it appertained to them, and they ſacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Leuites alſo (aſſiſting round about with inſtruments of Muſicke) ſung hymnes and ſongs vnto God, according as they had beene taught by the ordinance of Dauid. The other Prieſts had trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their hymnes. Which done, the King and all the people caſt themſelues proſtrate vpon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards ſacrificed ſeuentie oxen, a hundred ſheepe, and two hundreth lambes. The King likewiſe beſtowed ſixe hundreth oxen, and three thouſand ſheepe vpon the people to feaſt withall. And when as the Prieſts had ioyfully performed all things (according to the cuſtome contained in the law) the King tooke B great pleaſure and banquetted with the people, giuing thanks vnto God. And when the feaſt of vnleauened bread was come, they ſacrificed the Paſſeouer, and during the ſeuen other daies, they offered vp their other ſacrifices. The King gaue in way of gratuity vnto the people (beſides that which had beene offered) two thouſand oxen, and ſeuen thouſand ſheepe. The Gouernours did the like, and gaue the people a thouſand buls, and one thouſand foure hundreth ſheepe: and thus was the feaſt ſolemnized, which had not beene ſo magnificently and deuoutly celebrated ſince Salomons time. When the ſolemnity of this feaſt was paſt, they iourneyed and went thorow the countrey, and purified it. They purged the Citie likewiſe of all vncleanneſſe of Idols, and the King ordained that the daily ſacrifices ſhould be made according to the law, vpon his charge. He enacted alſo that the people ſhould pay the tenths to the Prieſts, and Leuites, with the firſt fruits, C to the intent they might wholly intend pietie, and neuer eſtrange themſelues from the ſeruice of God. By which meanes it came to paſſe, that the people brought all kinde of fruite to the prieſts, and Leuites: which the King put vp in certaine ſtorehouſes, which he had built, to be diſtributed to euery one of them, their wiues, and children, and by this meanes they returned againe to their former puritie in religion. After the King had diſpoſed all things in this ſort, he made warre vpon the Philiſtines, and ouercame them, and ſeized all their Cities (betweene Gaza, and Geth.) About this time the King of Aſſyria ſent vnto him, and threatned him, that if he would not pay him thoſe tributes which his father before him had paide vnto him, hee would deſtroy all his countrey. Neuertheleſſe Ezechias ſet light by his threats, aſſuring himſelfe in that pietie and zeale he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Eſay, by whom he was exactly inſtructed as touching D all thoſe things that were to ſucceede. SALMANASAR ſlayeth the King of Iſrael, and leadeth the Iſraelites captiue into the countrey of Media.

VVHEN tidings was brought to Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria, that the King of Iſrael had priuily ſent vnto Soan King of Egypt, to requeſt his aſſiſtance in warre againſt the Aſſyrian, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and drew forth his army againſt Samaria, in the ſeuenth E yeere of the raigne of Oſeas. But the King of Iſrael withſtood his entrance into the citie, by which meanes he was beſieged therein for three yeeres ſpace, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth yeere of Oſeas, and the ſeuenth of Ezechias raigne. At which time all the kingdome of Iſrael was deſtroyed, and all the people tranſported into the countries of Media, and Perſia; and amongſt the reſt King Oſeas was taken priſoner. The King of Aſſyria cauſed certaine Nations of a Countrey, which (by reaſon it abutteth vpon a certaine riuer in Perſia called by that name) was called Chut, to remooue their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabite the Countrey of Iſrael. As for the tenne Tribes of Iſrael, they were tranſported out of their Countrey (nine hundreth forty ſeuen yeeres, ſince their predeceſſors (departing out of Egypt) poſſeſſed the Country of Chanaan; eight hundreth yeeres after the gouernment of Ioſuah; and two hundreth and forty F yeeres, ſeuen moneths, and ſeuen daies, ſince they reuolted from Roboam Dauids nephew, to giue the kingdome to Ieroboam.) This was the end of the Iſraelites, who tranſgreſſed the lawes, and diſobeyed the Prophets, who foretolde them of that calamitie which ſhould happen vnto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The ſedition that they moued againſt Roboam, eſtabliſhing his ſeruant for their King, was the originall of their miſchiefes. For Ieroboam committing impietie againſt God, and they imitating his wickedneſſe, preuailed ſo much, as the maieſtie of God grew displeased with them, so that hee punished them according as they deserued. But the King of Assyria rauaged and spoyled all Syria, and Phœnicia with his army, and his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for hee made warre against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulat raigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greeke tongue. The King Elulat (said hee) raigned sixe and thirtie yeeres, and pursued the Cutheans that were reuolted from him by sea, and made them subiect. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his armie, and inuaded all Phœnicia, and afterwards hauing couenanted a peace with them, hee returned backe againe. The Cities of Sydon, Arce, and Paletyr, and diuers other Cities reuolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselues to the King of Assyria. For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his armie forth once more against them; and he was furnished by the Phœnicians with sixtie ships, and eight hundreth rowers. The Tyrians charging these shippes with twelue of their vessels, ouerthrew the nauie of the Assyrians, and tooke about fiue hundreth men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the King of Assyria returning backe againe, planted a garrison vpon the riuer, and fortified the fountaine heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of fiue yeeres) they were enforced to finde and dig new fountaines to sustaine themselues. These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselues, as also the exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chuteans from the Region of Chut which is in Persia, where there is a Riuer of that name) for that they were in fiue nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honoured in their nation, to the number of fiue gods, whom they serued after the manner of their Countrey. Whereupon the true and supreme God was grieuously displeased, and prouoked against them: for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could finde no remedie, vntill such time as they had notice that it behooued them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safety. They therefore sent vnto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in warre. Which done, they learning the law, and the manner of Gods seruice by them, began very diligently to obserue both: by which meanes the plague ceased sodainly. And now euen vnto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrewes Chuteans, and Samaritans by the Greekes. These as often as they finde the Iewes in prosperitie, call them their coosins (according to the varietie and changes of time) but if they perceiue their fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abiure they consanguinitie, and renounce any lawfull parentage or amitie, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawne thither from a forraine nation. But in time and place conuenient, we shall speake of them more amply.

CHAP. I.

SENACHARIB King of Aſſyria beſiegeth EZECHIAS in Ieruſalem.

B IN the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacharib King of Aſſyria drew forth a huge army againſt him, and ſurpriſed all the Cities of Iuda and Beniamin by ſtrong hand. To him Ezechias ſent Embaſſadours, promiſing him obedience, and ſuch a tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe. When Senacharib had heard and conſidered vpon the Embaſſadours inſtructions, hee reſolued on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promiſing that he would depart in peace as ſoone as he had receiued three hundreth talents of ſiluer, and thirty talents of gold: ſwearing an oath vnto the Embaſſadours, that vnder theſe conditions hee would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giuing credit to theſe words of his, emptied the treaſuries, and ſent the prefixed ſumme to Senacharib, hoping to be deliuered from his enemy, and the hazzard wherein his countrey ſtood. But the Aſſyrians hauing C receiued the money, ſet light by their promiſes; ſo that Senacharib went in perſon to make war againſt the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, and left Rapſaces his generall in Iudæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeſt minions and courtiers, with commiſſion to ſpoile Ieruſalem: The names of theſe two were Tharata and Anachares. As ſoone as they were encamped neere vnto the walles, they ſent vnto Ezechias and commanded him to come and ſpeake with them: but he through feare which hee had conceiued, went not vnto them, but ſent three of his moſt familiar friends, Eliacim the ſuperintendent of his Realme, Sobna and Ioachus that had the commiſſion of his Regiſters. Theſe three preſented themſelues before the Chiefetaines of the Aſſyrian armie: whom when Rapſaces had beheld, hee commanded them to returne vnto their " Maſter, and to tell him that the great King Senacharib was deſirous to know vnder what hope he " D. thus neglected his gouernment, and obſtinately refuſed to obey him and receiue his army into the " Citie? Is it perhaps, becauſe hee hopeth the Ægyptians will haue the vpper hand of the Kings " armie? If that bee his hope, doubtleſſe hee is deceiued, ſhewing himſelfe to bee like vnto a man " that ſtayeth himſelfe vpon a broken reede; by which hee is not onely not ſuſtained, but in his fall " alſo, hath his hand pierced therewith. Hee likewiſe wiſhed him to conceiue, that this his expe- " dition was not without the will of God, who, as in times paſt hath giuen them the victorie ouer " the Iſraelites; ſo now alſo is pleaſed to humble Ezechias, and to make both him and his ſubiects " ſtoope vnder the Aſſyrian gouernment. Whileſt Rapſaces ſpake thus in the Hebrew language " (wherein hee was very skilfull) Eliacim (fearing leaſt the multitude ſhould be ſtriken with feare " vpon the hearing of theſe words) beſought him to ſpeake in the Syriack tongue. But hee ſufficiE ently inſtructed what it was that hee feared, anſwered him with a lowder voice in the Hebrew " tongue, and told them that they ought to giue eare vnto the Kings commandement, and to yeeld " themſelues to his mercy, becauſe it concerned their ſecuritie. I am not ignorant (ſayd he) that " both you and your King doe perſwade the people vnder a vaine hope, and fraudulently allure " them to beare armes againſt vs. But if your valour be ought at all, and you ſuppoſe that you can " leuy the ſiege from your walles, I am ready to furniſh you with two thouſand horſe, giue you " vs ſo many horſemen to approoue their valours: but you cannot giue them that you haue not. " Why therefore delay you? why yeelde you not to thoſe that are too ſtrong for you? and are " able euen in ſpite of your reſiſt to ranſacke your Citie? whereas you know that a willing ſub- " miſſion is alwaies ſecure: contrariwiſe whereas dutie is inforced, there wanteth no perill of " calamitie. F When both the Embaſſadours and the people had heard that which the Aſſyrian had ſpoken, they reported the ſame to Ezechias, who incontinently caſt his royall garments off, and cloathed himſelfe in ſackcloth, carrying the countenance of a diſconſolate man; and caſting himſelfe proſtrate vpon the earth after the manner of their countrey, he beſought God to be aſſiſtant vnto him, ſince all other hope was vaine. Hee ſent alſo certaine of his friends, and ſome Prieſts vnto the Prophet Eſay, requiring him to pray vnto God, that ſince the ſacrifice was offered vnto him for publicke ſecuritie, it might pleaſe him to fruſtrate the enemies hopes, and to haue pitie and G compaſſion on his people. When the Prophet had performed no leſſe then he required, he receiued an anſwere from God, by which he aſſured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies ſhould be ouercome without ſtroke ſtrooken, & ſhould retire with ſhame, and not with that aduantage which they brag'd of at this preſent, becauſe God had already determined how they ſhould be ouerthrowne. Hee foreprophecied alſo that Zenacharib himſelfe (the King of Aſſyria) ſhould faile of his enterpriſe in Ægypt, and that vpon his returne to his owne court, he ſhould be ſlaine. At that very time the Aſſyrian wrote letters to Ezechias, in which he called him foole and mad man, to thinke that he could warrantize himſelfe from being his ſlaue, yea his in eſpeciall, who had conquered diuers and far greater nations: threatning him with vtter ruine at ſuch time as he ſhould ſurpriſe the Citie, if hee opened not the gates of H Ieruſalem willingly, to entertaine his armie. When Ezechias had read theſe letters, he ſet light by them, by reaſon of the confidence he had in God: and hauing opened them, he ſpred them in the temple. And whileſt he renewed his praiers vnto God for the ſaluation of the City, and his ſubiects, Eſay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewiſe they ſhould manure their lands in peace & ſecuritie, & ſhould enioy their poſſeſſions without feare. Not long after, the king of Aſſyria hauing but cold ſucceſſe in his expedition againſt Ægypt, turned backe againe without doing any thing, for this cauſe that enſueth. Hee had loſt much time in the ſiege of Peluſium: & at ſuch time as he had already raiſed certaine bulwarks as hye as the wall, ſo that he wanted nothing but to giue the aſſault; newes was brought him that Tharſices king of Æthiopia brought an army to reſcue the Ægyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the deſart, I and ſodainly to charge the Aſſyrian armie. Senacharib troubled with theſe tidings, ſpeedily departed thence with his army. But Herodotus ſaith, that he made warre with Vulcans prieſt, eſpecially for that he was both a king and a prieſt: Beſieging Peluſium (ſayde hee) for this cauſe he gaue ouer the ſiege. The King of Ægypt called to his God for aſſiſtance, by whoſe power the Arabians ſuffered much miſerie. But in this alſo he erreth, in that hee ſetteth down the Arabian for the Aſſyrian. In one night (ſayd he) there was ſuch a multitude of mice, that they gnew all the enemies bowes and other arms: whence it came to paſſe that the King being diſarmed withdrew his ſiege from Peluſium. But Beroſus a writer among the Chaldees maketh mention of Senacharib, and how hee raigned among the Aſſyrians, and troubled both Aſia and Ægypt with warre, and declareth the manner in theſe words. But Senacharib returning from the Ægyptian warre came before Ieruſalem, and receiued the army that was there, at the hands of his gouernour Rabſace, and God cauſed a peſtilent ſickneſſe to fall vpon his army, which was ſo violent that the firſt night of the ſiege there died an hundreth foureſcore and fiue thouſand men, with their gouernors and chieftains. With which loſſe he was ſo affrighted, & troubled, that fearing to loſe his army, he fled with thoſe that remained, and retired himſelfe into his kingdome to the Citie called Niniue, where after he had liued for a time, he was traiterouſly ſlaine by Adramelech, and Selenar his two elder ſons: and being dead, was carried into his owne temple called Aruſche, and his children were driuen out of the kingdom for committing the murther, and retired themſelues into Armenia, and Aſſeradochus ſucceeded Senacharib. Such was the end of the Aſſyrian army that came before Ieruſalem. L

KING Ezechias (being in this ſort beyond all hope deliuered from his feares) offered thankſgiuing and ſacrifices vnto God, with all the people, acknowledging that there was no other cauſe that had ſlaine part of his enemies, and put the reſt to mortall feare, neither that had deliuered Ieruſalem from thraldome, but onely Gods ſuccour and aſſiſtance.

4. Reg 20. And whilſt he altogether intended and was occupied about the ſeruice of God, he fell ſicke of a M grieuous diſeaſe, ſo as the Phyſitians deſpaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This ſickneſs of his was accompanied with a grieuous care, becauſe he had no children, and ſaw that he was now to depart the world, & to leaue his houſe deſert, and his kingdom deſolate. Being therefore in this ſort toyled with diſcontents, he lamented and beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to lengthen his life a little time, vntil he had children to ſucceed him, and that he would vouchſafe that his ſoule might not be taken from him, before he were the father of a ſonne.

Ezechias ſickneſſe, and the prolongation of his life aſſured by miracle

A ſonne. Hereupon God taking compaſſion of him (and the rather, becauſe he was not grieued for that the pleaſures of his kingdome were taken from him; but for that he ſought for a lawful heire to ſucceede him in the princedome) he ſent the Prophet Eſay vnto him, to aſſure him, that after three daies he ſhould be recouered of his ſicknes and that after he had liued ſome fifteene yeeres more, he ſhould depart out of this life, and leaue a lawfull heire behind him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought theſe tydings to the king; he doubted both the vnexpected meſſenger, and the mightineſſe of his diſeaſe: for which cauſe he required ſome prodigious ſigne at Eſaias hands, to the intent that he might certainely beleeue, that he was ſent as a meſſenger from God vnto him: for the truth of thoſe things, which either exceede our hope, or reaſon, are wont to bee confirmed by theſe meanes. Whereupon Eſay asketh him what ſigne
B he required, and it ſhould be giuen him. For which cauſe he requeſted, that ſince the declining ſun had already aduanced his ſhadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cauſe it to returne vnto the place where it was before, and ouerrun againe the ſame lines of ſhadow. On this occaſion the Prophet beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to confirme the king by this miracle: who ſeeing that which he deſired, was ſodainly deliuered from his ſicknes, and aſcended the temple to worſhip and praiſe God. At that time it hapned, that the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was deſtroied by the Medes, (whereof I will ſpeake in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon ſent an Embaſſadour to Ezechias with preſents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiuing his meſſengers, willingly feaſted them, and ſhewed them his treaſures, his arcenall, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious ſtones: and after he had giuen them pre-
C ſents for Balad, he diſmiſſed them. Whereupon the Prophet Eſay came vnto him, asking him from whence thoſe Embaſſadours came? To whom Ezechias anſwered, that they were of Babylon, & came vnto him from the king, telling the Prophet how he had ſhewed them all that which he had, to the end that hauing ſeene and obſerued his riches and power, they might afterwards certifie their king thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, ſaying: Know thou that within a little time thy riches ſhall be tranſported into Babylon, and thy children ſhall be made Eunuches and (being no more men) ſhall be ſlaues vnto the King of Babylon. All which God gaue him to vnderſtand before it hapned. For which cauſe Ezechias was ſore troubled, to heare theſe tidings, ſaying, that he deſired that his people might not fall into thoſe miſeries: but ſince it was impoſſible to change the decree of God, he required that he might haue peace during his life time. Of D this Balad king of Babylon, Beroſus maketh mention. This Prophet truely diuine, and admirable for the verity of his prophecies, is accounted to haue ſpoken nothing that was vntrue, but to haue left in writing all that which he prophecied: the truth whereof hath afterwards in effect appeared to poſterity. Neither did he alone performe this much; but beſides him, twelue others haue done the like: and all that which is hapned vnto vs, either good or euill, hath fallen out truly according to their prophecies. But hereafter we will ſpeake of euery one of them. Now when as Ezechias had liued his prefixed time (according as wee haue foreſpoken) hand gouerned his kingdome in peace, he died when he was fiftie foure yeeres olde, and in the nine and twentieth yeere of his raigne.

The Kings of Chaldæa and Babylon warre againſt MANASSES, and take him priſoner.

HIS ſonne Manaſſes (the ſonne of Achiba, a woman borne in Ieruſalem (ſucceeded him in the kingdome. This man forſooke his fathers waies, and followed ſiniſter cuſtomes, expreſſing in his manners all kinds of miſchiefe, not omitting any impietie, but addicting himſelfe to all the iniquities of the Iſraelites, who were deſtroied becauſe of their ſinnes committed againſt God. He was ſo impudent as he ſpared not to pollute the very temple of God, the City and the whole countrey: for making his entrie, in deſpite of God, he ſlew afterwards all thoſe that were vertuous men amongſt the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets;
F yet ſo it is, that he killed euery day ſome: ſo that Ieruſalem was ouerflown with blood. For which cauſe God being prouoked vnto wrath by theſe his ſo hainous offences, ſent diuers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the king and the people, by whom hee threatned to inflict the ſame calamities vpon them, (which for contempt of religion) the Iſraelites their brethren had a little before that ſuffered. But they vnwilling to giue truſt to theſe ſpeeches of theirs (whoſe admonitions had they reſpected they might haue auoided their imminent euils) at length in effect experimented rimented the truth thereof. For whereas they perſeuered in their accuſtomed and diſſolute manners, God incenſed, the king of Chaldæa and Babylon againſt them; who ſending his army into Iudæa, and ſpoyling the whole region, at length ſurpriſed and led away Manaſſes priſoner, and made him ſubiect to what puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe them to inflict vpon him. At laſt the wretch (taught by his owne miſchiefe) acknowledged his ſinne, and humbly beſought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy curteous and mercifull: neither did God ſhew himſelfe inexorable; but hauing compaſſion on his miſeries, gaue eare vnto him; and after ſome ſpace of time, the Babylonian ſending him home, reſtored him to his former gouernment. As ſoone as he was returned backe to Ieruſalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to ſhew the fruits of repentance, and to feare God in all things, cleanſing his ſpirit of all thoſe ſinnes, whereunto before time he was addicted. He purged the temple alſo, and cleanſed the City; and from that time forward, hee addicted himſelfe wholly to thinke how he might giue God thanks, for that he had thus retired him from ruine, and how he might paſſe all the remnant of his life in his fauour. Hee taught the people likewiſe to doe the like, telling them what miſeries they had endured within a few yeers, for that they had demeaned themſelues impiouſly. He repaired the altar alſo, and according to Moſes preſcript offered thereon ſolemne ſacrifices: and after that he had puruayed thoſe things that concerned the ſeruice of God, as it appertained; he bethought himſelfe likewiſe of the ſecurity of the City of Ieruſalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined wals, annexing alſo another incloſure thereunto, and erecting high towers likewiſe, furniſhing the ſame with munition and victuall ſufficient for a City of defence. And ſo much was he changed during the reſt of his life, that he was held moſt happy; and after the time he began to ſerue God, diuers tooke example of vertue by imitating him. After he had liued ſixtie and ſeauen yeares, hee dyed in the fiue and fiftith yeere of his raigne, and was buried in his garden. His kingdome came into the hands of his ſonne Amos, the ſon of Emaſſema, of the City of Iabath; who imitating his fathers youthly courſe, was ſlaine in his owne houſe, by a conſpiracy plotted by his owne houſhold ſeruants, after he had accompliſhed the yeeres of foure and twenty, and raigned two. After his death the people ſlew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdome was giuen to his ſonne Ioſias, who was onely eight yeeres old.

The Hiſtory of IOSIAS.

IOSIAS mother was of the City of Boſceth, and was called Ieda: he was a man of a good nature, and of his owne inſtinct inclined to vertue, conforming himſelfe to the cuſtomes and manners of his progenitor Dauid, both in the ſcope and rule of all his life. When he grewe to be twelue yeeres old, he gaue manifeſt approbation of his pietie and iuſtice: for hee drew the people to a conformable courſe of life, and to the deteſtation and aboliſhing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the ſeruice of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And conſidering the actions of his predeceſſors, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no leſſe circumſpection, then if he had beene an old man; and that which he found to be correſpondent and aduiſedly done by them, that did hee both maintaine and imitate. All theſe things did hee both by reaſon of his innated wiſdome, as alſo by the admoniſhments and counſails of the elders: for following orderly the lawes (both in reſpect of publique policie, as alſo in religion) he walked vprightly, in that by obſeruing them hee could not erre. For circuiting both the City & the whole country, the king raſed down and defaced the woods that were made for ſtrange gods, and ouerthrew their altars; and all thoſe gifts that had been offered vnto them by his predeceſſors, were defaced in a mockerie: and in this manner cauſed hee the people to returne to the ſeruice of God, and to forſake the honour they did vnto Idols. Hee offered likewiſe the ordinary ſacrifices and burnt offerings vpon the altar, and eſtabliſhed Iudges and magiſtrates to determine publicke debates, and to doe each man right, charging them to haue no leſſe reſpect of equity, then they had of their owne liues. He ſent alſo thorow all the country, commanding all thoſe that would be cõtributors, either in gold or ſiluer, towards the reparation of the temple, ſhould bring in their beneuolence according to their wils, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, hee appointed ſuperintendents, both ouer the temple, as alſo ouer the charges that were defraied in the reparation thereof: namely Amaſias, who was already gouernor of the City, and Saphan the ſecretary, and Ioata Committee ouer the regiſters, with the high Prieſt Elcia: who with al expedition and diligence prouided workmen, and all that

This ſodaine and ſpeedy reparation of the temple gaue a manifeſt teſtimony of the kings pietie: who when he had attained to the eighteenth yeere of his age, ſent Elcia the high Prieſt, and cauſed him to melt downe the remainder of the money that was giuen towards the building of the temple, and to make veſſels, cups, and ewers,for the ſeruice of the Altar. He commanded alſo,that all the gold and ſiluer that was in the treaſury ſhould be brought forth, and emploied after the like manner in cups, and other veſſels. Now whileſt the high Prieſt ſearched the treaſurie, hee found the ſacred bookes of Moſes in the temple,which he brought and deliuered the Scribe Saphan;who after hee had purſued the ſame, preſented them vnto the King, giuing him to vnderſtand, that all that which hee had commanded was accompliſhed: beſides that,he read the books vnto him;which when the king had heard he rent his clothes,and called Elcia the high Prieſt vnto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certaine other of his inward friends, and ſent them vnto the Propheteſſe Olda, the wife of Sallum,a B man in high dignity,and famous, by reaſon of his nobility: commanding them that when they came vnto her,they ſhould endeuour to appeaſe Gods wrath, and labour to recouer his fauours becauſe it was to be feared, that by reaſon that their anceſtors had tranſgreſſed the laws of Moſes, they ſhould be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of their countrey;and abandoned by all men,ſhould at length periſh miſerably.

Olda the Propheteſſe ſent vnto by Ioſias.

The Propheſie of the Iewes miſery.

When the Propheteſſe had heard the kings commandement, ſhee willed thoſe that were ſent vnto her to returne vnto the king,and to certifie him from her, that God had giuen a ſentence againſt them,which might not be reuoked,by any praiers whatſoeuer;namely, that ſince they had tranſgreſſed the law of Moſes,the people ſhould periſh, & ſhould be caſt out of their country, and C depriued of all their goods that they had,and for that they haue not growne to amendment in ſo long time;notwithſtanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance,and had foretold the puniſhmẽt of their impieties,which ſhould happen vnto them,to the end that they might beleeue that God is God,& that he faileth not in any thing that he hath foretold by his prophets. Furthermore ſhe ſaid,that he forbore as yet to ſend theſe afflictions vpon them,for Ioſias ſake,who was a vertuous man: but that after his deceaſe God would powre his intended puniſhmẽts vpõ the people. This prophecy of the woman they ſignified vnto the king: who ſent into al parts,& aſſembled the people in Ieruſalem,commanding the Prieſts and Leuites, and generally all men without diſtinction of age, or perſon,to be preſent in that conuention. Now when they were aſſembled, he firſt of all cauſed the ſacred bookes to be read, and afterwards ſtanding aloft vpon his throne, he D cauſed all the people to ſweare and promiſe that they would ſerue God, and keepe Moſes lawes. Whereupon all of them did willingly approue whatſoeuer he ſaid,promiſing to doe that whereunto they were exhorted. And therwithal offering vp preſent ſacrifices vnto God,they beſought him to ſhew himſelfe fauourable and merciful towards them. The king likewiſe commanded the high Prieſt,that if there were any neceſſarie in the temple which were made by his predeceſſors, in honour of idols and ſtrange gods, he ſhould caſt it out. And after that a great quantitie was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the aſhes afterwards were ſcattered here and there. And as touching the Prieſts (that appertained to idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When theſe things were thus executed in Ieruſalem he came afterwards to the plaine countrey; and all that which Ieroboam had erected there in honour of idols, E he vtterly defaced it,and the bones of the falſe prophets were burnt vpon the Altar that Ieroboam had builded. This had the prophet foretold that came to Ieroboam, at ſuch time as he offered ſacrifice,and told him in the preſence of all the people,all that which ſhould happen: namely, that one of Dauids poſteritie called Ioſias, ſhould doe thoſe aboue named things: which prophecie tooke effect three hundreth ſixtie and one yeere after. After this,king Ioſias tranſported himſelfe to the Iſraelites (who had auoided the captiuitie and ſeruitude of the Aſſyrians) and perſwaded them to forſake their impieties,and the ſeruices they had performed to ſtrange Gods,and to honour the ſoueraigne and true God of their fathers,and to cleaue vnto him. He made a ſearch alſo thorow euery houſe,borough and citie,fearing leaſt as yet there ſhould be any idoll hidden. He likewiſe ſought out the chariots that were made by his anceſtors, in honour of the ſunne, and F all that which was adored whatſoeuer it were, and vtterly aboliſhed the ſame. After he had in this ſort purged the countrey, he aſſembled all the people in Ieruſalem, where hee celebrated the feaſt of vnleauened bread,and the ſolemnitie of Eaſter. Towards the performance whereof, he gaue the people yong kids and lambes, to the number of thirtie thouſand, and three thouſand bullockes for burnt offerings: and the chiefe among the Leuites diſtributed amongſt the other Leuites fiue hundreth lambs,and fiue hundreth bullocks. Hauing therefore ſuch an abundance dance of beasts they sacrificed acccording to the law of Moses, (the priests taking charge thereof, and confirming the rest of the people by their example.) Neither was there euer such a solemnity kept by the Hebrewes since the time of Samuel the Prophet; because all things were done according to the lawes and ancient customes, which were obserued in the time of their fathers. After this, Iosias liued in peace, riches, honour, and estimation amongst all men: and thus finished his life.

Diuers exploits of NECHAO.

The yeere of the world, 3334. before Christs Natiuitie, 630.

NECHAO King of Egypt hauing gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the floud Euphrates, to warre against the Medes and Babylonians, who had destroyed the Empire of Assyria: for Nechao affected the gouernment of all Asia. Now when hee drew neere vnto the City of Mende (which was vnder Iosias subiection) king Iosias denyed him passage, and would not suffer his army to march thorow his countrey. For which cause Nechao sent a herauld vnto him, to let him vnderstand, that it was not against him that he made war, but that he bent his course towards Euphrates: for which cause he wished him in no sort to hinder his intended iourney, least thereby he should be constrained to make warre vpon him. But Iosias respected not this demand of his, but resolued himselfe to hinder his passage thorow his country: And truly I suppose that the destinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might haue some occasion to doe some thing against Nechao. For whilest he disposed his army, and rode from one band to another, being mounted vpon his charriot, he was strooken with an arrow that was shot by a certaine Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the spleene he had in warre. For feeling himselfe sorely oppressed with paine, by reason of his wound, he commanded his army to retyre, and returned himselfe to Ierusalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after he had liued nine and thirty yeeres, and raigned thirty and one. For him the people mourned with great heauinesse, lamenting and sorrowing for many dayes. The Prophet Ieremy also made a deploration ouer him in lamentable verse, which is as yet extant euen in these daies. This prophet left in writing those euils that should afterwards happen vnto the citie, and the captiuitie wherewith we are intangled at this present, and the surprisall of Babylon. Neither hath he alone foretold the same: but the Prophet Ezechiel hath likewise done the like; who first left two bookes written of the same argument. These two prophets were of the race of the priests. But Ieremy kept in Ierusalem, from the fourteenth yeere of the raigne of Iosias, vntill the destruction of the Citie and Temple; as in time and place conuenient we will declare, setting downe those occurrences that hapned to this Prophet. After the death of Iosias (heretofore mentioned) his sonne Ioaz succeeded him in the kingdome, at such time as he was twentie and three yeeres old, who raigned in Ierusalem; his mothers name was Ametala: he was a man full of impietie, and of a malignant and peruerse nature. The King of Ægypt returning from the warre, sent vnto Ioaz, commanding him to meet with him in Samath a Citie of Syria, where he was no sooner arriued, but he kept him prisoner, committing the kingdome to Eliacim his brother (on the fathers side) who was his elder brother likewise. He changed his name also, and called him Ioachim: he imposed a tribute also on Iudæa, of one hundred talents of siluer, and a talent of gold, which Ioachim paide. And as touching Ioaz, he led him into Ægypt, where he finished his daies, after he had beene king three moneths, and tenne daies. Now Ioachims mother was called Zabuda, of the Citie of Abuma. He was a wicked person, and of a malignant nature, hauing neither pietie towards God, nor respect of equitie towards men.

NABVCHODONOSORS armie commeth into Syria.

The yeere of the world, 3335. before Christs Natiuity. 629.

The yeere of the world, 3336. before Christs Natiuitie. 628.

IN the fourth yeere of his raigne, a certaine man called Nabuchodonosor, possessed the kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great armie against Carchabesa (a Citie situate neere vnto Euphrates) resoluing with himselfe to fight against Nechao King of Ægypt, vnder whose power all Syria was subiect. Nechao vnderstanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his armie was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge armie addressed himselfe towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulse Nabuchodonosor. But he

A was ouercome in battell, and loſt diuers thouſands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (paſſing Euphrates) ſeized all Syria as far as Peluſium (Iudæa only excepted.) The fourth yeere that Nabuchodonoſor raigned ouer theſe conquered countries, and the eight yeere of the raigne of Ioachim ouer the Hebrewes, the Babylonian led forth his army againſt the Iewes, with a mighty power, threatning them to vſe all hoſtilitie, except Ioachim would pay him tribute. Ioachim fearing his threats bought his peace with ſiluer, and paid for three yeeres ſpace the tributes that were impoſed on him. But in the third yeere (vnderſtanding that the Ægyptian was vp in armes againſt the Babylonian) he denied the paiment of the tribute; notwithſtanding he was fruſtrated of his hope, for the Ægyptians were not ſo hardy as to make warre. All which the Prophet Ieremie daily foretold him, ſignifying vnto him that he builded his hope in vaine vpon the Ægyptians, and that it would fall out that the Citie ſhould be ouerthrowne by the king of Babylon, and Ioachim himſelfe ſhould be deliuered priſoner into his hands. But becauſe there was no meanes for them to eſcape this iuſtice, all that which he ſaid was nothing auaileable. For notwithſtanding the people and gouernours heard thereof, yet made they no reckoning of the ſame; but were diſpleaſed with thoſe counſailes, which he propoſed vnto them, accuſing Ieremy as if he tooke pleaſure to vtter and publiſh omnious and aduerſe preſages againſt the king: they likewiſe called him in queſtion before the kings councell, and required that he might bee condemned. Whereupon ſome of them gaue ſentence againſt him: the reproouing the aduiſe of the elders that were thus addicted, tooke a more diſcreete courſe, and cauſed the Prophet to depart out of the kings houſe, forbidding his aduerſaries to doe him any miſchiefe: they proteſting that he C had not only foretolde the future calamities of the citie, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas and diuers others; and yet that no one of them had ſuffered any euill by the kings of their time, but that contrariwiſe Micheas had beene honoured as a Prophet ſent from God. By theſe words they appeaſed the people, and deliuered Ieremy from the death intended againſt him. This man wrot all his prophecies, and read them to the people in their faſts, and aſſembled them in the temple in the ninth moneth of the fift yeere of the raigne of Ioachim, which booke he had compoſed touching that which ſhould happen vnto the Citie, the temple, and the people. When the gouernours heard the ſame, they tooke the booke from him, and commanded that both he and his ſecretarie Baruch ſhould withdraw themſelues out of the ſight of men: and they tooke the booke, and preſented it vnto the king; who in the preſence of his friends, com- D manded his ſecretary to reade the ſame: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and renting it in peeces, caſt it into the fire, intending that it ſhould neuer be ſeene. He ſent out likewiſe a ſtrict commiſſion to ſeeke out Ieremy and his ſecretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be puniſhed. But they had preuented his indignation.

NABVCHODONOSOR putteth IOACHIM to death, and eſtabliſheth IOACHIN in the kingdome.

E NOT long after this, he went out to meete the king of Babylon, who was marched out to make warre againſt him: and being incredulous and careleſſe of the Prophets predictions, he opened the gates vnto him, ſuppoſing that he intended him no euill. But when the Babylonians were entred into the Citie, the king obſerued not his promiſes, but put all ſuch to death as were in the flower and beautie of their yeeres, and ſpared none of the inhabitants of Ieruſalem: with them alſo he ſlew their king Ioachim, and cauſed his body to be caſt from the top of the walles, and vouchſafed him no ſepulture, eſtabliſhing Ioachin his ſonne king of the countrey, and of the citie. Moreouer he tooke three thouſand of the moſt honourable Citizens of Ieruſalem priſoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongſt whom was the Prophet Ezechiel, at that time very yong in yeeres. AS soone as the Babylonian had bestowed the kingdome of Iudæa on Ioachin, hee was seized with a sodaine feare, which made him suspect least Ioachin remembring himselfe of the iniuries he had done vnto him by the murther of his father, might draw the countrey into rebellion, and reuolt against him. For which cause he sent out certaine forces, and besieged Ioachin in Ierusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an vpright heart, was loath to forsake the City in that danger without a gouernour, considering that it was for his cause that the commonweale was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his neerest akin with him, he deliuered them into the hands of the captaines that were sent against him, receiuing an oath from them, that neither they nor the Citie should receiue any harme. But this promise continued not a yeare: for the king of Babylon obserued it not, but commanded his captaines to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the Citie, and to bring them bound vnto him. The number of them was ten thousand, eight hundred thirtie and two persons, besides Ioachin, his mother, and his neere allies, whom they tooke prisoners.

SEDECHIAS is made King ouer Ierusalem, by the Babylonians.

Sedechias king of Ierusalem seduced by his courtiers and false prophets, giueth no eare to Ieremie.

IN stead of Ioachin, he appointed Sedechias his Vncle King of Ierusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should gouerne the countrey without any innouation, or partiall fauour towards the Ægyptians. This Sedechias was one and twentie yeeres olde, at such time as hee came vnto the kingdome, and was Ioachins brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all lawes, and a peruerter of ordinances. For the yong men that were about him were without the feare of God, and all the people vnder his dominions committed whatsoeuer outrages were best liking vnto them. For this cause the Prophet Ieremie came vnto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, that if he renounced not all those impieties, and iniquities he vsed, and addicted not himselfe to that which was iust (but gaue eare vnto his gouernours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false prophets that misled him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make warre against his Citie, but that the Ægyptians should leuie an army and ouercome them) that then he should incurre much miserie: for (said hee) they haue no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce, are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gaue eare to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people: but anone after his friends corrupted him, and diuerted him according to their owne opinions. Ezechiel also at the same time, had prophecyed in Babylon all those calamities which were to fall vpon the temple, and sent notice to Ierusalem of that which he had receiued from God. Notwithstanding, Sedechias gaue no credit to his prophecies, by reason that all the Prophets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the surprisall of the city, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezechiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Ieremy had prophecied, that the king of Babylon should leade him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these two accorded not in their sayings; he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things happened vnto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as wee will declare in a conuenient place. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the king of Babylon for the space of eight yeeres, he brake the league that was betweene them, and confederated with the Egyptians (vnder hope that they should not ouercome the Babylonians.) Which when the king of Babylon vnderstood, he led forth his army against him, and destroyed his countrey to the vttermost: so that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he finally planted his army and besieged Ierusalem. The Egyptian perceiuing the estate wherein his allie Sedechias was, leuied a huge army, and came into Iudæa with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his army from Ierusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and ouercame him in battell, and pursued him with such alacrity, that he put him to flight, and draue him altogether out of Syria. As soone as the Babylonian was dislodged from Ierusalem, the false prophets

Sedechias reuolt from the Babylonian. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10

The king of Egypt comming to rescue the king of Ierusalem, is ouerthrown by Nabuchodonosor with all his army, and driuen out of Syria.

A phets deceiued Sedechias, telling him that the Babylonian should neuer more returne, to make warre either against him, or his nation, and that he should neuer any more depart from his house in Babylon; and that they who had beene led away captiues, should returne home againe, loaden with those vessels of the Temple which the king of Babylon had taken from them. The yeere of the world, 3346. before Christs Nativitie, 618.

But the Prophet Ieremie presenting himselfe before the king, prophecied the contrary to these impostors, assuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by meanes of the Ægyptians, for that the Babylonians should ouercome them, and should returne and encampe before Ierusalem, and besiege the same, and destroy the people by famine, and leade them away prisoners that were remaining, and carry away all their substance; & that after they were seised of the riches of their temple, they should finally burne the same. As for the Citie, they should raze
B it: and (said he) they shall keepe vs captiue for the space of seuentie yeares: And from this seruitude the Persians and Medes shall deliuer vs, at such time as they haue gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babylonians: then shall they send vs backe againe into our countrey, and we shall build our temple anew, and establish the Citie of Ierusalem. Diuerse men gaue credit to these words of Ieremie; but the gouernours and contemners of God, intreated him verie cruelly, as if he had beene a man transported out of his sense. And whereas he had an intent to visite his natiue countrey Anathoth, some twentie stounds off Ierusalem, one of the Magistrates encountring him in his iourney, & laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this slander, that he went & stole away to submit himself to the Babylonians. But Ieremy answered that he was falsly accused, & that he repaired onely to the place where he was borne. This Prince giuing him
C no credit, arrested him, and brought him before the iudgement seat, where he sustained all sorts of outrages and torments, & was shut vp in prison to be punished, & remained there for a time, suffering the extremitie of wrong and iniurie. The ninth yeare of the raigne of Zedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth month, the king of Babylon came and encamped the second time before Ierusalem, and entrenched himselfe round about the same, for the space of eighteene moneths, and laid batterie and siege thereto, with as great spleene as might be possible: And they that were besieged therein, were encountred with two most hainous afflictions, famine, and most grieuous pestilence. At this time the Prophet Ieremie being in prison, held not his peace, but cried with a loud voice, and preached, and exhorted the people, willing them to entertaine the Babylonians, and to open their gates vnto them: because that in so doing they might warrantize themselues
D with all their families, whereas otherwaies they were assured of destruction. He foretold them also, that if any one remained in the Citie, he should most assuredly, either perish by famine, or the enemies fury: but if so be they submitted themselues to the enemies mercy, they should escape from death. But those gouernours that heard him speake after this sort, gaue him no credit, in that they were not as yet pressed with the danger: for which cause they came vnto the king, and after a despitefull manner, told him all that which had beene spoken, accusing Ieremie, and reprooving him for a mad man; vrging this, that he had abated their courage, and by his woefull predictions, had weakned the hearts of the people, which were otherwaies ready to fight for him and their country, by reason that he flying vnto the enemy, menaced them with the surprisall and vtter ruine of their City. But the king in regard of the naturall humanity and iustice that was
E in him, was not any waies whetted in respect of his owne interest; yet to the intent he might not seeme to be vtterly opposed to the gouernours, by contradicting them, he deliuered the Prophet into their hands, to deale with him howsoeuer they pleased. Who hauing obtained this liberty from the king, entred the prison on the sodaine, and laying holde on Ieremie, they let him downe into a pit full of mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and bee strangled by the ordure: in effect, he was set therein vp to the necke. But one of the kings seruants (an Æthiopian by nation) certified the king of the Prophets affliction, assuring him that his friends and gouernours did not iustly, so to thrust and bury the Prophet in the mud, and cursedly to conspire against him, tyring him with bonds and tortures worse then death. For which cause the king hearing this newes, was sorry that he had deliuered the Prophet to the Gouernours, and commanded the F Æthiopian to take thirty men of his court with him (with cords and such other things necessary, as might concerne the safety of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliuer him from that captiuitie. Hereupon the Æthiopian furnished with men and necessary meanes, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and dismissed him without any guard. That done, the king sent for him in secret, demanding of him if he had any message to deliuer him from God, praying him to let him vnderstand whatsoeuer he knew as touching the successe of the siege. The Prophets answer was, that although he should tell him, yet it would not be beleeued, & that if he should exhort

Ieruſalem is taken,and the people carried into Babylon by NABVCHODONOSOR.

Ieruſalem beſieged eighteen moneths and at length taken.

MEane-while, the Babylonian continued his violent ſiege againſt the City of Ieruſalem, and hauing raiſed towers vpon certain bulwarks,he draue away by this meanes al thoſe that approched neere vnto the walles: he raiſed alſo(round about the circuit of the Citie) diuerſe plat-formes,that equalled the walles in height. Meane-while,the citie was as valiantly and couragiouſly defended by the inhabitants,for neither peſtilence nor famin plucked down their ſpirits: And although that within the citie they were tormented with theſe ſcourges, yet were not their reſolutions diſtracted by the warre, neither did the enemies inuentions aſtoniſh them, nor their engines affright them; but that they inuented new countermines: ſo that all the battel betwixt the Babylonians and Iewes ſeemed to be a trial both of valour & art; whileſt theſe by the one doe aſſuredly hope to ſurpriſe the citie, and the other thought their ſafetie conſiſted herein, if they ceaſed not by new inuentions to fruſtrate their enemies endeuours: And in this eſtate continued they both,for the ſpace of eighteene moneths,vntill they were conſumed by famine, and by the darts that were ſhot againſt them by thoſe that ſhot from the towers. At length the citie was taken by the princes of Babylon (in the eleuenth yeare of the raigne of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth moneth) who were put in truſt by Nabuchodonoſor to performe the ſiege. For touching his owne perſon he made his aboad in the Citie of Reblata. Now if any man be deſirous to know the names of them that had commandement at ſuch time as Ieruſalem was ſurpriſed, theſe they be; Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Naboſar, and Echarampſar. Whereupon thoſe Princes & friends of Zedechias that had taken their flight with him, ſeeing the enemies neere vnto them, forſooke him,& ſcattering themſelues here and there,cõcluded each of them to ſaue himſelfe. A with breach of his promiſe, and contempt of his Maieſty, to whom hee had ſworne hee would keepe it to his vſe. Furthermore he reproched him for his ingratitude, in that hauing receiued the royaltie from his hands (which he had taken from Ioachin to beſtow it on him) he had notwithſtanding employed all his forces againſt his benefactor. But (ſaid he) that great God that hateth thy trechery, hath deliuered thee into my hands: and when he had ſpoken theſe words, he cauſed Zedechias friends and children to be ſlaine before his eies, with all his other priſoners: afterwards commanding his eies to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. All which hapned vnto him, according as the Prophets Ieremie and Ezechiel had foretolde him: namely, that he ſhould be ſurpriſed and brought before the King of Babylon, and ſhould ſpeake with him face to face, and ſhould ſee him with his eyes (for ſo had Ieremie prophecied) but being made blinde and conduB cted to Babylon, hee ſhould not ſee the Citie of Babylon (according as Ezechiel had foretolde.) All which may ſufficiently expreſſe to thoſe that know not the nature of God, how diuers and admirable his iudgements be, in diſpoſing all things in good order, and preſignifying thoſe things that are to come, euen as in this place there appeareth a moſt ſignall example of humane errour and incredulitie, by which it was not lawfull for them to auoid their future calamity, neither ſhun their vnremooueable deſtiny. Thus was the race of the Kings extinguiſhed that deſcended from Dauid, who were in number one and twenty, that raigned after him. All of them together gouerned fiue hundred and foureteene yeeres, ſixe moneths, and ten dayes: adding thereunto the twentie yeeres of the firſt King Saul, who was of an other Tribe. After this, the Babylonian ſent Nabuzardan Generall of his army vnto Ieruſalem to ſpoile the Temple, giuing him in charge to burne C both it, and the Kings Palace, and to raſe and leuell the Citie with the ground; and afterwards to tranſport the people into Babylon. Who arriued there the eleuenth yeere of the raigne of Sedechias, ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels that were conſecrated to Gods ſeruice, both thoſe of gold, as alſo them of ſiluer: hee tooke likewiſe the great Lauer that was giuen by Salomon; the columes and pillars of braſſe, with their chapters likewiſe, and the tables and candleſtickes of gold: and after he had borne away all things, he burned the Temple the firſt day of the fift moneth of the eleuenth yeere of Sedechias raigne, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſors gouernment. He burned alſo the Kings royall Palace, and raſed the Citie. This Temple was burned 470. yeeres, ſixe moneths, and tenne daies after the foundation thereof: and in the yeere 1062. ſixe moneths and ten daies, after the departure of the people out of Egypt: and 1950. yeeres, D ſixe moneths and ten daies, after the Deluge: from the creation of Adam vntill the ruine of the Temple, there were three thouſand, fiue hundreth and thirteene yeeres, ſixe moneths and tenne daies. Thus haue wee ſet downe the number of the yeeres, and orderly expreſſed what, and in what time euery thing hath beene performed. The Generall for the King of Babylon hauing deſtroyed the Citie, and tranſported the people, tooke priſoners the high Prieſt Sareas, and his fellow in the office the Prieſt Sephan, with the Gouernours and Keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch alſo which had the charge ouer the reſt, and ſeuen of Sedechias friends and his Secretarie, beſides ſixty other Gouernours, all which (together with the veſſels which he had pillaged) he ſent to Reblatha a Citie of Syria, vnto the King of Babylon; who commanded in that place that the high Prieſt and Gouernours ſhould bee beheaded: as for the reſt of the priſoE ners, and Sedechias the King, he carried them with him to Babylon: he ſent alſo in bonds, with the reſt, Ioſadoch the Sonne of Sareas the high Prieſt, whom he had put to death in Reblatha (as wee haue heretofore declared.) And for that wee haue reckoned vp the race of the Kings, and ſet downe likewiſe what they were, and how long they continued, mee ſeemeth that it ſhall not bee vnneceſſarie to recite the names of the high Prieſts, and to report who they haue beene, that haue adminiſtred the Prieſthood vnder the Kings. Sadoc was the firſt high Prieſt of the Temple builded by Salomon. After him his Sonne Achimas ſucceeded in that honour, and after Achimas Azarias, after whom ſucceeded Ioram, and after Ioram Ioſchua, after Ioſchua Axioram, who had for his ſucceſſor Phideas, to Phideas ſucceeded Sudeas, to Sudeas Iulus, to Iulus Iotham, to Iotham Vrias, to Vrias Nerias, to Nerias Odeas, to Odeas Saldum, to Saldum Elcias, to Elcias Sareas, to Sareas Ioſadoch, who was carried away priſoner into Babylon: all which haue ſucceeded in the prieſtF hood by lineall deſcent. When Nabuchodonoſor was come to Babylon, he ſhut vp Sedechias in priſon, where he kept him vntill he died, and after his death he honoured him with a royall tombe. Hee likewiſe offered the veſſels that he had taken out of the Temple of Ieruſalem vnto his gods, and cauſed the people to inhabite the countrey of Babylon, deliuering the high Prieſt from his bonds. The generall Nabuzardan that led the people away captiue, left the poorer ſort in the country of Iudæa; and thoſe alſo that voluntarily yeelded themſelues vnto him, ouer whom he appointed Godolias the ſonne of Aicam gouernour (a man that was both vpright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their aſſigned tribute to the king. Hee drewe the Prophet Ieremie alſo out of priſon, perſwading him to repaire with him to the king of Babylon; telling him that hee had receiued expreſſe commandement from the king, to furniſh him with all things neceſſarie for that iourney: but if hee were not contented to repaire to Babylon, hee ſhould declare vnto him in what place he would make his aboad, to the intent hee might certifie the king thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or ſoiourne in any other place, deſiring rather to liue amidſt the ruines of his countrey, and among the pitious reliques of his poore nation. G

Godolias captaine of the fugitiues.

Ieremy ſet at libertie by the Babylonian, and richly offered and preſented.

When the generall Nabuzardan vnderſtood his reſolution, he gaue charge to the gouernour Godolias (whom he left in Iudæa) to haue care of him, and to furniſh him with all that which he wanted, and after he had gratified him with preſents, hee departed. Meane while Ieremy dwelt in the Citie of Maſphath, praying Nabuzardan that hee would ſend him his diſciple Baruch (the ſon of Neria, a man of a noble family, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as theſe that during the ſiege of Ieruſalem were retired out of the Citie, vnderſtood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they aſſembled together from all parts, and came to Maſphath to Godolias, vnder the conduct of Iohn the ſon of Careas, and Iezanais and Sareas, and others. And beſides theſe, a certaine man called Iſmael of the bloud royall, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the ſiege of the Citie, had retired himſelfe to Bathal king of the Ammonites, and had ſoiourned with him during all the troubles. Who being in this ſort aſſembled before him, Godolias counſelled to remaine in that countrey without any feare of the Babylonians, promiſing that in manuring their land they ſhould incurre no inconuenience. All which he confirmed vnto them by an oath, adding further, that if any diſturbance were offered to any man, hee would readily aſſiſt him. Hee gaue each one this aduice likewiſe, to inhabite any Citie that beſt liked them; promiſing them to ſend them thither, with ſuch thinges as appertained to them, to build them houſes and furniſh their habitation; promiſing them that when time ſerued, hee would make their prouiſion of corne, wine, and oyle for their maintenance during the winter time: which when he had propoſed theſe conditions vnto them, hee gaue them leaue to depart, and inhabite the countrey whereſoeuer they beſt liked. Now when the rumour ran amongſt the people of Iudæa, that Godolias had thus curteouſly entertained thoſe that were fugitiues, & how he had permitted them to inhabite & till the countrey (prouided that they payd their tribute to the Babylonian) diuers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the countrey. And Iohn and the other gouernours being with him, and aſſured both of his clemencie and courteſie, began entirely to loue him. For which cauſe they told him, that Bathal king of the Ammonites had ſent Iſmael to murther him by ſom trecherie, that by that means he might haue the dominiõ ouer the Iſraelites that remained, in that he was of the bloud royal. Aſſuring him, that the means of his deliuerance from that treaſon, was, if ſo be he would command them to kill Iſmael in ſecret: aſſuring him on the contrary ſide, that they feared, that if Iſmael ſhould happen to kill him, their whole nation that remained, was like to fall to vtter ruine. But Godolias tolde him plainly, "that theſe ſtratagems they intended, were practiſed againſt a man that had receiued pleaſure at "his hands; and that it was not likely that hee whom hee had ſuccoured during the time of his ne- "ceſſitie, would be ſo wicked or impious againſt his benefactor, as to attempt to murther him, "whom in any occaſion or neceſſitie hee could not but to his great ſhame and indignitie, either "flie or forſake. Yea, ſaid he, although thoſe things were true which you informe me of, yet had I "rather die, then oppreſſe a man that hath committed his life to my truſt. For which cauſe Iohn "and the reſt (ſeeing their perſwaſions were in vaine (departed from him. Some thirtie daies after, Iſmael (accompanied with ten men) came to Maſphath to Godolias, who receiued them with preſents and magnificent entertainment, ſo that to expreſſe to Iſmael and his companions how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk ſo hard that he was ſomwhat ouerſeen with wine. Now when Iſmael perceiued him to be in that key, and ouerloaden with drinke and ſleepe, hee ſtept vnto him with his ten aſſociates, & cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him companie at the banquet: after which murther, he iſſued out by night and ſlew all the Iewes that were left in the citie, & thoſe Babylonian ſoldiers alſo that were left in garriſon in that place. The next day there came foureſcore men of the countrey to Godolias with preſents, being vtterly ignorant of that which had hapned. Iſmael knowing them, called them vnto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as ſoone as they were entred, he locked the court and ſlew them, and afterwards caſt their bodies into a deepe ditch, to the intent they might not bee diſcouered. Of this number there

A there were ſome that eſcaped, who beſought him that they might not bee put to death, before they had deliuered certaine moueables, garments and corne that they had hidden in the field: which when Iſmael vnderſtood, he ſpared them: but he kept them priſoners that were in Maſphath, with their wiues and children, in the number of whom were the daughters of Sedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired backe againe to the king of the Ammonites. Iohn and the gouernours of his companie, vnderſtanding of the acts committed by Iſmael in Maſphath, and aboue all, of the murther of Godolias, they were wonderfully diſpleaſed: ſo that each of them aſſembling his priuate force, iſſued forth to purſue and perſecute Iſmal, whō they ouertooke neere vnto a fountaine in Hebron. The priſoners that were with Iſmael, ſeeing Iohn his confederates, tooke courage, ſuppoſing that it was ſome ſuccors that came to help them, B and forſooke him that led them, and began to ioyne with Iohns followers; and thus fled Iſmael with his eight men, to the King of the Ammonites.. Iohn gathering together all thoſe whom he had reſcued from Iſmaels hands, both Eunuches, women, and children, retired into a certaine place called Mandra, where he ſoiourned all that day, reſoluing from thence to depart into Ægypt, fearing leaſt the Babylonians ſhould put him to death, if they ſhould remaine in Iudæa, for that they would be diſpleaſed with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the gouernment.

Iohn releaſeth Iſmaels captiues.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with theſe deliberations; they addreſſed themſelues to the Prophet Ieremie, beſeeching him to enquire of God, and to certifie them, what it behooued them to do in this their doubtfull eſtate, binding themſelues by an oath to do that which Ieremy ſhould C command them. Heereupon the Prophet promiſed that hee would aske counſell of God for them: and ſome ten daies after, God appeared vnto him, and willed him to certifie Iohn, the gouernours, and the reſt of the people, that if they inhabited Iudæa he would aſſiſt them, and haue care of them, and keepe them ſo, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) ſhould doe them no harme: but if they departed into Ægypt, he would abandon them, and would be ſo incenſed againſt them, that he ſhould thrall them in the like miſerie, as their brethren had indured in times paſt. Whileſt the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not beleeue him, in that he commanded them to remaine in that place by Gods preſcript ordinance: but they imagined that vnder a falſe pretext of Gods command, hee had counſelled them thereto, but that in effect he ſpake in fauour of his diſciple Baruch, perſwading them to ſtay there, to the end they might be D conſumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counſell which God gaue them by the Prophet: both Iohn and the reſt of the multitude went into Ægypt, and led with them both Baruch and Ieremie. Whither they were no ſooner come, but God told the Prophet that the Babylonian ſhould lead his army into Egypt; for which cauſe he willed him to foretell the people that Egypt ſhould be deſtroied, and that they ſhould partly be ſlaine in that place, and partly led captiue to Babylon. Which came in like manner to paſſe: for in the fift yeere after the deſtruction of Ieruſalem (which was the three and twentieth yeere of the raigne of Nabuchodonoſor) Nabuchodonoſor in his owne perſon led his army into Cœloſyria, and hauing conquered the ſame, he made war vpon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought theſe nations vnder his obeiſance, he went and fought againſt the king of Ægypt, and ouercame him: and after hee had E ſlaine their king that gouerned at that time, and planted another in his place, hee afterwards tooke the Iewes that he found in that countrey, and carried them priſoners into Babylon. By this meanes we haue learned, that the eſtate of the Hebrews being brought to this point, hath bin tranſlated twice to the other ſide of Euphrates. For the people of the two tribes were captiued by the Aſſyrians, during the raigne of Oſeas; and conſequently that of the two tribes, vnder Nabuchodonoſor king of the Babylonians and Chaldees vpon the taking in of Ieruſalem. True it is that Salmanazar, after he had diſplaced the Iſraelites, planted the Cutheans in their place, who before time inhabited the innermoſt of the countries of Perſia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian hauing led the two tribes priſoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

Iohn asketh counſaile of God, and being informed refuſeth the ſame.

tions, whom he subdued by force. He allowed them victuall from his owne table, and they were G taught and instructed in the discipline of the countrey, and in the Chaldee tongue. These were very apt to learne wisedome: and for that cause hee commanded that they should be trained vp in the exercise thereof. Of these there were foure of Zedechias kindred, faire in body, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Misael, and Azarias; whose names the Babylonian changed, and willed them to be called by other names, distinct and different from their owne.
Daniel was called Balthasar; Ananias, Sidrach; Misael, Misach; and Azarias, Abdenago. These did the King esteeme very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attaine vnto learning and wisdome, wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cause highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinsemen thought good to liue au-sterely, and to abstaine from those meates that came from the Kings table, and in generall from all things that had life, they went to Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge ouer H them) beseeching him to conuert those meates to his owne vse, which were sent them from the Kings table, and allowe them herbes and dates, and such things as had no life; becausse they intended to hold that course of life, and to forsake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condiscend vnto their demands; but that he feared, least being called for by the King, they should be found to be leane in body, and discolored in face (for without doubt in following that diet, they must needly lose their colours, and bee lesse dispost in comparison of others) which might be the cause to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiuing that Askenas intended nought else but his securitie, perswaded him to allow them but ten daies of approbation, vnder condition that if by that regiment of diet their habitude of bodie should not be any waies altered, they might continue in that fashion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they should be found leane and weake, and lesse proportionable (then they I that fed vpon the Kings allowance) that then they should returne to their accustomed diet. Now it so fell out, that not onely their bodies were better in grouth, but they seemed rather better fed, and of a taller stature then the rest: so that they that liued vpon the Kings ordinarie, seemed leane and wearish; whereas Daniel and his companions made shewe, as if they had beene nourished with dainties, and brought vp in aboundance. From that time forward, Askenas tooke all that which was allowed the foure young men from the Kings table, and boldly kept it to himselfe, gi-uing them in stead thereof, the diet that they chose and delighted in. They hauing their spirits more pure and subtill to comprehend their masters instructions, and their bodies more strong to endure labour (for their spirits were not charged with diuersitie of meates, nor their bodies effeminated for the same cause) attained the more readily to al that doctrine that was taught them by K the Hebrewes and Chaldees: Daniel especially hauing profited in wisedome, studied the interpretation of dreames, and God appeared vnto him. Two yeares after the surprisall of Ægypt, King Nabuchodonozor dreamed a wonderfull dreame, the issue whereof God made him see in a dreame: but he forgate the same when he arose out of his bed. And for that cause sent he for his Chaldees and diuines, telling them that hee had dreamed a dreame, but that hee had forgot the same, commanding them to declare vnto him what the dreame was, and the signification therof also. Whereunto they answered, that it was impossible for men to sound out the secret therof; notwithstanding they promised him, that if he would declare his vision vnto them, they would cause him to vnderstand the signification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonozor threatned them with death, except they represented his dreame vnto him; and they protesting that they could not fulfill his request, hee commanded them all to be slaine. But Daniel hearing how the King L had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both hee and his companions had part in that danger, addressed himselfe to Ariochus the captaine of the Kings guard, requiring him to informe him, for what cause the King had adiudged the Chaldees and sages to be put to death:
And hauing intelligence what had hapned as touching the dreame, & how the king by forgetting the same, had charged them to inform him therin, & how they had answered that it was impossible for them to perform the same, and how thereby they had prouoked the King to displeasure:
he besought Ariochus to goe vnto the King, and to procure one nights reprieue in the behalfe of the Ægyptians and Chaldees, in that hee hoped during that night time to beseech God and in-treat from him both the dreame and the signification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King M what Daniel had requested, who respited the execution of the Magicians for that night, vntill he might see what would become of Daniels promise: who retiring himselfe with his companions into his chamber, besought God all the night long to manifest vnto him the dreame, and deli-uer the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom both hee and the rest of his companions

companions were like to die, except he might know what the king had dreampt the night past, and what was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (hauing compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniels wisedome) signified vnto him both the dreame and the signification thereof, to the intent the King might bee resolued in the meaning thereof. The yeere of the world, 3363. before Christs Nativitie, 601.

Daniel hauing receiued the truth from God, arose very ioyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gaue them courage and hope of life. Hauing therefore rendred thanks vnto God, for that he had had compassion of their young yeares, as soone as it was day he went vnto Arioch, requesting him that he might be brought to the Kings presence, certifying him that hee would open vnto him the dreame which he had seene the night passe. Now when Daniel was brought vnto the kings presence, he besought him that he would not esteeme him to bee more wise then the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his dreame, hee did attempt to expresse the same: for that came not to passe, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had compassion on vs that were in danger of death; and at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my country-men life, he hath certified me both of your dreame, and the signification thereof. I was not so much aggrieued for that in our innocency wee were adiuged to death by thee, as affraide of thine estimation and glory, which was hazzarded by condemning so many and so innocent and iust men to death: whereas that which you haue required of them sauoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the onely worke of God: Whilest therefore thou thoughtest in thy selfe, who it was that should command the whole world after thy selfe; at such time as thou wert asleepe, God intending to let thee know all those that should gouerne after thee, presented thee with this dreame. It seemed vnto thee that thou sawest a great statue, wherof the head was of gold; the shoulders & armes of siluer; the belly and thighs of brasse; and the legges and feete of yron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was drawne from a mountaine) that fell vpon the statue, and beate downe and burst the same, and left no whole peece thereof: so that the gold, siluer, yron, and brasse, were powdred as small as dust: whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was borne away and scattered into diuers countries: on the other side the stone grew so mightie, that it seemed to fill the whole earth. This was that vision that appeared vnto you, the signification whereof is expressed after this manner. The head of gold signifieth your selfe (and those kings of Babylon that haue been before you.) The two hands and shoulders signifie that your Empire shall be destroied by 2. kings, the one part by the king of the east, cloathed in brasse, whose force shall be abated by another power, resembling that of yron; and he shall haue the power ouer the whole earth, by reason of the nature of yron which is more strong then gold, siluer, or brasse, hee tolde the king also what that stone signified. But for mine owne part; I thought it not expedient to expresse in this place: because the only butte and intent of my writings is onely to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man haue a desire to know these things; and cannot bridle his curiositie, but will vnderstand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shal find amidst the sacred scriptures. When king Nabuchodonosor had heard these things, and remembred himselfe of his dream, he was astonished at Daniels wisedome, and casting himselfe prostrate on the earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giuing direction that sacrifice should be offered vnto him, as if he were God. Moreouer he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdome to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their maligners and detractors, hapned to fall into most imminent and dreadfull danger, vpon the occasion that ensueth. The King built a golden Image sixtie cubites high, and sixe in bigenesse, and erected it in a great Plaine neere vnto Babylon: and beeing readie to dedicate the same, he assembled all the gouernours and princes of his countries, commanding them first of all, that as soone as they should heare the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselues on the earth to adore the statue; threatning that whosoeuer should doe the contrarie, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue vpon the sound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his companions vtterly refused to performe that dutie, alledging for their iustification that they would not transgresse the lawes of their country: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods prouidence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burne during their aboad in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies bodies that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made them in greater estimation with the King, for that hee saw they were vertuous and beloued of God: and for that cause they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the king saw another vision in his sleepe, which signified vnto him, that being cast from his Empire, he should conuerse with sauage beasts, and that hauing liued in that estate in the desart for the space of seuen yeeres, hee should recouer his kingdome againe. Hauing had this dreame, hee assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them, either to finde out, or declare the intelligence of this dreame vnto the King: Onely Daniel discouered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the king passed the forelimited time in the desart, so that no man durst intermeddle with the affaires of estate during seuen yeeres. But after he had called vpon God, that it would please him to restore him to his kingdome, he repossessed the same againe. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particularities, according as I haue found them written in holy bookes: for in the entrance of my history I haue answered those obiections: so that I haue openly protested, that I will onely faithfully translate the Hebrew Histories into the Greeke tongue: and according to my promise, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine owne, or concealing ought of another mans. After that Nabuchodonosor had raigned forty three yeeres, he died: he was a man of execution, and more happy then any of his predecessors. Berosus maketh mention of his actes in the third booke of the Chaldaique Historie, where he speaketh thus. His Father Nabuchodonosor, hauing notice that the Gouernour whom hee had appointed ouer Ægypt, and the neighbouring parts of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, was reuolted from him (being at that time in himselfe vnable to indure the troubles of warre) committed a part of his forces vnto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, who was in the flower of his age, and sent him forth against him: who encountring the Rebell, and fighting with him, ouercame him, and brought the countrey vnder his subiection. Meanewhile, Nabuchodonosor the Father died of a sickneſse in Babylon, after hee had raigned one and twentie yeeres. Nabuchodonosor the Sonne, hauing notice of his Fathers death, gaue order to the affaires of Ægypt, and the rest of the countrey: and committing the care and transportation of the Iewes, Syrians, Ægyptians, and Phœnicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his army and carriage, he with a few men made hastie iourneyes thorow the desart. And when hee had taken the administration of the kingdome vpon him (which in his absence was in the hands of the Chaldees, and by their Chiefetaine was reserued vntill his returne, vnto his vse) he became Lord of all his Fathers Empire. When his prisoners were arriued, hee assigned them conuenient dwelling places in the countrey of Babylon; and with the spoiles of warre, hee magnificently repaired and decked the Temple of Bell, and other places. Hee enlarged the olde Citie, and repaired and beautified it with other buildings: by meanes whereof, they that would besiege the same, were hindred from cutting off of the current of the riuer, to the preiudice of the inhabitants. He enuironed it inwardly with a trebble wall, and outwardly with as mighty and as many enclosures, and made all of burnt bricke. The walles were magnificently builded, and the gates brauely adorned in manner of Temples. He caused a Palace to be builded neere vnto his Fathers ancient Palace: the magnificence and ornament whereof, I am too weake witted to expresse; onely this thing most memorable, I haue thought good to note downe, that these huge, great and pompous Buildings were finished in fifteene dayes. In this Palace hee had vaults raised so high, that in outward appearance they seemed to be mountaines, on which all sorts of trees were planted. He deuised and prepared also a goodly garden, and called it the hanging garden, because his wife (hauing beene brought vp in the countrey of Media) desired to haue a place conformable to that of her birth. Megasthenes in the fourth booke of his Indian Historie, maketh mention of this garden in that place, where he enforced himselfe to prooue, that this King surpassed Hercules in valour and execution of worthy actions. For he said, that Nabuchodonosor ouercame the chiefe Citie of Lybia, and a great part of Spaine. Diocles in the second booke of the Persian Historie, and Philostratus in his Phœnician and Indian Historie, make mention of this King, saying that he ouercame the citie of Tyre, at the end of thirteene yeeres; as such time as Ithobal raigned ouer the Tyrians. This is the summe of all that which the Historiographers write as touching this King.

The yeere of the world, 3382. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 582.

AFTER Nabuchodonoſors death, his ſonne Euilmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incontinently deliuered Iechonias king of Ieruſalem out of priſon, and helde him in the number of his moſt eſteemed friends, and gaue him preſents, and committed the gouernment of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his Father had not kept his promiſe with Iechonias, when he ſurrendred himſelfe, his wife, children, and friends into his hands, in the behalfe of his countrey, and to the intent that the City of Ieruſalem ſhould not be raſed by thoſe that beſieged it, as we haue heretofore declared. Euilmerodach died in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne and Nigliſar hiſſonne obtained the kingdome, which he poſſeſſed forty yeeres, and afterward died. After him the ſucceſſion of the kingdome came vnto his ſonne called Laboſardach, which continued in him but for the ſpace of nine moneths, and after his death it came vnto Balthaſar, who by the Babylonian was called Naboandel. Againſt him Cyrus king of Perſia, and Darius king of Media made warre; and at ſuch time as he was beſieged in Babylon, there hapned a maruailous and prodigious ſpectacle.

Euilmerodach releaſeth Iechonias from his long impriſonment. 4. Reg. 25. Ierem 52. Nigliſar. Laboſardach. Balthaſar or Naboandel king of Babylon.

Balthaſar ſate vpon a certaine feſtiuall in a royall chamber, where hee was ſerued with great ſtore of veſſell fit for his maieſtie and royalty; and with him at the banquet there ſate his concubines, and moſt intireſt friends. At which time (to ſhew his magnificence) hee cauſed thoſe veſſels to be brought out of the temple of his God, which Nabuchodonoſor his predeceſſor (fearing to employ to his owne vſe) had ſtored vp in his Idols temple. But Balthaſar was ſo puffed with pride that he dranke out of them, and imployed them to his vſes. Now ſo came it to paſſe, that whileſt hee quaffed, and blaſphemed the name of God, he ſawe a hand iſſuing from a wall, which wrote in the ſame certaine ſyllables: by which viſion being ſomewhat terrified, he aſſembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and al that ſort of people (who amongſt thoſe barbarous nations made profeſſion to interprete prodigies and dreames) to the intent they might ſignifie vnto him the meaning and vnderſtanding of that writing. Now when theſe Magicians had tolde him that they could in no ſort ſound or vnderſtand the ſame, the king was ſore vexed and troubled at his vnexpected viſion: whereupon he cauſed it to bee proclaimed thorow his countrey, that whoſoeuer ſhould reade that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, hee would giue him a golden chaine, and a purple robe (ſuch as the king of Chaldees wore) and beſides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magicians aſſembled together with greater concourſe, and were farre more diligent and inquiſitiue to finde out the ſignification of the writing: but they were no leſſe grounded therein then they were at the firſt. Meane while, the kings grandmother ſeeing him wholly amated in minde, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certaine man amongſt the priſoners of Iuda, led thither at ſuch time as Nabuchodonoſor deſtroied Ieruſalem whoſe name was Daniel, a man wiſe and expert in ſearching out of things that were impoſſible, and onely knowne vnto God, who euidently expounded that which Nabuchodonoſor required, at ſuch time, as no other man could ſatisfie his demand. Whereupon the king called him vnto his preſence, and telling him what proofes he had heard of his wiſedome, & of that diuine ſpirit that was in him, and how he only was fit to enterprete thoſe things which otherwiſe were obſcured from other mens knowledge; he praied him to informe him what that hand writing ſignified, promiſing him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chaine, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with theſe titles for his wiſedome, he might grow famous amongſt all men, who demanding the reaſon, ſhould know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refuſing all theſe preſents of his, in that the wiſedome that is giuen from aboue is not corrupted thereby, but is freely anſwerable to thoſe that haue neede thereof) told him that that writing did foretell him the end of his life, becauſe he had not learned to feare God, neither to lift vp his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithſtanding he had ſeene the chaſtiſement wherewith his predeceſſor had beene puniſhed, for the outrages he committed againſt God. For that Nabuchodonoſor hauing beene driuen to lead his life amongſt beaſts by reaſon of his impieties, after diuers requeſts and ſupplications had obtained mercy, and was returned vnto humane conuerſation, and into his owne kingdome, for which cauſe all the time of his life he praiſed Almighty God the gouernour of all things: whereas hee had omitted to doe the like, and had blaſphemed the name of God in diuers ſorts, and had ſwilled both himſelfe and

and his concubines in the vessels dedicated to God : For this cause God was displeased with him, and certified him by this writing, what end hee should expect. Whereupon hee expounded the writings in these tearmes. Mane (which is as much to say, as number) sheweth that God hath numbred the daies of thy life and dominion, which shall endure but a little while. Thekel signifieth a ballance; God therefore (said he) waying the gouernment sheweth that it shall be ouerthrowne : Phares, this word signifieth a fragment, God shall breake thy kingdome, and shall diuide it amongst the Medes, and Persians. When the king had heard this interpretation, hee was very sorrowfull (according as the nature of things so disastrous, and so apparant required.) Notwithstanding he delaied not to performe those presents which he had promised the prophet, although (as he well perceiued) the words aboaded him ill, and gaue him all that which he promised him, considering with himselfe, that it was his owne destinie that he ought to accuse, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithstanding they were very vnsauorie in his eare. Not long after, this Balthasar and the City were ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus king of Persia and his army. For this was that Balthasar, vnder whom, and in the seuenteenth yeare of whose raigne, the surprisal of Babylon hapned. This as farre as I could gather, was the end of king Nabuchodonosors posterity.

Daniel interpreteth the writing to the king.

The king performeth his promises to Daniel.

Babylon surprised by Cyprus king of Persia.

Darius, who (with his allie Cyprus) had destroied the estate of the Babylonians, was threescore and two yeeres olde at such time as he tooke Babylon. He was Astyages sonne, and is otherwaies called by the Greekes. He tooke the Prophet Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him neere vnto him, doing him much honour : for he was of the number of the three gouernors whom hee constituted ouer three hundreth and threescore prouinces; for so had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloued by Darius, and onely trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grieuously hated : for they are most hainously hated, who haue greatest interest in Princes fauours. Whereas therefore they that were iealous of the good esteeme which he had with Darius, sought occasion to calumniate and backbite him, he warily cut off all opportunitie thereof; for he would neither be bribed with siluer, nor corrupted with presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonesty, to receiue gifts after a man had done any curtesies. He therefore gaue his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. Yet notwithstanding, they seeing they could finde no hole in his coate, whereby his honour might be touched, blamed, or calumniated, they sought out a new meanes to disgrace him. For they perceiuing that Daniel did thrice euery day make his prayer vnto God, they supposed that they had found a iust pretext to worke his ruine. For which cause they came vnto Darius, certifying him that the princes and gouernours had concluded together to this effect : That for thirty dayes space an intermission should be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawfull for them to demand any thing, neither of himselfe, or of any man or God whatsoeuer; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered that he should be cast into the Lyons denne. But the king perceiuing not the drift of their malice, nor how they sought by this deuise to entrap Daniel, told them that he liked of the decree, and promised to confirme the same, and propounded a publike edict, wherein the princes resolutions were ratified. Now whilest all men endeuoured thorow feare, carefully and diligently to obserue this edict. Daniel set light thereby, and according to his accustomed manner standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed vnto him. Whereupon, the Princes (hauing got that occasion which they long expected) came readily vnto the king, and accused Daniel for that he only amongst the rest had presumed to infringe their decree: vrging moreouer, that he did it not for the religion sake that was in him, but because he was obserued and watcht by his maligners. And for that they feared least Darius by reason of the great affection hee bare vnto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding hee had transgressed their edict) they concluded vpon no milder iudgement, but that he might bee cast into the Lyons denne, according to the forme of the edict. Darius hoping that God would deliuer Daniel, and that no harme should befall him by the iawes of wilde beasts, exhorted him patiently to endure that aduenture. Now as soone as he was cast into the denne, the king sealed vp the stone that closed the mouth thereof, and departed, spending all that night without repast or repose, so grieuously was he distempered in Daniels behalfe. And when the day was come, as soone as he arose he came vnto the den, and finding the seale vnbroken wherewith he had marked the stone, hee opened the same, and called vnto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were whole and in safetie. Hee hearing the king speake, answered that he had receiued no hurt: whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lyons den. A ueniences (becauſe that God had taken care of him) would not that he ſhould eſcape: and thereupon told the King that the Lyons did neither touch nor approch Daniel, becauſe they had beene fed and gorged before. For which cauſe, the King diſpleaſed with their iniurious malice, commanded a quantity of fleſh to be caſt vnto the Lyons; and when they were glutted, he willed that Daniels enemies ſhould bee caſt among them, to the intent hee might know whether the Lyons would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius ſaw very manifeſtly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as ſoone as the Nobles were caſt into the den, the Lyons ſpared not one of them, but tore them all in peeces, as if they had beene hungry and without meate. I ſuppoſe that theſe Lyons hauing beene a little before glutted with meate, did not annoy theſe men by reaſon of their famine; but I rather iudge that their malignitie
B did whet on their furie: for when as God ſo pleaſeth, vnreaſonable creatures doe iuſtice vpon malignant and enuious men. Daniels aduerſaries being in this ſort exterminate and deſtroyed, Darius gaue notice hereof to all the ſubiects of his prouinces, prayſing that God whom Daniel adored; ſaying, that hee was the onely true God, who had all power: he honoured Daniel likewiſe with eſpeciall regard, eſteeming him amongſt the chiefeſt of his familiars. Hee therefore beeing thus famous and admirable (becauſe hee was beloued by God) builded in Ecbatane in the countrey of the Medes a magnificent caſtell, and a maruellous monument that remaineth euen vnto this day, which ſeemeth to thoſe that looke thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that verie day which they behold the ſame; the beautie thereof ſeemeth ſo liuing and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no ſort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they
C waxe olde and are enfeebled by yeeres, and loſe their beauty; at this day all the Kings of Media, Perſia, and Parthia, are entombed in this Caſtell, and the charge thereof is committed to a Prieſt, who is a Iew: and this cuſtome continueth euen vntill this day. Neither is that to be buried in ſilence, which is worthy eſpeciall admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicitie that was incident to a moſt famous Prophet, attended him; and during his whole life time hee was both moſt highly honoured by kings, and reuerenced by the common ſort: and after his death his memorie is perdurable. For all the bookes which he left in writing, are read amongſt vs euen at this preſent; and we haue beene perſwaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For hee hath not onely prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets haue done) but alſo hath determined the time wherein thoſe things ſhould happen. And whereas other Pro-
D phets were accuſtomed to foretell aduerſities, and for that occaſion were miſliked both by Princes and their people, Daniel foretolde them alwaies good ſucceſſe: ſo that he hath drawne vnto him the good will of all men, by reaſon of thoſe pleaſing predictions that hee pronounced; and by the iſſues thereof, he hath obtained a teſtimonie of truth, and a reputation likewiſe of diuinity, and hath left vs certaine writings, by which, hee hath manifeſtly declared the immutabilitie and exact certainetie of his prophecies.

It is ſaid, that beeing at Suſa the Metropolitane Citie of Perſia, at ſuch time as hee walked abroad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earthquake with a great noiſe: ſo that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon beeing ſore troubled, hee fell vpon his face, and both his hands: at which time ſome one touched him, and commanded him
E to ſtand vp, and to ſee that which ſhould happen to his countrey-men after diuers ages. Beeing therefore raiſed vpright, there was a great Ramme ſhewed vnto him, that had diuers hornes, the laſt whereof was the greateſt of all. Afterwards he looked towards the weſt, and perceiued a goat carried thorow the ayre, that butted at the Ramme, and hauing encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him vnder his feete. Thirdly, he ſaw a Goat, in whoſe forehead there grew one great horne onely: which beeing broken, foure others brake out in ſtead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure winds of the world. He hath written alſo, that from them, there ſhall ariſe another little one alſo, which as God (who preſented the viſion to him) tolde him, being growne to perfection, ſhould warre againſt the whole nation of the Iewes, and take the Citie by force, and confound the eſtate of the Temple, and hinder the ſacrifices, for one thouſand two

CYRVS King of Persia dismisseth the Iewes from Babylon, and permitteth them to returne into their countrey, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

THE first yeare of the raigne of Cyrus (which was the seuentieth after that our nation was translated from Iudæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captiuitie and calamity of his poore afflicted people: and euen as he had B foretold them before the destruction of the City, that after they had serued Nabuchodonosor and his posterity for seuenty yeeres, he would againe restore them to their countrey wherein they were borne, where they should build a Temple, and enioy their former felicity, so brought he it to passe. For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus, and made him write his letters throughout al Asia to this effect. Thus saith the King Cyrus: Since the Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world; I am perswaded that it is he whom the Iewish nation doe adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was borne, and hath said that I shall build his temple in Ierusalem, which is in the countrey of Iudæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a booke of prophecie written by Isay, two hundred and ten yeers before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reueale these things vnto him, C speaking to this effect, I will that Cyrus, whom I haue declared King ouer many nations, shal send my people back into their country of Iudæa, & shall build my temple. These things did Isay foretell one hundreth and forty yeeres before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being rauished in admiration of the Maiesty of God) was surprised with an affection and zeale to finish that which was written. He therfore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Iewes that were in Babylon, and tolde them that he gaue them licence to returne into their countrey, and to repaire the city of Ierusalem, and erect the Temple of God; promising them that he himselfe would assist them. And to that effect he wrote vnto his gouernours, and princes of those countries that confined vpon Iudæa: charging them to contribute both golde and siluer towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with cattell for the sacrifice. After D that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, with all the Leuites and Priestes departed thence, and repaired to Ierusalem: Natheles diuers of the Iewes remained in Babylon, in that they were loath to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soon as they came vnto the Kings friends, they affoorded them both fauour and aide, and furnished them with necessary matter to build the temple, some of them with gold, other some with siluer, and the rest with a certaine number of oxen and horses. Thus paied they their vowes vnto God, and offered the sacrifices according to the ancient custome, as if the city had bin new builded again, and the ancient seruice of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them backe also those vessels consecrated to God, which king Nabuchodonosor had sent vnto Babylon after he had spoiled the temple; and deliuered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding E him to carry and commit them to Abassars hands, who should haue the custody therof, vntill the temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleate, he might deliuer them to the priests and princes of the people, to be restored again to the seruice of the temple. He sent letters also to the gouernours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King of Sisine, and Sarabasame, health. I haue permitted those Iewes that inhabit my countrey, to returne into their natiue countrey, and to reedifie their City, and erect the temple of God in Ierusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I haue also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, with expresse charge & authority, to lay the foundations of the same, & to build it sixtie cubits in height, and as many in bredth; making three Isles of hewen stone, & an other of such timber as the country affoordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer sacrifice vnto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of all these things come out of my cofers. I haue also sent backe those ves- F sels which Nabuchodonosor took out of the temple, and haue deliuered them to the treasurer Mithridates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Iewes, to be conueyed to Ierusalem, and restored to the temple of God: the number whereof I haue hereunder subscribed. Fifty lauers of gold, and foure hundreth of siluer; fifty pots of gold, and foure hundreth of siluer, fiftie golden sieues, & fiue hundreth of siluer; thirty Ewers of gold, and three hundreth of siluer; thirty great viols of gold, and two thousand foure hundreth of siluer; and besides all these, one thousand other great

WHILEST theſe men laide the foundations of the Temple, and were very affectionately buſie about the building thereof, the nations that bordered vpon them, and in eſpeciall the Chuteans (whom Salmanazar King of Aſſyria ſent from Perſia and Media to inhabite in Samaria, at ſuch time as he tranſlated the people of the ten Tribes) incited the Princes and Gouernours,to interdict the Iewes for raiſing and building their Citie,and reedi- I fying the Temple. Who corrupted with ſiluer,ſold their negligence,and delay to the Chuteans, which they vſed in thoſe buildings. For Cyrus intending his other warres, was ignorant hereof, and hauing conducted his armie againſt the Maſſagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finiſh his life. When as therefore Cambyſes his Sonne had obtained the kingdome,they of Syria and Phœ-nicia,the Ammonites,Moabites, and Samaritanes wrote their letters to Cambyſes in theſe termes.
O King,thy ſeruants Rathimus the Secretarie, Semelius the Scribe,and thoſe men that are Counſellers in Syria and Phœnicia,giue thee to vnderſtand,that thoſe Iewes that were led captiue into Babylon,are returned backe into this countrey,and doe build a wicked and rebellious Citie, and repaire the places and walles of the ſame, and reedifie their Temple likewiſe. Know therefore " that if theſe things be permitted to be finiſhed, that they will no more endure to bee thy ſubiects
" and tributaries, but will oppoſe themſelues againſt their Kings, holding it more fit to command K
" then to obey. Wee haue therefore thought good that whileſt they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their Temple,to write vnto your Maieſty,to the intent you may not neglect to examine your Fathers records,wherein you ſhall alwaies finde that the Iewes haue beene Rebels, and enemies to their Kings; and that the Citie hath beene for this cauſe laid deſolate vntill this preſent. Wee haue thought good to ſignifie thus much to your Maieſtie, which perhaps is
" vnknowne vnto you, becauſe that if this citie be once more reinhabited and incloſed with a wall,
" your way is ſhut vp from paſſing into Cœloſyria and Phœnice.

CAMBYSES inhibiteth the Iewes to build the Temple.

Cambyſes anſwer wherein he inhibiteth the Iewes from building the Citie or Temple.

WHEN Cambyſes had read this letter (in that he was by nature both wicked and malicious) hee grew inwardly iealous and diſpleaſed at the contents thereof, and wrote backe againe after this manner. The King Cambyſes to Rathymus the Secretarie,of his caſuall euents,and to Belſem and Semelius Scribes,and to all his other Counſellers and inhabitants in Samaria and Phœnicia, health. Hauing read your letters, I haue commanded the records of " mine anceſtors to be examined,and I find that the Citie of Ieruſalem hath bin alwaies enemie to " their kings,and that the inhabitants thereof haue alwaies raiſed ſedition and wars. I haue likewiſe
" found,that their Kings haue bin mighty,and violent,and that they haue vexed Syria and Phœni- M
" cia with continuall tributes. For this cauſe I haue ordained,that the Iewes ſhall not be permitted " to reedifie their Citie, for feare leaſt their malice ſhould augment by ſuch occaſion which they
" haue continually vſed againſt their Kings. Incontinently after the receipt and reading of theſe letters, Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and thoſe of their faction,tooke their horſe and rode haſtily to Ieruſalem,leading with them a great number of people,prohibiting the Iewes from the building either of their Citie or Temple. Thus was this worke interrupted vntill the ſecond yeere of

A the raigne of Darius king of Perſia, for the ſpace of nine yeeres. For Cambyſes raigned ſixe yeeres, during which time he ſubdued Egypt, and vpon his returne from thence, he died in Damaſco. And after the death of Cambyſes, the Magi that held the Empire of the Perſians for the ſpace of one yeere being taken away, the ſeuen families of Perſia made Darius (the Sonne of Hyſtaſpis) King.

DARIVS the Sonne of HYSTASPIS cauſeth the Temple to be builded.

Hedio & Ruffinus. chap. 9. al. chap. 4.

Darius the ſon of Hiſtaſpis made Emperour of the Perſians.

B THIS Darius, during the time that hee liued a priuate life, made a vow vnto God, that if hee obtained the kingdome, he would ſend backe vnto the Temple of Ieruſalem all thoſe veſſels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the ſame time, Zorobabel, who was appointed Gouernour ouer the captiue Iewes, came vnto him from Ieruſalem. For he was the Kings ancient friend: for which cauſe hee with other two were choſen to be of his guard; and obtained thereby that honour which hee expected. The firſt yeere of the raigne of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pompe, and magnificence, both thoſe of his houſhold, as they alſo that were his Gouernours and Princes of Media and Perſia, and the Commanders in India confining vpon Æthiopia, with all the Chiefetaines of his Army, in one hundreth, twenty and ſeuen Prouinces. Now after they had made great cheere, and were full of wine, they departed each of them vnto their lodgings, to betake themſelues to reſt: But King Da-

Darius propoundeth three queſtions to three of his guard.

C rius laid in his bed, repoſed very little all the night long, but paſſed the time without ſleepe: for which cauſe ſeeing he could take no reſt, he began to deuiſe and diſcourſe with three of his guard, promiſing him that ſhould moſt truely and aptly anſwer thoſe queſtions that he ſhould demand, to grant him licence in way of reward to weare a purple garment, and to drinke in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, and to ride on a charriot harneſſed with gold, and to beare the Tiara or linnen wreath, and were a golden chaine about his necke, and ſit in the next place vnto the King; and ſhould likewiſe be called his kinſman in regard of his wiſedome. After he had made theſe large promiſes, he demanded of the firſt, whether wine were the ſtrongeſt? of the ſecond, whether the King were ſtronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the moſt ſtrongeſt of the three? And as ſoone as he had deliuered them theſe queſtions to deliberate vpon, he laid him downe to

3. Eſd. 4.

D reſt. Vpon the next morrow he ſent for the Princes, Chieftaines, and Gouernours of Perſia and Media, and afterwards ſitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accuſtomed to determine the differents among his ſubiects, hee commanded thoſe three yong men of his guard in the preſence of that Princely aſſiſtance, publikely to yeeld the reſolution of thoſe queſtions he had propoſed vnto them.

The firſt expreſſeth the power of wine

Whereupon, the firſt of them began after this manner to expreſſe the force of wine. Noble princes, when I conſider the force of wine, I find nothing that may ſurmount the ſame. For wine entangleth and deceiueth the vnderſtanding, and maketh the princes vnderſtanding like to the poore mans, who is abandoned; and giueth the ſlaue that freedome in diſcourſe, which appertaineth to men of greateſt libertie: It maketh the poore reſemble the rich: it changeth and tranſ-

E formeth the ſoule, aſſwageth the miſerable mans griefe, and maketh the indebted forget their bonds, and to thinke themſelues very rich; ſo that they ruminate on no abiect things, but talke of talents, and ſuch things as appertaine vnto the richer ſort: it cauſeth them to loſe all apprehenſion both of princes and kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth men againſt their greateſt friends, and maketh them ſuppoſe their neereſt welwillers to be ſtrangers; and when the wine concocted by night and ſleepe hath forſaken them, they riſe and know not what things they haue committed in their drunkenneſſe.

When the firſt of them had in this ſort declared his reſolution, as touching wine, he was ſilent; and the next began to ſpeake of the kings force, ſhewing that it was of mightie conſequence, and more powerfull then any other thing that ſeemeth to haue force and intelligence; and thus han-

F led hee the ſubiect of his demonſtration. Kings (ſaith hee) haue dominion ouer men, who haue the abilitie to enforce the earth, and at their pleaſure can command the ſea to ſerue them: Kings haue power and dominion ouer thoſe men who maſter and command the vntamed and mightieſt creatures; it therefore appeareth that their force and puiſſance exceedeth all theſe. If they command their ſubiects to wage warre, and to expoſe themſelues to danger, they are obedient: and if they ſend them out againſt their enemies, they willingly obey them by reaſon of their force: By their ordinance they leuel mountaines, beate downe walles, and race towers. And if they

The yeere of the world, 3443. before Christs Nativity, 521.

they command their subiects to kill or to be kild, they resist not, for feare least they should seeme G to transgresse the Kings commandement. When they haue obtained the victorie, all the glorie and profit of the warre redoundeth vnto the King. They likewise which beare no armes, but intend the tillage of the earth, after they haue trauailed and supported all the toyle of their tillage,
" reape and gather the fruits, to the end to pay the King his tribute: And if he will or command
" any thing, it must needly bee performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore,
" when the King is addicted to any pleasures, or entendeth to enioy his pleasant and delightful rest,
" during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were tied vnto
" him, thorow the feare and awe they haue of him: For not one of them dare forsake him when he
" sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their owne affaires, but intend those seruices only which " hee thinketh necessarie, which is the guard of his person. Who therefore will not esteeme the " Kings forces to be greater then any others, since so many people obey him in whatsoeuer, and H
" whensoeuer he commandeth?

Zorobabel, the third, expresseth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palme vnto truth.

After he had spoken to this effect; Zorobabel, who was the third, began to iustifie in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner. True it is, that wine hath much force, and no lesse true that all men obey the King; yet farre more mightie is the power of a woman. For by a woman the King was bred, and brought into this world, and those men that plant the vineyards where wines doe grow, are borne and nourished by women; and generally there is not any thing which wee enioy not by them. For they weaue vs garments, they haue the care and custodie of our houses; neither is it possible for vs to be seuered from women. Yea, they that possesse much
" gold and abundance of siluer, and other things of great and inestimable price; onely vpon the " sight of a faire woman forsake all these things, and will follow after the beautie which they be- I " held, and for onely possession thereof, content themselues to lose all things. We forsake likewise
" our father and mother, and the country that hath bred vs, and forget our friends for our wiues
" sake; yea wee will willingly content our selues to die with them. Yet is there a greater and fur" ther demonstration of the most mighty power of a woman. For whatsoeuer we trauell for, all " the paines that we endure both by land and sea, to the intent we may reape some fruits of our la" bours, doe we not carrie all this to giue vnto our wiues, as vnto those who are our mistresses? I
" haue seene the King likewise, who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the eare, by Apame the " daughter of Rhapsaces his concubine, and patiently endure when she tooke the Diadem from his " head, and set it on her owne. When shee laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, he " was displeased: and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his " affections to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased. K

" But whilest the Princes in way of admiration beheld one another, hee began to discourse of truth, saying: I haue alreadie declared what the force of women is; yet notwithstanding both
" the King and they are more feeble then truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mightie, the " heauen likewise of an immesurable height, and the sunne of vnspeakeable celeritie; and whereas
" the will of God both gouerneth and moueth these things (because God is iust and true) it there" fore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of all things; against which, iniustice may no waies " preuaile. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seeme to be of value, yet are they " mortall and of little continuance: but truth is immortall and euerlasting. Moreouer, all those " things which we receiue thereby, are neither mortall, neither subiect to the iniuries of time, for" tune, or alteration; but continue iust, and lawfull, and separated from all staine of iniustice.
" When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse: Wherupon, all L
the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most value, and that onely veritie had an immutable force, and an indeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to aske what he would, as touching that which he had promised to giue, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wisest, and best learned amongst the rest. For (said he) thou shalt sit henceforth next vnto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

Zorobabel obtained both praise & great rewards by his good discourse Darius being put in memory of his vow, commandeth that the temple should bee restored. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4

When the king had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vowe that the king had made, if so be at any time he obtained the kingdome: namely, that he would build Ieruса-lem, and the temple of God, and restore those vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabu- chodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O king is my request which you permit- M ted me to aske, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was iudged wise and well lettered by you. The king tooke great pleasure at these words of his, and arising from his throne kissed him. He wrote also vnto his gouernours and princes, that they should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the temple. Moreouer he sent letters to them of Syria and Phœ-nicia,

A nicia,commanding them to cut downe the Cedars of Libanus,and to ſend them to Ieruſalem towards the building of the citie; publiſhing a law that all Iewes ſhould be made free,if ſo be they would reſort into Iudæa; forbidding all commiſſaries and Princes, to impoſe any charge vpon the Iewes,for the neceſſities of the kingdome;permitting that all the countrey which they might occupy, might bee inhabited by them, and exempt from tributes: commanding the Idumæans, Samaritanes,and Cœloſyrians to reſtore thoſe lands vnto the Iewes which they vnlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And beſides that,to deliuer them in way of contribution fiftie talents of ſiluer towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary ſacrifice. He likewiſe commanded that all the neceſſaries and veſtments,which either the high Prieſt,or the ordinarie ſacrificers vſed in the ſeruice of God, ſhould be furniſhed at
B his charges. Hee willed alſo that the Leuites ſhould haue inſtruments of Muſicke deliuered vnto them,to praiſe God with; and that certaine portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the Citie,and the Temple. Moreouer he allowed them a certaine ſumme of money euery yeere for their ordinarie maintenance. After this,he ſent backe all thoſe veſſels which Cyrus before time had reſolued to reſtore vnto Ieruſalem.

Darius letters for the liberty poſſeſſion and erection of the Temple granted to the Iewes.

1.Eſd.6.

When Zorobabel had obtained theſe things abouenamed at the Kings hands, he iſſued out of the palace,and lifting vp his eies vnto heauen,he began to giue God thanks for the wiſedome and victorie he had granted him,and for the good ſucceſſe he had giuen him in Darius preſence. For (ſaid he)O Lord,if thou hadſt not beene fauourable vnto me,I had not obtained it.After he had at this time,and in this ſort giuen thanks for the preſent,and praied God to ſhew himſelfe alwaies
C fauourable hereafter, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countrimen what good newes he had receiued from the King: who hearing the ſame, gaue God thanks alſo, who had reſtored them once more to the poſſeſſion of that countrey wherein they were borne: and they fell to feaſting and banquetting for ſeuen daies ſpace, for the reſtoring vnto their countrey, as if they had ſolemnized the feaſts of their birth daies. Anon after they made choiſe of thoſe Gouernours and common ſort, that (with their wiues, their children and horſes) ſhould returne vnto Ieruſalem, who by the aſſiſtance of Darius conuoy, performed their iourney to Ieruſalem with ioy and conſolation; playing on their Pſalteries,Flutes,and Cymbals; and were after this manner conducted on their way, with delight, by the number of thoſe Iewes that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward,beeing a certaine and determinate number of euery family. I haue
D not thought it meet to repeat theſe families name by name,for feare I ſhould confound my ſtory, and leaſt the Readers ſhould any waies be diſtracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithſtanding,the whole number of thoſe that went,and were aboue twelue yeeres old of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, were foure millions, ſixe hundreth, twenty and eight thouſand. There were likewiſe foure thouſand and ſeuentie Leuites: And of their wiues and children together, fortie thouſand ſeuen hundred,forty and two. Beſides theſe,there were of Singers of the tribe of Leui, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters,one hundred and tenne; and of ſacred ſeruants three hundred twenty and two. There were certaine others likewiſe, that pretended that they were of the race of the Iſraelites,yet could not they giue teſtimony of their deſcent;the number of whom were ſixe hundreth fifty and two. Of the number of the Prieſts, they that had eſpouſed wiues
E (whoſe genealogie could not be deriued, and who were not found alſo in the genealogies of the Prieſts and Leuites) they were about fiue hundreth,twenty and fiue. The multitude of ſeruants that followed or attended on them,were ſeuen thouſand,three hundreth,thirty and ſeuen. There were alſo two hundreth, forty and fiue Singers of men and women: foure hundreth, thirty and fiue Camels; and fiue hundreth twenty and fiue other beaſts to beare their carriage. The conductor of this abouenamed multitude, was Zorobabel the ſonne of Salathiel; deſcended of Dauids line, and of the tribe of Iuda; and Ieſus the ſonne of Joſedech the high Prieſt: beſides which were Mardochæus and Screbæas, who were choſen by the people to bee their Gouernours, who contributed one hundreth pounds of gold, and fiue hundreth of ſiluer. Thus the Prieſts and Le-
F uites, and a part of all the people of the Iewes which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell at Ieruſalem; the other part of them following a little after returned euery one into his owne countrey.

There erected they an Altar in the ſame place, where before time it was builded, to the ende they might offer lawfull ſacrifices thereon,according to Moſes law: in which action of theirs: they yeelded little content to their neighbour Nations, who in generall were incensed against them. They ce- G lebrated also at that time the feast of tabernacles, according as the law-maker had ordained : afterwards they offered oblations, and continuall sacrifices, obseruing their Sabboths and all holy solemnities. And they that had made any vowes performed the same, and sacrificed from the new moone vntill the seuenth moneth. After this they began to build the temple, and deliuered great summes of money to the hewers of stone, and masons; and gaue strangers their ordinarie diet, who brought them stone and timber. For it was an easie matter for the Sidonians and an act well pleasing vnto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to bind it, and gathering it together in rafters to ship it, and land it at the port of Ioppa. For Cyrus had before time giuen them that commandement, and now the second time they were enioyned thereunto by Darius.

The second yeere after their arriuall in Ierusalem, the Iewes assembled together in the second H moneth, and the building of the temple went forward; so that hauing laid the foundation thereof in the first day of December, they builded vpon the same, the second yeare. Ouer this worke those Leuites that were aboue twentie yeares of age, were ouerseers : with them also was Iesus, and his sonnes and brothers ioyned, and Zolimiel the brother of Iuda the sonne of Aminidab, and his sonnes. And thorow the diligence that these ouerseers of the temple vsed, it was sooner finished, then it was expected. As soone as the sanctuarie was builded, the Priests apparelled in their accustomed habits, and the Leuites, and the sonnes of Asaph arose, and with trumpets praised God, according as Dauid first of all had set downe the manner of his seruice. The priests and Leuites with the elders of the tribes (calling vnto their mindes how great and precious the first temple was, and beholding that which was builded vpon the present, farre inferiour to the I precedent, and perceiuing how much the ancient wealth and dignitie of the temple was abased;
they were confused thereat, and being vnable to ouercome their passion, they burst out into lamentations and teares. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any estimate or mention of the former temple, they tormented not themselues in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they vpon the difference and bignes betwixt the present and that which stood in times past : yet notwithstanding the elders lamented, and the priests complained, that the new erected Temple was farre lesse then the former; yet the noise of the trumpets drowned their laments, and the ioyfull applauses of the people their mournings.

The Samaritans hearing the noise of the trumpets, ranne out to know the cause thereof in that they were lewdly affected towards the tribe of Iuda and Beniamin; and vnderstanding that the K Iews which were returned from Babylon had reedified the temple, they addressed themselues to Zorobabel and Iesus, and to the chiefe gouernours of the families, requiring them that it might be lawfull for them to repaire the temple with them; and to haue part in the building thereof. For (said they) we honour God no lesse then you, we pray vnto him and adore him; wee conforme our selues to your customes, euer since the time that Salmanazar king of Assyria remoued vs out of Cuthea and Media hither. To these demands of theirs, Zorobabel and Iesus the high priest and the gouernours of the tribes answered, that it was impossible for them to admit their assistance in the building of the temple, for that they had receiued their first commandement from Cyrus to performe the same, & afterwards from Darius: notwithstanding they gaue them licence to adore therein, offering them that the temple should be common to both, if they pleased: yea and accessible to all other nations, that would repaire thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for L so were the Samaritanes called) hearing this answere, were sore offended; and perswaded the other nations of Syria to require their princes (who continued their authoritie since the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyses time) to hinder the building of the temple; and to delay the Iewes, who were so intent and busie in their worke. Wherupon Sisin gouernour in Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came vnto Ierusalem; and demanded of the chieftaines of the Iewes, by whose permission they builded the temple, which rather seemed to be a fort then a temple, and for what cause they fortified their Citie with gates and so strong walles? Zorobabel and Iesus the high Priest answered, that they were the seruants of the liuing God, and that their temple had beene built by one of their kings, who was opulent and sur- M passed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable estimation (by reason their fathers had committed impietie against God) Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon and Chaldæa, hauing taken the Citie by force destroyed the same; and after he had spoyled the citie
he burned it, and transported the people captiue into Babylon.

The Samaritans desirous to further the building of the temple are reiected.

The Samaritans suppose to hinder the building of the temple.

The Syrian princes examine the cause why the Iewes repaire their citie and temple.

But

A But after that Cyrus king of Perſia had obtained the kingdome of Babylon, hee commanded by his expreſſe letters ſealed with his royall ſeale, that they ſhould reedifie the temple, and ordained that all that which Nabuchodonoſor carried from thence, as well gifts as veſſels, ſhould be deliuered to Zorobabel and the Treaſurer Mithridates, to be conuaied to Ieruſalem, and be placed againe in the temple, as ſoone as it ſhould be builded. And he commanded alſo, that it ſhould be preſently reedified, willing Abaſſar to repaire to Ieruſalem, and giue order for all that which was requiſite; who reſorting thither as ſoone as he had receiued Cyrus letters, did ſpeedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward vntill this preſent it hath beene continued; but the ſubtilty and malignity of their enemie had wrought ſo much, that as yet it remained imperfect. If therefore it pleaſe you, and you thinke it good, ſignifie that you heare, by your letters to Da-
B rius, to the end that examining the regiſters of the kings, he may finde that we are not faultie in any thing of that which we haue ſaid. When Zorobabel and Ieſus had anſwered to this effect; Siſin and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, vntill ſuch time as they had certified Darius hereof: for which cauſe they wrote vnto him preſently. Hereupon the Iewes were much diſcomforted and troubled, fearing leaſt the king ſhould change his mind in reſpect of the building of Ieruſalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongſt them) beganne to perſwade them, willing them to feare no diſaſter from the Perſians, becauſe God had aſſured them: for which cauſe the people gaue credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

Aggeus and Zachary the Prophets.

When the Samaritanes had in this ſort written to Darius, and accuſed the Iewes vnto him
C for fortifying their City, and reedifying their Temple, and how it ſeemed rather to be a fort, then ſome ſacred place, and had further alleadged that it would be no profit vnto him, and moreouer had produced Cambyſes letters, by which they were forbidden to build the temple; hee vnderſtood that the reeſtabliſhment of Ieruſalem ſtood not with the ſecurity of his ſtate. But when he had read Siſins letters and his aſſociates, he commanded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the kings ſhould be ſearched, how the matter had paſt; and there was found in Ecbatane a City of the Medes, in a tower a certaine booke, in which theſe things were written. The firſt yeere of the raigne of Cyrus, commandement was giuen to build the temple of Ieruſalem, and the altar therein: It was likewiſe decreed, that the height of the Temple ſhould bee ſixtie cubits, and the breadth as many; three ſtories of hewed ſtone, and one ſtory of the wood of that countrey: and D it was ordained that the expence of that building ſhould be deducted out of the kings reuenews. Moreouer he commanded, that reſtitution ſhould be made vnto the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, of thoſe veſſels that were taken away by Nabuchodonoſor, & caried away to Babylon: And the commiſſion to effect all theſe things was giuen to Abaſſar gouernour of Syria and Phœnicia, and his companions, to the end that they might depart from theſe places, and the Iewes might bee permitted to build therin. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile and building ſhould be gathered out of the tributes of his countries, and that they ſhould furniſh the Iewes with buls, weathers, lambes, goates, flower, oyle, and wine, and all other things which the Prieſts ſhould thinke meet to offer ſacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preſeruation of the King of Perſia: commanding that they that ſhould tranſgreſſe or contradict this commandement of E his, ſhould be laid hold on, and hanged on a Iibbet, and that their goods ſhould bee confiſcate to the kings vſe. Moreouer, he beſought God, that if any man went about to hinder the building of the temple, that he would puniſh him and ſtrike him, and reſtraine his wickednes thereby. When Darius had found theſe things written in his Panchartes and Chronicles, he wrote backe to Siſin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Siſin, and Sarabazan, with their aſſociates; health. Hauing found amongſt the memorialls of Cyrus the coppy of your miſſiue; I haue ſent it you, and my pleaſure is that the contents thereof be executed. Fare you well.

Siſin and his aſſociates being certified of the kings pleaſure, reſolued themſelues conformably to execute the ſame: and taking the care of the ſacred buildings vpon them, they aſſiſted the Princes & Magiſtrates of the Iewes in ſuch ſort, as the building of the Temple was finiſhed with F great diligence, by the inſtigation of the Prophets Aggeus and Zachary, according to Gods commandement, and by the directions of the kings Cyrus and Darius; ſo that it was finiſhed within 7. yeeres. In the ninth yeere of the raigne of Darius, and the three and twentie of the eleuenth moneth, called by vs Ader, and by the Macedonians Diſtre; the Prieſtes and Leuites, and all the reſt of the people offered ſacrifices for the renouation of their former felicity, after their captiuity, and for their new temple alſo: ſacrificing one hundred bulles, two hundred ſheepe, foure hundred lambes, twelue goates, according to the number of the twelue tribes of Iſrael; and for the ſinnes sinnes of each of them. The Priests and Leuites also (according to the lawes of Moses) appoin- G ted Porters to euery gate. For the Iewes had builded galleries round about, and within the temple.

The temple dedicated 23 of March, or as it is in the first of Esdras 6. dedicated the third of March.

Now when the feast of vnleauened bread (which is the feast of Easter) drew neere, in the first moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrewes, all the people of the townes round about Ierusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the feast; purifying both themselues, their wiues, and children, according to the ordinance of their forefathers: And after they had solemnized the feast called Easter, or the Passeouer in the 14. moone, they banquetted for seauen daies space, sparing no cost how great soeuer it were. They offered burnt offerings also, and sacrifices of thankesgiuing, acknowledging Gods goodnesse that had brought them home into their natiue Countrey, to liue according to the lawes of their forefathers, and had made them gracious in the king of Persiæs eies. Thus dwelled they in Ierusalem in all ioy, sacrificing and ser- H uing God with great affection, and liuing vnder the gouernment of their nobilitie. For the chiefest authoritie remained in the high Priests, vntill the Asmonæans obtained the kingdom: for before the captiuitie of Babylon, they were vnder the gouernment of Kings, who began from Saul and Dauids times, about some fiue hundred, thirtie, two yeeres, sixe moneths, and tenne daies; and before their Kings certaine gouernours called Iudges raigned: and vnder this sort of policie liued they more then fiue hundred yeares; from the death of Moses and Iosuah. See here the estate of the Iewes deliuered from their captiuitie, during the daies of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mightie and malicious aduersaries, and did them many mischiefs, trusting in their riches, and pretending themselues to be the Persians kinsmen, because their originall proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that tribute, which the King had com- I manded them to disburse vnto the Iewes to make their sacrifices, and had their Gouernours likewise affectionate and forward to further their malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them mischiefe, either in themselues, or by others. For which cause, the Iewes determined to send Embassadors vnto King Darius, to accuse the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and foure others were sent. As soone therefore as the King vnderstood by these Embassadors, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritanes, hee dispatched his letters, and addressed them to the Gouernours and Councell of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. King Darius to Tangara and Sambaba Gouernors of Samaria, to Sadrach and Bobelon, and to their companions our seruants being in Samaria; health. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, Embassadours in the behalfe of the Iewes, accuse you to be perturbers of the building of their temple; alleadging that you refuse to discharge that, which by my decree you K ought to furnish them with, for the charge of the sacrifices. My will is therefore, that vpon the sight of these letters, you deliuer out of the royall treasurie in Samaria, appointed for the tributes, all that which shall be necessary for them to performe their sacrifices, vpon the requests of the Priests, to the intent they let passe no day without sacrifice and praier vnto God for me, and for the Persians. The beneficence of XERXES, DARIVS sonne, towards the Iewes.

L

AFTER Darius death; his sonne Xerxes succeeded him, not onely as heire in the gouernment of his kingdome, but also as successor vnto his pietie and deuotion towards God: for he no waies changed those institutions of his fathers that concerned religious seruice, but with great beneuolence fauoured all the Iewes. During his raigne Ioacim the sonne of Iesus was high Priest: Amongst them also that remained in Babylon, there liued a high priest with the Iewes in that place called Esdras; a iust man, and one of great reputation amongst the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the lawes of Moses, he obtained great friendship with the king. This man intending (with certaine other Iewes of Babylon) to make his repaire vnto Ierusalem, besought the king that he would vouchsafe to bestow his letters of commendati- M

When Eſdras had receiued this letter, hee was wonderfully contented,and beganne to adore
C God,confeſſing openly that it was he, who was the author of that fauour he had receiued at the Kings hands: for which cauſe he ſaid,that the onely thankſgiuing appertained to him. And after he had read this letter vnto the Iewes that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the originall,but ſent the coppy to all thoſe of his nation,being in the country of the Medes: who vnderſtanding of the Kings affection towards God, and his fauour towards Eſdras, were very ioyfull; and diuers amongſt them tooke their goods and came vnto Babylon, deſiring to returne to Ieruſalem: but all the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leaue their quiet dwelling there. For which cauſe it came to paſſe, that two Tribes were vnder the obedience of the Romanes in Aſia and Europe: but the tenne Tribes were on the other ſide of Euphrates, euen vntill this day; being many infinites of thouſands,whoſe number may not be comprehended. With Eſdras
D there departed a great number of Prieſts,Leuites,Porters,Singing-men, and ſeruants of the Temple. Now after that he had aſſembled thoſe of the captiuitie,that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſoiourned there three daies, hee commanded them to ſolemnize a faſt, and to pray vnto God for his preſeruation, and that no euill might happen vnto him; and that neither their enemies nor any other might doe them any violence. For Eſdras had foretold the King that GOD would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no conuoy of horſemen at his hand for his ſecuritie. After that they had recommended themſelues vnto God,they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt moneth of the ſeuenth yeere of the raigne of Xerxes,and arriued in Ieruſalem in the fift moneth of the ſame yeere. Whereupon, he incontinently preſented vnto the Treaſurers (who were of the race of the Prieſts) the ſiluer that was conſecrated,namely, ſixe
E hundreth and fiftie talents, of ſiluer veſſell a hundred talents, of veſſell of gold twenty talents, of braſen veſſell (more precious then gold) waighing twelue talents. Theſe were the preſents of the King and his friends,and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras aſſembled the Iewes that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras repaireth to Ieruſalem,and committeth the veſſels and other precious preſents to the Treaſurers hands.

When Eſdras had deliuered theſe abouenamed preſents vnto the hands of the Prieſts, he offered burnt offerings vnto God, according to the law, namely, twelue Bulles for the publique conſeruation of the people,ſeuentie two Rammes and Lambes, and twelue Goates for the expiation of ſinne. And after them he deliuered the Kings letters to his Princes and Gouernours in Cœloſyria and Phœnicia: who beeing conſtrained to execute that which was enioyned them by the King,honoured the Nation of the Iewes,and ſupplyed them euery waies in their neceſſities. This counſell had Eſdras himſelfe giuen of their departure. But in my opinion God (hauing regard of F his wiſedome and integritie) did happily aduance his deliberation.

Not long after this,there came certaine men vnto him,complaining that ſome of the people, Prieſts, and Leuites had tranſgreſſed againſt the policie, and broken the lawes of the Countrey, for that they had eſpouſed certaine ſtrange women, and confounded the race of the Prieſts: requiring him that hee would haue an inward regard to Gods ordinances, for feare leſt hee (conceiuing a generall hatred againſt them all) ſhould ſend them anew ſome grieuous calamities. For which cauſe Eſdras deuoured with ſorrow, incontinently rent his clothes, and tore his haire, and pulled his beard, and caſt himſelfe vpon the ground, becauſe the principals among the people had part in that offence. And for that he feared leaſt if he ſhould command them to forſake their wiues, and thoſe children they had begotten by them, he ſhould not be obeyed, he perſiſted in griefe, and lay continually couched vpon the ground. Whereupon, all thoſe reſorted vnto him, who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him, for that which had hapned. Whereupon Eſdras (raiſing himſelfe from the earth, and lifting vp his hands to heauen) ſaid, that hee was aſhamed to looke thereupon, becauſe the offences of the people were ſo hainous; who had forgotten the inconuenience that had befallen their forefathers for their impieties, beſeeching God that he would reſerue ſome remainder and ſeed of the aduerſity and captiuity, which at that time hapned vnto them, and that he would once more eſtabliſh them againe in Ieruſalem their natiue countrey: that he would take compaſſion of them, and grant them pardon for thoſe ſinnes which at that preſent were committed by them: for which though they deſerued death, yet hoped they in the mercies of God for their deliuerance. Whil'ſt thus both he and thoſe that came vnto him lamented round about him, with their wiues and children, a certaine man called Achonius, one « of the principall men of Ieruſalem, repaired vnto him, and ſaid, that they had ſinned, becauſe they « had eſpouſed ſtrange women; and perſwaded Eſdras to adiure them all, to baniſh both them and « the children begotten by them; wiſhing that they, who obeied not the law, might be puniſhed. « Eſdras (perſwaded by theſe words) made all the Princes of the Prieſts, Leuites, and tribes of Iſrael ſweare, that they would diſmiſſe their wiues and children, according to the counſaile of Achonius. And as ſoone as he had receiued their oathes, he departed from the temple vnto Iohns houſe the ſonne of Eliaſib, and there ſpent he all the day without taſting any meate (by reaſon of the griefe which ſo inwardly he had conceiued.

Whence therefore it was publiſhed by Edict, that all they that were returned from the captiuitie, ſhould repaire within two or three daies to Ieruſalem (vnder the penalty that they, who defaulted therein, and came not within the prefixed time, ſhould be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiſcate to the publique treaſury of the temple, by the ordinance of the Prieſtes) they of the tribes of Iuda and Beniamin came thither within three daies, on the twentieth day of the ninth moneth, called by the Hebrewes Thebeth, and by the Macedonians Apellæus. And as ſoone as they were ſeated in the vpper part of the temple, in the preſence and aſſiſtance of the Elders, although the weather was very intemperate, by reaſon of the froſt; Eſdras aroſe and reproued them for that they had tranſgreſſed the law, in taking wiues vnto them, who were not of their nation: for which cauſe he told them, that if they would performe a matter that were agreeable vnto God, and profitable for themſelues, they ſhould diſmiſſe ſuch wiues. Wherupon with a loud voice, they all cried, that they would doe it willingly; but that there was no ſmall number of them, and that the time was winter, and the matter of that conſequence, as one or two daies could not end it: For which cauſe they thought it very needfull, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, ſome of the Princes who were free from that ſinne, with certaine other choſen Elders of euery place, ſhould make inquiſition of them that had married wiues contrary to the preſcript of the law. Which being approoued by them, about the new moone of the tenth moneth this inquiſition began, which continued vntill the new moone of the moneth enſuing: and there were many of the family of Ieſus the high Prieſt, and of the Prieſts, Leuites, and Iſraelites, that (making more account of the obſeruation of the lawes, then of the naturall affections to their wiues and children) did preſently put away their wiues, and thoſe children they had by them, and ſacrificed certaine Rams for a peace offering vnto God: whoſe names it were a needleſſe matter to reckon vp in this place.

When Eſdras had in this ſort reformed the errour committed by ſuch marriages, hee ſo corrected the euill cuſtome thereof, that this confirmation continued firme and irreuocable for euer. In the ſeuenth month, they ſolemnized the feaſt of tabernacles: wherto when all the people were reſorted, they al gathered together in an open place of the Temple towards the gate that looketh Eaſtward, requiring Eſdras that he would read Moſes ordinances vnto them; which hee performed, and ſtanding vp in the midſt of the multitude, he read the law vnto them from the morning vntill noone. By which reading, not onely for the preſent, but for the time to come, they learned that which was iuſt; and alſo calling to memory that which was paſt, they were ſo diſcomforted that the teares fell from their eyes, in thinking with themſelues, that if they had kept the law, they had not ſuffered any of thoſe euils, by which they had beene tormented. But Eſdras beholding them in that eſtate, willing each of them to repaire homeward, and to weepe no more, becauſe that day was a ſolemne and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, becauſe it was forbidden:

A He rather commanded them to intend their feasts and pleasures, assuring them that the repentance and griefe of those faults that were committed by them in times past, ought to serue them and instruct them to assure and defence themselues, to the end that heereafter they commit not the like. They following Esdras exhortation, began to celebrate the solemnitie, and continued their feasts in their Tabernacles during eight daies. After which time they returned euery one vnto his house, praising God in hymnes; and thanking Esdras for the amendment of those vnlawfull marriages that had hapned in their policy: who after he had gotten great honour among the people, finished his life, beeing loaden with yeeres, and was buried honourably in Ierusalem. About the same time also died Ioacim the high Priest, whose sonne Eliacim succeeded in his place.

B After this it came to passe that a certaine man that was one of the captiue Iewes, and king Xerxes butler called Nehemias, walking before the citie of Susa (which was the Metropolitane Citie of Persia) heard certaine strangers that came from farre; who vpon their entrie into the Citie, deuised the one with the other in the Hebrew tongue; for which cause hee drew neere vnto them, and asked them whence they came. Who returning him this answere, that they came from Iudæa: he began to demand of them againe, of the estate of Ierusalem, their natiue Citie, and how the people fared. To whom they answered, that they were in very bad estate, and that their Citie wals were conuerted to dust and rased, and that the nations round about them afflicted the Iewes with many outrages, in making inrodes into their countrey, and spoiling them daily, not sparing them by night; so that diuers of them were led away prisoners; yea some Citizens of Ierusalem;

C and that daily the high wayes were found full of dead bodies. Heereupon Nehemias beganne to weepe (thorow the inward compassion he had of his distressed brethren) and looking vp towards heauen: How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our nation thus afflicted without taking care of vs? Behold how we are made a prey to all men. Whil'st thus he walked before the gate and lamented bitterly, newes was brought him that the King was ready to sit downe to his meate: For which cause he gaue attendance according to his office, and serued the King dutifully, during his time of repast. As soone as supper was done, the King grew pleasant and ioyfull, and casting his eyes vpon Nehemias (whom he perceiued to be heauie and disconsolate) hee asked him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God to giue him grace and perswasiue speech to discourse vnto the king) answered: O King, how is it possible that I should be other but discomforted, and

Do me therfore this grace, that I may resort thither, and repaire the same, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

This said, the King gaue eare to his request, and promised him his Letters, assuring him that he would addresse them to the Gouernours, commanding them to doe him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessary, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause (said he) cease thou to be sad, and doe thy seruice willingly. Hereupon Nehemias adored GOD, and thanked the King, for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the pleasure he conceiued,

E he cleared that confusion and sorrow, that before that time he bare his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gaue him letters vnto Sadeas the gouernour of Syria, Phœnicia and Samaria, in which hee commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessary for that building which he intended. As soone as he came to Babylon, he tooke diuers of his countrimen with him, who willingly followed him, and went with him vnto Ierusalem in the fiue and twentith yeere of the raigne of Xerxes, and after he had presented his letters before God, he deliuered them to Sadeas, and the other gouernours. Afterwards, assembling the people in Ierusalem, he stood vp in the midst of them, and spake vnto the whole congregation to this effect. You men of Iury, there is none of you but knoweth that God hath our forefathers Abraham, Isaac and Iacob in perpetuall memory, and that in regard of their iustice, hee hath neuer failed to haue care of vs: by his mercy likewise I haue receiued the fauour from the King to re-

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Cœloſyria, vnderſtanding the walles were raiſed, with ſuch haſte and diligence, were ſore aggrieued, and reſolued with themſelues to lie in ambuſh, and to hinder them in their deliberations; ſo that they ſlew diuers Iewes, and ſought the meanes likewiſe to murther Nehemias himſelfe: and hauing hired certaine ſtrangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in waite for him. They bred alſo a feare and trouble amongſt them, by ſpreading certaine rumors, that diuers nations intended to make war againſt them: by which reports (being too much diſtracted) they deſiſted ſomewhat in the proſecution of their building. Yet none of theſe things could weaken Nehemias diligence or reſolution, but that (keeping a court of guarde round about him) he inſtantly proſecuted his purpoſe, ſetting light by all occurrents; ſo great was his affection to accompliſh his intent. And for that cauſe did he carefully and intentiuely ſtand vpon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he beleeued that after his departure the Iewes would not finiſh the building of the walles. He commanded afterwards, that the workmen in their trauell ſhould haue their furnitures faſt by them, ſo that both Maſons and labourers carried their ſwords. H I

The ardent care in building the walls of Ieruſalem.

Moreouer, he gaue order that they ſhould haue their targets by them; and he placed certaine trumpeters, ſome fiue hundred foote diſtant the one from the other, charging them that as ſoone as they diſcouered the enemy from any part, they ſhould incontinently ſound the allarum, and giue notice vnto the people to arme themſelues, and prepare for the fight, for feare they ſhould be ſurpriſed and found naked. He himſelfe alſo walked the round, about the Citie by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or ſleeping at his pleaſure, but onely for neceſſitie ſake: and this labour endured he for the ſpace of two yeeres, and three months: for the wall of Ieruſalem was builded againe in that time, in the eight and twentith yeere of the raigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the Citie was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered ſacrifices vnto God, and ſpent eight daies in feaſting. When the rumor was ſpred abroad that this building was finiſhed, the inhabitants of Syria were ſore diſpleaſed. But Nehemias perceiuing that the Citie was weakely manned, beſought the Prieſts and Leuites to forſake their dwellings without the Citie, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he builded them houſes vpon his owne charge. He ordained likewiſe, that they that intended their husbandry, ſhould bring the tenths of their fruits vnto Ieruſalem, to the intent that the Prieſts and Leuites by enioying their continuall maintenance, might intermit no time in the ſeruice of God: wherein he was willingly obeied. By this meanes, the Citie of Ieruſalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honorably executed diuers other worthy actions deſeruing praiſe, he died at ſuch time as he was loaden with age. He was a man of a good nature, iuſt and highly affectionated towards his countrey: he left the Citie of Ieruſalem incompaſſed with a wall, for a perpetuall memorie of his loue vnto his countrey. All the acates were ſerued in veſſels of golde, inriched with precious ſtones very glorious to behold. Now whereas the king was deſirous to ſhew the maieſtie of his queene to thoſe he had inuited, he ſent vnto her, commanding her to reſort vnto the banquet in more royall manner then the reſt of her attendants: but ſhe too curiouſly tied to the obſeruation of the law of the Perſians (which forbiddeth women to be ſeene by ſtrangers) went not vnto the King: and notwithſtanding he ſent his Eunuches diuers times vnto her, yet perſiſted ſhee in her refuſall to come vnto him. Whereupon the king (mooued with diſpleaſure) gaue ouer his banquet, and ariſing therfro he called vnto him his ſeuen counſellers, to whom (according to the vſe of the Perſians) it belonged to expound the lawes; and accuſed his wife, telling them how grieuouſly he had beene wronged by her, for that being ſent for by him diuers times to accompany him at

C his banquet, ſhe had euery way refuſed to obey him: He therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what puniſhment appertained to her. One amongſt them called Mucheus anſwered, that the iniurie was not onely offered vnto him, but to all the Perſians: who being after that manner deſpiſed by their wiues, were like to paſſe their liues ignominiouſly, for that no one of them would acknowledge dutie towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queenes diſobedience, which ſhe ſhewed towards him, who was the gouernour ouer all. Whereupon he concluded, that ſhe that had thus diſhonored him, ſhould be grieuouſly puniſhed: which done, he thought it meete that this ordinance of the Kings might be publiſhed thorow all nations, that Queene Vaſthi ſhould be ſeperated from his bed, and another woman choſen in her place. But the king, who vehemently loued her, and could hardly endure to be ſeparated from her, knowing

D that he could not keepe her contrary to law, was wholly deuoured in ſorrow, for that hee might not be maſter of that which he deſired. Which when his familiars perceiued, they counſelled him to forget the memory & loue of a woman ſo vnprofitable, & to ſend and ſeeke out thorow al his countries for the faireſt woman amongſt them, whom he might chooſe and take to wife, that ſurpaſſed all others in beauty; for that by the interuiew & company of an other woman, the great affection which he bare vnto Vaſthi, might be extinguiſhed. The king allowing and ratifying this counſaile of theirs, ſent out certaine meſſengers and deputies, commanding them to bring vnto his preſence the faireſt virgins that were to be found in his kingdome: when as therfore they had aſſembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young orphelin (without either father or mother) who was brought vp vnder her vncle (whoſe name was Mardocheus) of the tribe

E of Beniamin, and one of the greateſt men amongſt the Iewes. It came to paſſe, that this Eſther (for ſuch was her name) was iudged to be the faireſt amongſt the reſt, who for her amiable countenance made all men to ſtand and gaze to behold her. She therfore was deliuered in charge vnto one of the Eunuches, who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was poſſible, decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the cuſtome of noble women; and after this manner were foure hundreth virgins entertained for the ſpace of ſixe moneths. Now when he that was put in truſt with this commiſſion, thought theſe virgins to bee ſufficiently prepared, and that they deſerued to approach the princes bed, he ſent euery day one vnto the king to keepe him company: who after ſome embraces ſent her preſently backe againe vnto the Eunuch. But when as Eſther came vnto his preſence, he ſetled his affection more on her then on all the reſt, and

At ſuch time as Eſther entred into the royall palace, he ſet a diademe vpon her head, and ſo liued with her, that he neuer queſtioned with her either of her birth, or nation. where euery day he walked before the palace gate, enquiring how Ester did: for that hee loued her as deerely as if she had beene his owne naturall daughter. Now the king had made a law that no man should approch his presence, except he were called, during the time that hee was in his throne; and round about his seat there stood certen officers with their axes, ready to punish those who being vncalled should attempt to approach the throne. The king himselfe sate aloft, and holding in his hand a golden scepter, whensoeuer he intended to saue the life of any one that approached his throne vncalled, he stretched forth the same and touched him therewith: who being thus touched by these meanes auoided the penalty of death. And as touching these things we haue sufficiently spoken in this place. G

The kings command that no man should approch his throne except he were called Esther. 4.

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodestes, two of the kings Eunuches, had conspired against him; Barnabazus, who was of the Hebrew nation and one of their seruants, disclosing their treason, discouered it to the Queenes vncle Mardocheus, who by her meanes made the king priuy to their conspiracy. Who sore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination, and after he had commanded them to be executed on the gibbet, he for that time gaue no recompence to Mardocheus for the safegard of his life: he onely commanded his name to bee registred and chronicled in his commentaries, commanding that he should attend in the palace, and bee esteemed for one of the kings most inward friends. Now as often as Aman (the sonne of Amadath an Amalechite) came vnto the palace to visite the king, all those that were either Persians or strangers (according to the kings especiall direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus shewed him no honour (both by reason of that vpright iudgement that was in him, as also for that the lawes of the Iewes forbad the same. Which when Aman had obserued, hee demanded whence he was? and vnderstanding that he was a Iew, he was much displeased, saying in himselfe, that the Persians who were of freer condition, cast themselues prostrate before him, and he that was but a slaue disdained to do the like. Intending therfore to reuenge himself on Mardocheus, he thought it not sufficient to procure his punishment at the kings hands, but resolued wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capital enemy of the Iewes, by reason that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his descent, had bin wholly ruinated by them.) For which cause, he addressed himselfe vnto the king, and accused them, saying, that there was a certaine cursed nation spred thorow his whole kingdome, insociable, and abhorring the customes of other men, who vsed diuers lawes and ceremonies hatefull both for their manners and studies, to all the rest of his subiects, and all mortall men. This nation (saith he) if thou wilt doe a gracious and acceptable fauour vnto thy people, thou shalt vtterly extinguish, and leaue neither captiue nor slaue aliue amongst them. And least your maiesties tribute should bee any waies impaired by these meanes, I promise you of mine owne reuenewes fortie thousand talents of siluer; desiring rather willingly to forbeare so much money, then that your kingdome should bee vnpurged of such a cursed race of men. When Aman had made this his request, the King answered, that he forgaue him the money, and that hee permitted him to deale with that nation as best him liked. When Aman had obtained this his desire, he presently sent an edict thorow all nations in the Kings name, and to this effect. The great King Artaxerxes vnto his gouernours of a hundreth and seauen and twentie prouinces, extending from India as farre as Æthiopia: Health. Hauing obtained the Empire ouer so many nations, and extended my dominion ouer the world, according to mine owne pleasure, without being constrained to offend any of my subiects, by vsing our power more proudly and importunately then becommeth vs, but shewing our selues fauourable and mercifull in prouiding for their peace, and plentifull estate, wee haue searched out the meanes thereof, to the intent that we might perceiue the fruite. Being therefore admonished by my friend Aman (who for his wisedome and iustice is more honoured then all other by me, and for his approued fidelitie, hath the second place in authoritie next mee) that there is a certaine race of men intermedled among you, enemies to all humanitie, vsing none but their owne lawes, and such as are different from others, disobedient to their Kings, and of depraued manners and customes, that neither allow our monarchie, nor further our affaires: I will and command, that they (being made knowne by Aman, a man whom we hold as deere as our father) be slaine, with their wiues, and children; so as you spare none of them, attributing more vnto your owne mercie then our edict: and this command wee to be done the fourteenth day of the twelfth moneth of this present yeere, that in one day cutting of all our enemies, heereafter it may be lawfull for you to liue in peace and securitie. This edict beeing spred thorow all places of the country, and published in euerie citie; all men addressed themselues against the perfixed day, vtterly to exterminate the Iewes: & no lesse diligence was there vsed in Susan the Metropolitane citie. A while the King and Aman feasted, and made good cheere, whilest the Citie hung in suspence, being troubled with the expectation of the euent of that which should follow. But Mardocheus hauing intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on sackcloth, and cast ashes on his head, walking thorow the Citie, and crying that their nation had not committed any crime that deserued death: and vsing these or such like speeches, he came vnto the Kings palace, and stood before the gate, because it was vnlawfull for him to enter thereinto in that habite: The like also did the Iewes that were in the Cities, where those edicts had beene published against them, weeping and lamenting their miseries. But when the newes hereof was brought vnto the Queene, that Mardocheus stood before the palace gate in a lamentable estate, she was sore troubled, & sent certaine of her seruants vnto him to command him to exchange his attire; but they could not perswade B him to put off his sackcloth, because the inconuenient, for which he had put it on, was not ouerpast. She therefore called vnto her, her Eunuch Acratheus, and sent him vnto Mardocheus, to know what hateful accident had befallen him, that made him put on his desolate habit, and poure forth those lamentable teares (notwithstanding she had instantly praied him to disrobe him of the one, and dry vp the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus tolde the Eunuch, of the edict made against the Iewes, and sent by the king vnto all his prouinces; the offer of the money that Aman likewise had tendered to the King, whereby he had bought the vtter ruine of his nation at the Kings hands. Moreouer, he gaue him the copy of that which had beene proclaimed in Susan, to be deliuered vnto Esther: whom he commanded to beseech the king, and to esteeme it no dishonour to put on an abiect and base garment, to saue her nation, and to preserue the Iewes from that death, C whereunto at that time they were exposed: for that Aman the next in honour to the King, had accused the Iewes, and incensed his maiestie against them. When Esther vnderstood this, shee sent againe vnto Mardocheus, giuing him to vnderstand that she was not called for by the King; and that whosoeuer entred vnto him, and was not called, should die, except the king would warrantize him by stretching out his golden scepter: for he, vnto whom the King extended that fauour, although he were not called vnto him; yet suffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When these things were reported by the Eunuch from Esther vnto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, that she ought not so much to tender the particular respect of her life, as the liues of her whole nation; assuring her, that if at that present she had not care of them, their succours should wholly proceed from God by some other meanes then this: but she and her fathers D house should be destroyed by them, whom she had contemned. Vpon this reply, Esther sent the same messenger backe againe vnto Mardocheus, commanding him to repaire vnto Susan, and to call a generall assembly of all the Iewes that remained there, willing them for three daies space to fast and abstaine from all kinde of meate for her safetie, and that both her selfe and her seruants would doe the like, promising them that at that time she would present her selfe to the King, notwithstanding his contrary edict; and that if she must needs die, shee would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, caused the people to fast, and to pray vnto God for her: he likewise himselfe besought him that it might please him at that present to haue compassion on their desolate and distressed nation; as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as hee had pardoned them at such time as they had offended; so now also at this E present he would deliuer them from that perdition which was denounced against them. For that they were not in danger to die infamously for any offence of their owne, but because hee onely had incensed Aman vnto displeasure, in that he would not adore him, or performe that honor vnto him, which is onely due to God: for which cause in despite he had imagined this thing against them, who would not transgresse the diuine ordinances. The people likewise prayed to the like effect, beseeching God that he would haue care of their preseruation, and warrantize the Israelites in what place soeuer they were, from the misery at hand, which was before their eies, and already expected by them. Esther also besought God (according to her countrey manner) casting her selfe prostrate on the earth, cloathed in sackcloth, and abstaining for three daies space from meate and drinke, and what thing soeuer else was delectable, beseeching God to haue compassion vpon F her, that when shee presented her selfe before the King shee might haue words fit to perswade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty farre more amiable then euer shee had, to the ende that by these two meanes shee might be the better enabled to appease the King, if so be hee were displeased against her; and to succour her brethren agitated and tossed in extreame danger, whereby through the King might enforce his hatred against the enemies of the Iewes, and take compassion of their imminent danger, which without his preuention would surely fall vpon them. After she had in this sort for three dayes space both fasted and prayed, she cast off her mourning attire, and changed her habite, attiring her ſelfe like a maieſticall Queene, hauing two of her ſeruants on G whom ſhee leaned, and the third that followed her carried vp with the tops of her fingers her traine, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came ſhe vnto the King, hauing her checkes ſtained with crimſon bluſhes, making ſhew of Maieſtie mixed with beauty, and not altogether eſtranged from feare. But when ſhe beheld the king ſitting aloft in his throne, glorious in his garments diſtinguiſht with gold, and adorned with pearle, and rich ſtones; a certaine feare ſodainly fell vpon her, and by chance he had caſt a frowning and yrefull looke on her; whereupon being preſently aſtoniſhed, her members failed her, her colour faded, and ſhe fell betwixt her handmaids armes in a ſwoune. Hereon, the king (by the will of God, as I verily eſteeme) changed his affection; and (ſuſpecting leaſt feare ſhould cauſe his wife to fall into ſome grieuous accident) hee ſodainly leapt from his throne, and embracing her with both his armes, hee raiſed her vp, and kiſſed her, and ſpake comfortable words vnto her, praying her to be of good courage, H and not to ſuſpect any ſiniſter misfortune, for that ſhe came vnto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was onely made for his ſubiects: for which cauſe hee willed her (who was equall in gouernment with him) to feare nothing: whereupon he tooke his Scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queenes necke (according to the law) enforcing himſelfe to deliuer her from all feare; by which meanes ſhee recouered her vigour and courage, and ſpake after this manner. O King (ſaid ſhee) I cannot eaſily expreſſe vnto you the inconuenience that is ſodainly fallen vpon me: For as ſoone as I beheld the great, faire, and redoubted Maieſtie of your perſon, my ſpirits forſooke mee, and my heart failed mee. Now whileſt ſhee ſpake theſe words with paine and feebleneſſe, the King was touched with compaſſion; ſo as hee animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (ſaid hee) if thou demandeſt the halfe of my I kingdome, I will grant it thee. But Eſther onely requeſted this at his hands, that onely he and his intire friend Aman would vouchſafe to grace her with their preſence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come vnto the banquet, and in the midſt of their cups, the King commanded Eſther to aske what ſhee would, and hee would grant it her, aſſuring her that he would refuſe her in nothing; yea, although ſhe demanded the halfe of his kingdome. But ſhee deferred to diſcouer her ſuite vntill the next day, requiring him once more to repaire with Aman vnto her banquet. When the King had promiſed to reuiſite her, Aman departed with great ioy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Eſther, and no other had euer obtained the like honour amongſt any Kings of that dominion. But in his returne perceiuing Mardocheus in the Court, he was ſore mooued, becauſe that (notwithſtanding he had lookt vpon him) hee had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home vnto his houſe, he K called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour (not onely the King, but the Queene alſo had done him; and how hee onely with the King had ſupped that day with the Queene; and was inuited the next day alſo to banquet with the King and her: notwithſtanding he told them that he was diſcontented, becauſe he ſaw Mardocheus the Iew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he ſhould cauſe a gallowes to bee raiſed of fiftie cubits high, and that the next day he ſhould demand licence of the King, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the iibbet. Aman prayſing his wiues councell, commanded his ſeruants to prepare the timber, and erect the Gallowes in his Court, to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at Amans curſed hope, and knowing certainly what ſhould happen, tooke pleaſure to ſee it prepared. For the very ſame night hee depriued the King of ſleepe, who very loath to ſpend the time idlely whileſt he was awake, but to imploy it in ſomething that was profitable L for his kingdome, hee commanded his Secretarie to bring him the Chronicles of the Kings his predeceſſors, and of thoſe things that were done by himſelfe, and to reade the ſame. When as therfore they were brought and read, he found that a certaine man whoſe name was there ſet downe, had receiued a great poſſeſſion for reward in reacknowledgement of his vertue. Hee read likewiſe of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelitie; and conſequently of others; till at laſt he came to the place where the Eunuches Bagotheus and Theodeſtes were noted downe, for a ſecret conſpiracie againſt the perſon of the King; and how it was diſcouered by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretarie (hauing onely recited this accident) turned ouer to an other hiſtorie, the king ſtaied him, and asked him if he found therein written, that he had giuen any recompence M to Mardocheus: He anſwered that he found nothing ſet downe. Wherupon the king commanded him to giue ouer, and inquired of thoſe to whom that office appertained, what houre of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already diſcouered, hee commanded that ſome one ſhould certifie him, which of his familiars attended before the palace. At this time it chanced

Amans hatred againſt Mardocheus.

A laudable cuſtome in a King. Eſther 6.

A ced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither ſooner then hee was accuſtomed, with an intent to beſeech the King, that it might be lawfull for him to put Mardocheus to death. The yeare of the world, 3554. before Chriſts Nativity 410.

Now when the officers had brought the King tidings that Aman was before the palace; they were commanded preſently to call him in. As ſoone as he came into the Kings preſence, he ſaid vnto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithee giue mee thy counſaile, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatneſſe, whom I doe moſt affectionately loue? Aman thinking the aduice he ſhould giue, ſhould be giuen for himſelfe (becauſe he ſuppoſed that he only was beloued by the King more then all others) counſailed him that which in his opinion was the beſt, in this manner. For (ſaid hee) if you intend to inueſt the man with glorie, who (as you) ſay is beloued by you, cauſe him to be mounted vpon a braue horſe, and let
B him bee apparelled in a royall habit, and put a chaine of gold about his necke, and let ſome one of thy chiefeſt friends march before him, and proclaime thorowout the Citie, that thus is the man honoured whom the King loueth. Aman gaue this counſaile, in that hee hoped that it ſhould be his owne fortune. But the King (highly contented with this his aduiſe) turning towards him, ſpake thus vnto him: Thou haſt a horſe, a garment, and a chaine, ſeeke out therefore the Iew Mardocheus, and giue them him, and march thou before him, making this publike crie: For (ſaid hee) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing bee committed to thy truſt, which thou haſt ſo faithfully counſailed. And this command I to be done in this ſort; becauſe Mardocheus hath beene the preſeruer of my life. Aman hearing theſe words, beyond all expectation, was confuſed in his ſpirit, and beeing wholly diſcomforted, knew not
C which way to turne him, hee therefore iſſued out, hauing with him the horſe, the purple habite, and the chaine of gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was cloathed in ſackcloth, hee enioyned him to lay his mourning habite aſide, and to cloath himſelfe in purple. But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had hapned, and ſuppoſing that he mocked him) ſaid: O thou wickedſt man amongſt men, doeſt thou thus mocke at our afflictions? Notwithſtanding, beeing afterwards informed that the King had beſtowed this honour on him for ſauing his life, and diſcouering the treacherie of thoſe Eunuches that would haue ſlaine him, hee put vpon him the ſcarlet habite that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chaine about his necke, and afterwards mounting his horſe, he went round about the Citie, Aman alſo walking before him, and crying, that thus ſhould bee dealt and done with him whom the King honoured, loued, and D thought worthy of eſtimation. Now after they had circuited the whole Citie, Mardocheus gaue his attendance on the King, but Aman came not in preſence; ſo much was hee aſhamed at that which had hapned: for which cauſe he repaired home, and told his wife and friends, with teares, of all that which had hapned; who told him, that it was no waies poſſible for him to reuenge himſelfe as yet on Mardocheus, becauſe God was with him. Honour offered to Mardocheus. Eſther 7.

Now whilſt they were diſcourſing and debating this matter together, Eſthers Eunuches came to haſten Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadas one of the Eunuches ſeeing the Iibbet erected in Amans lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the ſeruants, wherefore it was raiſed vp: and vnderſtanding that it was for the Queenes vncle, whom Aman would require at the kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time hee
E held his peace. But when the King being ſeated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queene to declare what ſhe ſhould require that he might grant her, ſhe began to lament the danger of her people, ſaying, that ſhe with her whole nation were made a prey to the ſword, and that for that cauſe ſhe brake out into that diſcourſe: For (ſaid ſhe) I had not troubled your maieſty, neither had I beene aggrieued, if you had commanded that all the Iewes ſhould be ſolde, and led away captiues to extreame miſerie; for that affliction might haue beene borne: ſhe therfore prayed him to redeeme them from thoſe miſeries. When as therefore the King demanded who it was, that practiſed that tyranny: ſhe began publikely to accuſe Aman, ſaying, that he alone was that wretched and enuious man, who had complotted their tragedie. Hereupon the king was very ſore troubled, and roſe from the banquet to depart into the garden: then began Aman to pray and beſeech Eſther to forgiue him his offence, for that at that preſent he was in a dangerous eſtate. Now
F whileſt he was fallen vpon her bed to beſeech her fauour, the king entred, and grew the more diſpleaſed at that he ſaw, and ſaid. O thou curſed amongſt men, darſt thou attempt to enforce my wife? Aman was wholly confounded with this queſtion; ſo as hee had not a word to anſwer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadas ſtepping forth, accuſed him for that hee had found him in his lodging erecting a Iibbet for Mardocheus, aſſuring the king that one of his houſhold ſeruants had told him it, at ſuch time as hee was ſent to call him to the banquet; alleadging moreo- Aman hauing all his trecheries and cruelty diſcouered, in the banquet is adiudged to the gallowes.

And in this place it behoueth me to admire the maieſtie of God, in conſidering what his wiſedome and iuſtice is, in that he not only puniſhed the wickednes of Aman (as he had deſerued) but alſo cauſed him to fall into the ſame ſnare which he had prepared for an other man. Thus died Aman, who had vniuſtly abuſed the kings friendſhip: as for his goods they were giuen vnto the Queene.

Many men being puffed vp with pride, by reaſon of the many and mighty benefits and honours, which they receiue thorow the too lauiſh liberality of their benefactors, do not onely exerciſe their pride towards their inferiours, but alſo are not affraid to waxe inſolent againſt them, who are the authors of their benefits, extinguiſhing as much as in them lieth, all gratuitie that hath euer beene amongſt men, and being corrupted with vnexpected felicity abuſe thoſe graces amongſt them, by whom they haue gotten the ſame, in effect no waies fearing God, whoſe power they ſuppoſe they can deceiue. On the other ſide, other ſome enhanced to the adminiſtration of the common weale, and giuing place to the hatred they haue conceiued againſt ſome particular men, deceiue their princes, and by falſe accuſations and detractions prouoke K and kindle their wrath againſt thoſe, who haue not done amiſſe: whence it commeth to paſſe, that they are ſometimes in extreame danger to loſe their life. The proofe whereof appeareth not onely in ancient hiſtories (the knowledge whereof we haue onely obtained by heare-ſay) but by that likewiſe which hath bin audaciouſly attempted before our eies; ſo that hereafter we ought not to giue credit to detractions and accuſations, nor to ſuch things as men inforce themſelues to perſwade: but it behoueth euery man to iudge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to puniſh that which is faulty, and to pardon that which requireth pardon, in conſidering the acts, and not the words that are ſpoken. For it is moſt notorious vnto all men, that Aman the Amadathite (an Amalechite by nation, and by that meanes a ſtranger, and not of the Perſian blood, but entertained by vs) hath in all things enioyed the fruite of our bounty hitherto; ſo L that he hath beene called our father, honoured by all men, and obtained amongſt all men, and in all things, the ſecond place of honor after vs: yet could he not equally make vſe of his good hap, neither with prudent aduice entertaine the greatneſſe of his felicity; but hath ſought the meanes to depriue Mardocheus of his life, who preſerued mine; ſeeking by his fraud and malice to practiſe the ruine of Eſther the companion of our life and kingdome; and by this meanes ſtriuing to diſpoſſeſſe me of my moſt faithfull friends, he determined to transferre the kingdome vnto others. Touching my ſelfe, in that I know that the Iewes, who are by this wretch deſtinated to die, are no wicked men, but ſuch as liue vnder a well policied gouernment, praying God continually that it would pleaſe him to continue the kingdome in vs, and our ſucceſſours: I abſolue them not onely of that penalty, contained in my former letters ſent by Aman (which by theſe preſents M
I vtterly diſanull) but my pleaſure likewiſe is, that they be had in all honour. As for him that practiſed theſe things againſt them, I haue cauſed him and all his race to be hanged before the gates of Suſan, according to the iuſt iudgement of God inflicted on them for their offences. My will and pleaſure therefore is, that the copy of this letter be ſent thorow all the countries of our obeiſance, to the intent that the Iewes be ſuffered to liue, according to their owne lawes, in peace; and that aſſiſtance may bee giuen them, to the end they may reuenge themſelues of thoſe, who

A haue offered them outrage in their aduerſitie. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preſeruation (when as they were appointed to be ſlaine) which day I deſire to fall out fortunate to thoſe that loue vs, and a monument of reuenge on thoſe that pretended our ruine. My pleaſure likewiſe is, that all men, cities and nations ſhould know, that whoſoeuer ſhall neglect, thorow obſtinacy, to fulfill the tenor of this my mandate, he ſhall be purſued with fire and ſword: and let theſe copies be ſet vp thorowout all our dominions, and let each man of the Iewes vpon the prefixed day, prepare himſelfe to be reuenged on his enemies. The yeare of the world, 3554 before Chriſts Nativity 410.

As ſoone as the Poaſts had receiued theſe letters, they preſently mounted on horſebacke, and road each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a royall habite, and a-
B dorned with a crowne of gold on his head, and a chaine of gold about his necke, iſſued forth: and the Iewes of Suſan, ſeeing him thus honoured by the King, ſuppoſed that his good hap was an aſſurance of their own: and when the kings letters were publiſhed, a ioy as it were a bright beam of conſolation enuironed the Hebrew nation, as well thoſe that were in the citie of Suſan, as they that were amid the countrey; ſo that diuers men of other nations circumciſed themſelues, for feare they had of the Iewes, ſuppoſing that in ſo doing they ſhould be in ſecuritie. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians Diſtre) the Poaſts that carried the kings letters certified them, that they ſhould exterminate their enemies on that very day, whereon they themſelues were in danger to bee exterminated. The gouernours likewiſe of the prouinces, the Lords, Kings, and ſecretaries, did honour to the Iewes:
C for the feare they had of Mardocheus conſtrained them to moderate themſelues; and after the kings letters were publiſhed thorow all the countrey, it came to paſſe that the Iewes ſlew about fiue hundreth of their enemies. But after the king had declared vnto Eſther, the number of the dead that periſhed in the Citie, ſuſpecting with himſelfe what might happen thorow the whole countrey, and had likewiſe queſtioned with her if ſhe requeſted any further matter, promiſing her that he would ſee it executed: ſhe beſought him that it might be lawfull for the Iews to reuenge them yet once more the next day vpon their enemies, and to hang Amans ten ſonnes vpon the Iibbet: which the king (being loath to contradict Eſther) permitted the Iews to doe: they therefore returning the fourteenth day of the moneth Diſtre, ſlew about three hundreth more of their enemies; yet aliened they not in any ſort the ſmalleſt portion of their goods. Furthermore, the D Iewes ſlew in the champain countrey, and in the Cities, about ſeuentie fiue thouſand of their enemies, whom they diſpatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, and ſolemnized the day following. The Iews that were at Suſan, aſſembled themſelues likewiſe on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banquetted the whole day. Whence it commeth to paſſe that all the Iewes which are thorowout the world, keepe and ſolemnize this day for a feſtiuall, and ſend preſents the one vnto the other. Mardocheus alſo wrote vnto the Iewes, who liued vnder the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to obſerue thoſe daies, and to ſolemnize them; willing them to charge their ſucceſſours to doe the like, to the ende that this feaſt might continue for euer, and outliue all obliuion. For ſince on that day they ſhould haue been made away by Aman, they ſhould doe well if after they had eſcaped that danger, and taken reuenge on their enemies, the verie ſame
E day they ſhould obſerue the ſame to giue thankes vnto God: For this cauſe the Iewes keepe a ſolemne feaſt on theſe daies and call it Purim, as who ſhould ſay, Lottes. But Mardocheus was great and mightie with the king, adminiſtring the kingdome with him; he had alſo a part of the greatneſſe of the Queene: and for this cauſe the affaires of the Iewes had better ſucceſſe, then was hoped for. See here how matters paſſed, during the raigne of Artaxerxes.

BAGOSES Generall of ARTAXERXES the youngers army, offereth many outrages to the Iewes.

F AFTER the death of Eliaſib the high Prieſt, Iudas his ſonne ſucceeded in the office. And after his death Iohn his ſonne obtained the place; in whoſe time Bagoſes generall of Artaxerxes army polluted the temple, and made the Iewes tributaries; ſo that before they could offer their ordinarie and dayly ſacrifices, they were compelled to pay for euery lambe fifty drachmes, which happned vpon this occaſion. Iohn had a brother called Ieſus, whom Bagoſes fauoured, and promiſed to giue him the high prieſthood. Ieſus wonne by theſe perſwaſions, quarrelled with his brother Iohn: who was ſo much prouoked againſt him, that he ſlewe his brother Ieſus

Ieſus in his choler. It was a thing very ſtrange, that Iohn being a Prieſt, ſhould commit ſuch an impietie againſt his brother, and yet farre more ſtrange in that ſo cruell an act, and an offence ſo impious hath neither hapned amongſt Greekes nor Barbarians. God alſo left it not vnpuniſhed, but for the ſame ſinne the people were reduced vnder captiuitie, and the temple was polluted by the Perſians. When Bagoſes had intelligence, that Iohn (the high Prieſt among the Iewes) had ſlaine his brother Ieſus in the temple, he reſorted thither in all haſt, and began to vtter, and breake forth into bitter threats againſt the Iewes: Haue you (ſaid he) beene ſo bold as to commit murther in your temple? And when hee thought to haue entred into the ſame, they hindred him. Whereupon he replied: Am I therefore more polluted then the body that lyeth dead in the Temple? And hauing ſpoken thus, he entred thereinto, and for the ſpace of ſeauen yeeres Bagoſes being thus animated againſt the Iewes, puniſhed them for murthering Ieſus. After that Iohn was deceaſed, Iaddus his ſonne was made high Prieſt; who had a brother called Manaſſes: Sanaballath ſent by the latter King Darius to gouerne Samaria (for he alſo was of the race of the Chutæans, from whom iſſued the Samaritanes) knowing that Ieruſalem was a famous Citie, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble vnto the inhabitants of Aſſyria, and Cœloſyria; he willingly married his daughter Nicazo to this Manaſſes, with an intent that this marriage ſhould be as a pledge of his good will to the nation of the Iewes.

Alexander made king after Philip his father King of Macedon.

ABOVT that time, Philip King of Macedon died in the citie of Ægæas, being traiterouſly ſlaine by Pauſanias the ſonne of Ceraſtes, of the race of Oreſtes; and his ſonne Alexander ſucceeded him in the kingdome: who paſſing ouer Helleſpont, gaue battell vnto the huge army of Darius neere the riuer Granic, and there obtained a famous victorie. And hereupon he alſo inuading the countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Ionia, and ouer-runne Caria) finally ſet vpon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in an other place. But the Elders of Ieruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed, for that Iaddus brother, who was at that time high Prieſt, and had married a forraine woman, ſhould be companion and aſſociate with him in the Prieſthood; ſo as they mutined againſt him. For they ſuppoſed that that marriage would be but a meanes to animate thoſe who had a minde to prophane marriages, and prooue an inducement to other to communicate in marriage with ſtrangers: remembring them that the cauſe of their euils, and firſt captiuitie was, becauſe ſome of them had fallen, and offended by coupling themſelues with women of forraine nations.

The yeere of the world, 3629 before Christs Nativity. 325.

They therfore commanded Manaſſes either to forſake his wife, or elſe neuer more to approch the Altar. The high Prieſt likewiſe being incenſed againſt his brother, as well as the people, draue him in like manner from the ſacrifice. For which cauſe Manaſſes (addreſſing himſelfe to his father in law Sanaballath) told him that although he loued his daughter Nicazo very intirely; yet would he not notwithſtanding condeſcend for her ſake to be depriued of the Prieſthood (which was the greateſt dignity that could be among their nation, and which had euer continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath anſwered and promiſed him, that he would not onely continue him in the Prieſthood, but alſo would giue him the power and dignitie of the high Prieſthood, & make him gouernour of all places where he commanded, prouided the mariage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter & him, were continued. He furthermore aſſured him that he would build a temple (reſembling that in Ieruſalem) vpon the mountaine of Garizim which was the higheſt among the reſt, permitting him to doe the ſame with Darius conſent. Manaſſes puffed vp by theſe promiſes, remained with Sanaballath, and grew in hope that he ſhould obtain the prieſthood by Darius meanes: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore diuers other, both Prieſts and common people, among the Iſraelites, were intangled in ſuch like marriages, there aroſe no ſmall commotion in Ieruſalem. For all they of this condition retired themſelues to Manaſſes, whom Sanaballath furniſhed with money, and lands to till, and houſes to inhabite in all ſorts, to fauour the intent of his ſonne in law.

The Apoſtaſie of the Prieſts.

At the ſame time Darius vnderſtanding that Alexander, hauing paſſed the Helleſpont had ouercome thoſe gouernours, whom he had eſtabliſhed neere vnto the floud Granicus, and that he paſſed further, ſpoyling of his countrey; he gathered together both his horſemen and footmen, reſoluing to make head againſt the Macedonians, before they ſhould gaine all Aſia: he therefore paſſed Euphrates, & mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encoũter & fight with his enemies in the coũtry.

Sanaballath

A Sanaballath ioyful of Darius deſcent, incontinently told Manaſſes that he would fulfill his promiſes, as ſoone as Darius ſhould returne from the conqueſt of his enemies. For not only he, but alſo all the Aſians perſwaded themſelues moſt aſſuredly that the Macedonians would not abide the battell againſt the Perſians, by reaſon of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Perſian encountring with the Macedonian was ouercome, and after he had loſt the greater part of his army, and left his mother, wife and children priſoners, hee himſelfe fled into Perſia. Alexander ariuing in Syria, ſeiſed Damaſco, tooke Sidon, and beſieged Tyre: and by his letters ſent vnto the high prieſt of the Iewes, he required him to ſend him ſome ſupplies in his warre, and to ſell his army victuals for their money; aſſuring him that if hee deſired the friendſhip of the Macedonians, he would giue him that tribute which he paid to Darius,
B beſides other good turnes. The high prieſt anſwered Alexanders meſſenger, that he had ſworne vnto Darius neuer to beare armes againſt him, during his life time; againſt which oath of his, hee would neuer worke any indignitie. Which when Alexander heard, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and reſolued notwithſtanding to continue the ſiege at Tyre, vntill ſuch time as it was taken; yet threatned he that as ſoon as he had taked the ſame, he would lead forth his army againſt the high prieſt to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keepe their faith. For which cauſe ſparing no labour, he ouercame Tyre, and after he had giuen order to the eſtate thereof, he came vnto Gaza, and tooke it with Babemeſes the captaine of the garriſon that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunity to make himſelfe great, forſooke Darius & followed Alexander, leading with him eight thouſand of his ſubiects: and finding him vpon the beginning of the ſiege of Tyre,
C he offered to ſurrender him all thoſe places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had done Darius. Alexander accepted him willingly: wherupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole eſtate; giuing him to vnderſtand that Manaſſes (who was brother to Iaddus the high prieſt of the Iewes) was his ſonne in law, who with diuers of the ſame nation, were deſirous to build them a temple in the countries vnder his dominion, aſſuring the king of much profit thereby, becauſe in ſo doing the force of the Iewes ſhould bee diſmembred into two parts, and they might not conſpire together to make any new inſurrection or trouble, as in times paſt they had done during the gouernment of the kings of Aſſyria.

When Sanaballath had permiſſion from Alexander to build this temple, with the greateſt ſpeed he might, he finiſhed the ſame, and made Manaſſes the high Prieſt thereof, ſuppoſing that
D it was the greateſt aduantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seuen moneths after the ſurpriſall of Tyre, and two after the taking in of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander alſo raſed Gaza, and prepared himſelfe to come ſodainly vpon Ieruſalem. Which when the high prieſt Iaddus vnderſtood, he was much grieued, and ſore afraid, not knowing how to grow in fauour with the Macedonians: and on the other ſide knowing that the King was diſpleaſed againſt him (becauſe before time he had diſobeyed him:) Hee therefore commanded the people to make their prayers vnto God, and he in his owne perſon offered ſacrifice; requiring God that it would pleaſe him to be a ſhield of defence, and ſuccour to their nation, and to deliuer them from thoſe imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whileſt hee ſlept,
E God appeared vnto him, and willed him to be of good courage, and commanding him that as ſoone as hee had circuited the walles, he ſhould open the gates boldly, and command the reſt of the people to attire themſelues in white; and that accompanied with them, he ſhould march forward in thoſe prieſtly ornaments, which were ordained by the lawe, to the end that in this equipage they might goe and meete with Alexander, without apprehenſion of any future euill, becauſe that God had preuented the ſame. As ſoone as he awaked from his ſleep, he was very ioyfull, and certified the reſt of this prediction of God; and performing that which had beene commanded him, he expected in this manner the approche of the King; and when he knew that he was not farre off from the Citie, hee marched forth to meete him, accompanied with the Prieſts, and a multitude of other people, preſenting a moſt royall manner of entertaine, and farre different from that of other nations, neere vnto a place called Sapha; which word ſignifieth a F watch (by reaſon that from that place a man may diſcouer the Citie and temple of Ieruſalem.) The Phœnicians and Chaldæans that were of Alexanders traine, grounding their hopes vpon his diſpleaſure, made their attempt to ſacke the Citie, and to hewe the high Prieſt in pieces: but it fell out quite contrarie. For Alexander eſpying the people from afarre in white rayments, and the Prieſts going before them in their fine rochets, and the high Prieſt attired in a robe of purple, bordered with gold, hauing his miter on his head, and his plate of gold, wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himſelfe marched forward before the reſt of his companie; and fell fell prostrate on his face before that Name, saluting first of all the high Priest; and at the same instant all the Iewes together saluted the king with one voice, and circled him in round about. The Kings of Syria & the rest that saw that which hapned, were wonderfully astonished, and thought that the King was out of his wits: Parmenio onely drew neere vnto him, and asked him what he meant to adore the Priest of the Iewes, whereas all other men adored him. To whom he answered; I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Priest worshippeth: for in my sleepe I saw him in such a habite, as I see him in at this present, at such time as I was in Dio a Citie of Macedonia: and whilest I consulted with my selfe by what meanes I might attaine to the conquest of Asia, he counselled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, assuring me that it would be he that would guide both me and mine army, and would deliuer the Empire of the Persians into my hands. Since that time I haue not seene any one attired after the same manner: and at this present beholding this man, and remembring me of the vision, and exhortation that he gaue mee in my sleepe, I hope that mine army being conducted by diuine prouidence, I shall ouercome Darius, and discomfit the Persians, and that my purpose shall haue a happy issue.

Alexanders sacrifice in the temple, the confirmation of his conquest by Daniels prophecy, his bounty to the Iewes.

When he had answered Parmenio in this sort, he gaue the high Priest his hand, and went with him into the City, being conducted by the Priests: after this, when he came vnto the temple, he offered sacrifice, according to the high Priests direction, whom he honoured likewise with very great reuerence. And when as likewise Iaddus shewed him the prophecy of Daniel, wherin he declared that a certaine man of the nation of the Greekes, should destroy the estate of the Persians, and that in his opinion it should bee: thereof Alexander was very ioyfull, and dismissed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day assembling the Iewes, hee commanded them to demand certaine fauours at his hands: whereupon the high Priest answered, that he required the exercises of the ordinances of their forefathers, and that euery seauenth yeere they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They besought him likewise that by his permission the Iewes that were in the countries of Babylon and Media, might liue according to their lawes. And he promised them willingly to doe all that which they desired. He made proclamation also among the people, that if any one of them should beare armes with him (in liuing according to the custome of their nation) he was ready to receiue them with him: and diuers tooke pleasure to serue vnder him in the warres.

After that Alexander had in this sort demeaned himselfe in Ierusalem, hee marched with his armie against the neighbouring City: and whersoeuer he went, he was receiued with great affection. But the Samaritanes, whose Metropolitane City at that time was Sichem (situate neere vnto the mountaine of Garizim, in which there dwelt diuers Iewes also, that were reuolted from their nation) seeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Iewes, they resolued to demeane themselues like Iewes. For such is the nature of Samaritanes (as we haue declared heretofore) that when the Iewes are in affliction, they deny all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confesse the truth:) but when they perceiue any beam of good aduenture shining vpon them, so dainly thy vaunt of their alliance, saying, they are neere akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manasses the sonnes of Ioseph. They came therefore to the kings presence, and met him neere vnto Ierusalem, with great magnificence, and demonstration of singular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approched neere vnto him (being accompanied with those men of warre that Sanaballath had sent vnto the king) beseeching him that he would visit their City and honour their temple with his presence: whereupon he promised that at his returne hee would visit them. They required him also, that hee would acquite them of the tribute of the seuenth yeere, because they did not sowe in the same. He asked them who they were that made that request? They answered him, that they were Hebrewes: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sydonians. He asked them againe, if they were Iewes? and they said, they were not. Well (said he) I haue made this grant vnto the Iewes: when as therefore I shall returne, if I be more particularly informed, I shall doe that which shall be held requisite. Thus dismissed he the Sichemites, but he commanded Sanaballaths men of war to follow him into Ægypt: promising in that place to impart possessions vnto them by lot; which afterwards he did (enioyning them to liue in garrison in the City of Thebais, to make good that country.) After Alexanders death, his Empire was diuided amongst his successors, and the temple builded neere vnto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accused in Ierusalē for eating vnlawfull meats, or for transgressing the Saboth, or for any such like fault, he fled vnto the Sichemites, saying, that he was accused vniustly. In that time deceased the hie priest Iaddus: and Onias, his sonne succeeded him. This was the estate of them of Ierusalem at that time.

ALEXANDER King of Macedon hauing ouercome the Perſians, and eſtabliſhed the eſtate of the Iewes (according as it hath beene ſpoken) he departed this life. Whereupon his dominions and kingdomes fell into diuers mens hands; Antigonus was Lord of Aſia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering nations: Lyſimachus had Helleſpont: Caſſander Macedon: and Ptolomey the ſonne of Lagus held Ægypt. Now when as theſe men were at diſcord amongſt themſelues (whileſt each of them affected the ſoueraignty, and fought the one with the other) diuers great and continuall warres grew to head, which afflicted many Cities: whereby it came to paſſe, that many of the inhabitants thereof died in fight, and all Syria likewiſe vnder Ptolomey the ſonne of Lagus (who beyond his merit was called Soter, that is as much to ſay, as a Sauiour) liued in little ſafetie. and policie : for hee entred the Citie vpon a Sabboth day, vnder pretext to offer sacrifice ; and whilest the Iewes suspected nothing, but spent the day in idlenesse and quiet, hee surprised the Citie without resist, and ouerpressed the Citizens with hatefull captiuitie. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the actes of Alexanders successors) witnesseth no lesse, reproching vs of superstition ; as if intending thereby, that by that meanes we lost our Citie. Hee writeth to this effect. There is a certaine nation, which are called Iewes, who inhabite a Citie which is called Ierusalem, both strong and mightie. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomeis hands, because they would not stand vpon their guard, and through their importunate superstition, they permitted themselues to be subdued by a Tyrant conqueror. See here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation. But Ptolomey leading away with him diuers prisoners of the better quarters of Iudæa, and the places neere vnto Ierusalem, of Samaria and mount Garizim, sent them into Ægypt to inhabite there : and beeing assured that those of Ierusalem were most firme in maintaining their oaths and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, hee sent Embassadours vnto them : hee put diuers of them into his garrisons, giuing them the same priuiledges in the Citie of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After hee had receiued their oath, that they should be faithfull vnto his successors, in memorie of the great trust and fauours hee had bestowed on them, many of the other Iewes likewise of their owne accord went into Ægypt, partly allured thereunto by the plentie of the countrey, partly by the liberalitie of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continuall seditions betwixt their posteritie and the Samaritanes : for that they would keepe and maintaine the customes and ordinances of their forefathers ; whereupon diuers warres arose amongst them. For they of Ierusalem said that their Temple was the true sanctuarie of God, and would that the offrings and sacrifices should be sent thither : the Samaritanes contrariwise commanded them to be brought to the mount Garizim.

PTOLOMEY PHILADELPHVS causeth the lawes of the Iewes to bee translated into the Greeke tongue : and dismissing many captiue Iewes, dedicateth many presents in the Temple of God.

Hecto & Rufinus, chap. 2.

The library of Ptolomey Philadelphus.

AFTER him Philadelphus succeeded in the kingdome of Ægypt, and held it for nine and thirty yeeres space. He it was that translated the law into the Greeke tongue, and deliuered the Iewes from that seruitude, wherein they were enthralled in Ægypt, to the number of sixescore thousand, vpon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalereus Master of the Kings library, endeuoured to his vttermost to gather vp all sorts of books that were in the world, and bought all that which was agreeable to the Kings intent, who aboue all things was curious to assemble diuersitie of bookes. Hee beeing one day demanded by the King, how many thousands of volumes hee had already gathered : hee answered him, that hee had already assembled about some two hundred thousand volumes : but that shortly he would gather to the number of fiue hundred thousand. Besides, hee certified him, that he had beene lately aduertised that there were diuers volumes among the Iewes, wherein many things as touching their lawes and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and deserued to be put in so memorable and famous a library as his was : which being written and set downe in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greeke tongue. For their characters seeme to haue some reference to the Syriacke, and their pronunciation likewise not much dissonant from the same : and notwithstanding they haue their phrase proper and peculiar vnto themselues. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated : for the King defraying the charge, might easily cause it to bee done, to the ende that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his librarie. Heereupon the King praising Demetrius care in collecting and gathering bookes, wrote vpto the high Priest of the Iewes, commanding that this translation might bee finished. In the meane time a certaine man called Aristæus, who was intirely beloued and befriended by the King, by reason of his modestie, and had diuers times before that present resolued with himselfe to sollicite the King, to dismisse all the Iewes that were in his kingdome, supposing that at that instant hee had fit opportunitie offered him to make his request, hee spake vnto Sosibus the Tarentine, and Andrew the chiefe captaine of the Kings guard, beseeching them to fauour him in that which he intended to moue the King in. Hauing therefore sounded the affections of these noble men, he addressed himselfe

A himſelfe vnto the King,and ſpake vnto him after this manner: Since my ſoueraigne, it behoueth vs not to deceiue our ſelues by diſſimulation,but it neceſſarily importeth vs to diſcouer the truth: wheras we haue concluded with our ſelues,not onely to tranſcript, but alſo to tranſlate the lawes of the Iewes, the rather to performe ſome acceptable ſeruice to your grace;what honeſt pretext is there left for vs to attaine thereunto, as long as there are ſo great a number of Iewes kept in thraldome in thy kingdome? You ſhall therefore doe a worke anſwerable to the greatnes of your courage and benignitie, if you deliuer them from their miſery, conſidering that hee who gaue them their lawe is God, who gouerneth your kingdome (as by diligent inquiſition I haue certainely apprehended) for both they and wee adore one God creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Iupiter,for as much as he maintaineth our life & the liues of all men.For that honour therefore which you owevnto God,ſend backe theſe people into their countrey, and per-
B mit them to inhabite the ſame,who amongſt al men are moſt ſingularly affected to their religion. Neither hath your Grace occaſion to ſuſpect, that I offer theſe ſupplications and prayers vnto you in their fauour, and for their profit, becauſe I am either allied or deſcended of any of their tribes: But where there is but one God,who is the maker of all men,and I my ſelfe am aſſured, that he taketh pleaſure in thoſe men that addict themſelues to beneficence,this is the onely cauſe that induceth me to make this requeſt vnto you. When Ariſtæus had ended this diſcourſe of his, the king beholding him with a cheerefull and pleaſant countenance, asked him how many thouſands he thought they were,whoſe liberty he required? Andrew (beeing hard at hand) anſwered, that there were more then one hundreth and twenty thouſand. Whereupon the king replyed,
C Is this demand Ariſtæus a matter of ſmall conſequence, which thou requireſt? Soſibius and the other aſſiſtants anſwered,that his reacknowledgement which he made vnto God, who had giuen him the kingdome,was worthy the greatneſſe of his courage; ſo that reioycing at this their content,he charged him at ſuch time as they deliuered the men of warre their pay, they ſhould ouer & aboue the ſame,pay euery one of them that had priſoners with them,ſix ſcore drachmes: and as touching the requeſt made by them, he promiſed them to diſpatch his letters pattents, in moſt ample manner,to bring a happy iſſue to Ariſtæus ſuite; or rather to ſatisfie the will of God, which was eſpecially to be reſpected. Whereunto conforming himſelfe, he ſent out his proclamation: certifying thereby that hee not onely ſet them at liberty, who had beene brought thither by his father, or thoſe of his army who attended him; but them alſo who before time had
D beene in his kingdome; or that ſithence likewiſe had beene brought thither: and notwithſtanding it was told him that the money that would be required for their ranſome would amount to more then foure hundreth talents; yet ceaſed he not to confirme that which he had promiſed.But that it may more plainely appeare how great his royal magnificence was,I haue thought good to inſert in this place the copie of his edict, which he ſent abroad to this effect. Whoſoeuer of you that in my fathers ſeruice(by bearing armes vnder him) haue made any roades into Syria and Phœnicia, and after the conqueſt of Iudæa haue taken any priſoners, and brought them to our Cities and countries, with an intent to ſell them: all they alſo, who haue heretofore detained any, or at this preſent haue any ſuch captiues in their poſſeſſion, they are to ſet them at libertie that liue vnder their thraldome, receiuing for the ranſome of euery perſon ſixe-
E ſcore drachmes: namely the men of warre, at ſuch time as their wages ſhall be paid them: as for the reſt,they ſhall receiue their money out of the kings treaſurie. For I am of that opinion, that contrarie to my fathers mind,and againſt all right,they haue beene taken priſoners,and that their country hath bin in this ſort euilly intreated,by the inſolencie of the ſoldiers,who haue thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, in transferring them into Ægypt. Hauing therefore an eſpeciall reſpect of iuſtice, and intending to ſhew mercy to thoſe who are wrongfully oppreſſed, I command that all thoſe Iewes, who are detained in ſeruitude be diſcharged, and that they who held them captiue receiue the ranſome publiſhed by vs; ſo as no deceit or fraud be vſed therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled,our will is, that this edict of ours be publikely proclaimed three daies after it ſhall come vnto your hands; and that F thoſe,who hold ſuch priſoners in their poſſeſſion,declare how many priſoners they hold.For we ſuppoſe,that in ſo doing it ſhall redound to our profit. Moreouer, it ſhall be lawfull for any man that will, to accuſe the contemners of this decree, and our pleaſure is that ſuch as contradict the ſame,ſhall haue their goods confiſcate to the Kings vſes. When this edict of the Kings publiſhed to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that onely point was omitted, that concerned thoſe that before time had beene, and afterward the ſecond time were led away priſoners, in whoſe behalfe hee had giuen no direction; he ſhewed himſelfe moſt bountifull in like manner toward theſe: And gaue order that the number and tallie ſhould be ſpeedily gathered, and the money diſtributed to the committees, and treaſurers appertaining to him. Which being ſpeedily performed in the ſpace of ſeuen daies, all the kings ordinance was accompliſhed, and there was laid out for the ranſomes of them all to the ſumme of more then foure hundreth and ſixtie talents: For the maſters exacted ſixeſcore drachmes for the children alſo, grounding themſelues vpon the kings edict, by which it was ordained that for euery perſon they ſhould haue that ſumme, extending the ſame euen vnto the children. G

Theſe things beeing thus magnificently exployted, according to the kings command, hee gaue Demetrius in charge to make a decree, as touching the tranſlation of the bookes of the Iewes. For the king did nothing raſhly, but adminiſtred all things with great wiſedome, and circumſpection; and for that cauſe the copie of Demetrius ſuggeſtion, and the letters ſent to this effect, are orderly regiſtred, and recorded in writing: the number likewiſe of the preſents that were ſent, and by whom they were offered. So that whoſoeuer ſhall behold the ſame, he ſhall incontinently iudge by the curious workemanſhip the high perfection of the workeman, and by the excellencies of the pieces he ſhal incontinently know by whom each of them was faſhioned. H

Demetrius' exhortatory letter to Ptolomey as touching his library.

The copie of the aduice and ſuggeſtion made by Demetrius is this: Demetrius to the great king: Health. Moſt mightie Prince, ſince you haue committed the truſt vnto me to finde out thoſe bookes that are deficient in your librarie, and to ſearch for ſuch volumes as hitherto haue beene hid from my ſight, to the end that I might gather them and perfect them, and that thoſe which are loſt, might be reſtored with all the diligence that thereunto belongeth, after that I had vſed herein all the care that in me was poſſible; I giue you to vnderſtand that amongſt others, we want the bookes of the lawes of the Iewes. For in that they are written in Characters and Hebrew words, we haue no notice thereof; where-through they haue beene more negligently handled then was behouefull: for that vntill this day it hath neuer hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended ſo farre. It therefore behoueth thee to haue them exactly interpreted; for ſince that thoſe lawes proceeded from God himſelfe, it is moſt certaine that of all other lawes in the world they are the wiſeſt and incorrupteſt. For which cauſe, Hecataeus the Abderite ſaith, that neither Poets nor Hiſtorians haue made any mention of them; neither of thoſe, who haue beene policied and gouerned vnder the ſame: becauſe in themſelues they are pure, and are not to be declared by impure lips. May it therefore pleaſe your Maieſty to write vnto the high Prieſt of the Iewes, commanding him to ſend you ſixe Ancients of euery tribe, ſuch as hee ſhall know to be moſt expert in their law, by whom wee may cleerely apprehend the ſenſe contained in thoſe bookes, to the end that hauing the faithfull interpretation of thoſe things that are contained therein, we may collect and gather them together, to the full ſatisfaction of your Maieſties deſire. I K

The kings liberalitie towards the Iewes.

When the king had in this ſort beene both aduiſed and ſuggeſted, hee wrote vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt of the Iewes, as touching this matter: giuing him likewiſe to vnderſtand of that liberty by him granted vnto the Iewes that were in his kingdome: He ſent him alſo fifty talents of gold, to maks cups, ewers and veſſels, with an infinite number of precious ſtones, commanding his coferers, who had the charge of his Iewels, to ſuffer the workmen to chooſe what ſtones they beſt liked. Furthermore, he willed that a hundreth talents ſhould bee giuen for the ſacrifices and oblations, and other vſes of the temple. But after that I haue declared what was the coppy of the letter ſent vnto Eleazar the high Prieſt, and the manner how hee obtained that ſacerdotall dignitie; I will ſet downe both the rich preſents, and their curious workemanſhip. L

After the death of Onias the high Prieſt; his ſonne Simon ſurnamed the Iuſt, ſucceeded him in his place, who for that cauſe was ſo called, by reaſon of the piety which he ſhewed toward God, & the good affection which he bare vnto his countrimen. This Simon dying and leauing behind him one only ſon, of yong & tender yeers who was called Onias: his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we ſpeake at this preſent) took vpon him the prieſthood, and to him wrote Ptolomey in ſuch manner as is hereafter expreſſed. King Ptolomey to the high Prieſt Eleazar, health:

Ptolomeis epiſtle to Eleazar for interpreters to tranſlate the Bible.

Wheras diuers Iewes dwelt in my kingdome, whom my father had honored (though during the raigne of the Perſians they were drawne thither as priſoners) ſome of whom he hath eſtabliſhed to be chieftaines in warre, vnder honourable wages and conditions: To other ſome borne in his time in Ægypt, he hath committed his forts and garriſons, to the end they might bee reſpected among the Ægyptians: After that I haue beene called to the gouernment, I haue behaued my ſelfe graciouſly towards all men, and eſpecially towards thoſe of your nation, of whom I haue deliuered more then one hundreth thouſand out of captiuitie, diſburſing their ranſome out of M

A mine owne cofers: I haue likewiſe inrouled ſome of thoſe that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of warre: I haue receiued ſome into my court, whom I took to be faithfull and loyall, and in my opinion well worthy of ſuch preferment: ſuppoſing that the moſt acceptable and the deereſt preſent I might offer vp vnto God, for his prouidence extended toward me in aduancing me to the kingdome, was to performe the ſame. And being deſirous not onely to gratifie them, but alſo all thoſe Iewes that are in the whole world, I haue determined to cauſe your law to be tranſlated; that after it hath beene tranſcripted out of Hebrew into Greeke, I might place it in my librarie. You ſhall therefore do well, if you chooſe me out ſixe diſcreet and learned men of euery tribe amongſt you, who are already ſtept in yeeres, and ſend them vnto me, who by reaſon of their age ſhall bee well inſtructed in your lawes, and ſufficiently enabled to expound the ſame. B For in ſo doing, I ſhall accept it at your hands, as a great honour. For this cauſe I ſend vnto you Andrew the principall Captaine of my guard, and Ariſtæus alſo (whom we eſpecially honour) to conferre with you: by whom I haue ſent you one hundreth talents of ſilner, as the firſt fruits of thoſe gifts and ſacrifices, which wee intend to offer in the Temple. You ſhall doe vs an eſpeciall fauour, if you ſignifie your minde vnto vs by your letters.

The yeere of the world, 3684. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 280.

As ſoone as Eleazar had receiued the Kings letters, he returned him an anſwer full of honour and affection, according to the tenour which enſueth. The high Prieſt Eleazar to King Ptolomey: Health. If you, your Queene Arſinoe, and your children be in health, all our affaires likewiſe haue no leſſe fortunate ſucceſſe. Wee haue receiued your princely letters with no ſmall ioy, and haue both read and conſidered vpon the contents thereof; we haue alſo publiſhed them in the preſence of all the people, and haue declared vnto them your pietie towards God, and haue ſhewed them C thoſe viols which you ſent vs, twenty of gold, and thirty of ſiluer; with fiue veſſels, and a Table which in way of preſent you haue ſent vnto vs. Wee haue likewiſe ſhewed them thoſe hundreth talents which Andrew and Ariſtæus (very vertuous and excellenty learned men, and honoured by you amongſt your deereſt friends) haue brought vnto vs, to be employed in ſacrifices and other neceſſities of the Temple. Know therefore, that whatſoeuer ſtandeth either with your content or profit, wee will enforce our owne natures, to the end wee may acknowledge the benefits, which you haue diuers waies beſtowed vpon our nation. We haue therefore duely and continually offered ſacrifice for you, your Queene Arſinoe, your children and friends: the people likewiſe haue prayed that God would ſend you happy ſucceſſe in whatſoeuer you deſire, that your kingdome D may be continued in peace, and that the tranſlation of our law may be accompliſhed in ſuch ſort, as you deſire, for your owne commodity. To that intent we haue choſen ſixe Elders out of euery Tribe, whom we ſend vnto you, together with the originall of our law. Our requeſt is, that according to your accuſtomed pietie and iuſtice, you returne vs both our lawes and theſe interpreters in ſafety, as ſoone as they haue ſatisfied your expectation. Fare you well.

Eleazars letters in anſwer to Ptolomey.

This in the anſwer which the high Prieſt ſent vnto him. Yet haue I thought it to be a matter meerely vnneceſſarie to ſet downe the names of the ſeuentie two Elders in particular, who were ſent by Eleazar together with the law, notwithſtanding they were ſet downe in the Epiſtle. Yet thinke I it not amiſſe, to recite the excellency and faſhion of thoſe preſents that were ſent by the King, and offered vp vnto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards E the ſeruice of God. For in performance thereof, he ſpared no immeſurable expence, but continually aſſiſted the workemen, and examined their workemanſhip, to the end that nothing might bee careleſly finiſhed, or negligently performed. I will therefore ſet downe (as neere as in me lieth) the excellencie of euery peece (although it may be thought that the courſe of hiſtorie requireth it not) but therefore will I diſcourſe the ſame, becauſe my deſire is by ſo doing to expreſſe vnto the Readers, how great the liberalitie and generoſitie of the King hath beene. And firſt of all I will begin to deſcribe the Table.

The deſcription of thoſe preſents which Ptolomey dedicated in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The king deſirous to make it great in all dimenſions, deſired to know the greatneſſe of that which was at Ieruſalem, to the intent that he might cauſe it to be far greater. And hauing certaine notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, hee ſaid F that he would haue it fiue times greater then the other: but that he feared, leaſt being ſo great, it would be vnfit to offer ſacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the oblations, which he offered, ſhould not only ſerue for ſhew, but that they might alſo be ſomewhat proper for the vſe and ſeruice of the temple. For this cauſe, concluding that the firſt was of ſufficient and conuenable meaſure, hee reſolued his ſhould not exceede the other in greatneſſe; but that equalling the ſame in quantity of gold, it might exceede the other in variety and beauty of workmanſhip. For he was ingenious to obſerue the nature of diuers things, and to inuent new and vnex-pected fashion: so that by his ripe iudgement, hee shewed the workemen such inuentions, as be- G fore time had not beene in vse; and commanded them to make and finish them, hauing alwaies an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to worke by. He vndertooke therefore to make the Table of two cubits and a halfe in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a halfe in height, all of massiue gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large; enriched with mooving waues, on which there was a bend grauen with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being triangulary, euery angle presented the same engraving; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no waies different figure, represented it selfe: within the inside of this border it was inchased with diuers goodly figures, but on the outside it was farre more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eye. For this cause the vpper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we said) were apparant at such time as the Table was turned, each one seeming of equall magni- H tude with the other. Vpon the graued bends there were precious stones inchased, distant by equall proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tyed by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselues to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the manner of an ouall; and there was a border of golden twigs engrauen round about the Table: vnder the ouals there was a crowne garnished with clusters of diuers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung downe, the spikes of corne stood vpright, and all was inclosed with pomgranats, and the precious stones were enchased in gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to represent each sort of fruit in their natiue colours. There was also a ranke of ouals vnder the crowne, not vnlike vnto the former, made of gold: so that on both sides, both the variety and delicacie of the worke appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the table, in which there appeared not any difference, on whatsoeuer side it was turned; and from the top vnto the I lower foote one and the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some foure fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the feete of the same were staied, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and claspes of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better bee seene, and that on what side soeuer it were turned, it might alwaies seeme the same. They engraued also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were diuers kinds of precious stones, shining like starres; and amongst the rest there were Rubies and emeraulds of most orient brightnes, as also all other sorts of stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beauty or price. Neere vnto this labyrinth from the one end vnto the other, there were certaine corded pleites in the middle like vnto a Rhombus or Loseng, vpon which there were certaine pieces of Crystall and Amber, enchased and placed the one by K

the other in equall distance, and proportion: which gaue a marueilous contentment to whomso-euer beheld the same: The Chapters of the feete were made after the forme of a lillie; the leaues whereof bent themselues vnder the Table, whereas otherwaies the stalke seemed to be stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands breadth large, adorned with a carbuncle in eue-ry part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feete was staied; and on euery one of them was there ingrauen by curious workmanship Iuie, and vine branches loa-den with clusters of grapes; so made to life, that they seemed to be very grapes indeede. For the whole was so subtill and delicate, that when the winde blewe, the workemanship waued and was carried vp on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather naturall, then counterfaited by art. The worke was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seames and ioynts might not any waies be L seene. The thicknes of the table was no lesse then halfe a cubit.

See heere what this present was, which through intire affection the king presented; wherein the price of the stuffe, the diuersity and beauty of the workmanship, and the excellencie of the engrauing was accomplished in perfection. Moreouer, in this he so farre inforced himselfe to performe so much, that if it might not surpasse the other which was already in the temple, at least wise in art, new inuention and excellencie of proiect, it might be farre more excellent and admi-

of the Cup; and besides that, inriched with diuers precious stones curiously and diuersly enchased. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubite hie, made of all sorts of preci- M ous stones, and at the foote thereof were ingraued spires, after the manner of twigs, and fast by them a certaine fould like vnto a net made in ouall fashion, that ascended euen vnto the brims.
The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatnes of foure fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies, iuy, flowers, and vines with their clusters

A sters of grapes engrauen round about. This was the beauty and excellency of those two cuppes, each of them containing twenty and foure pintes. There were also others made of siluer, so transparent, as if they had bin of the purest crystall, thorow which all things that were put into them, were naturally and manifestly discouered. He caused also thirty ewers to be made, in which all the gold that was not couered with precious stones, was shadowed with Iuie leaues, and vine branches most curiously engrauen: and all these things were not onely miraculously wrought by the wonderful cunning of the workmen; but were in like sort seconded by an ambitious diligence of the king, who thinking it not enough that without parsimonie he had vndertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his more serious affaires) visit the shops, and examine the workes; and that which more and more encreased their diligence, was, for that they saw him so intent vpon
B the busines, which made them the more earnest vpon their worke.

Two siluer standing cups. Thirty viols. Ptolomeis charge and diligence in the finishing of his presents.

And these were the presents which were sent by this king to be dedicated in the temple of Ierusalem. All which being consecrated and laid vp in the temple by the high Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and deliuered into their hands certain presents to be tendred in his behalfe vnto the King, he dismissed and sent them backe againe. No sooner were they arriued in Alexandria, but the King (hauing notice thereof, and how the seuentie two Elders were come with them) he sent to seeke out his Embassadors Andrew and Aristæus, who came and presented him with letters from the high Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face. And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Ierusalem to expound and interpret the law, he contrary to his ordinary cu-
C stome and manner, dismissed all those that resorted thither for their particular affaires, to whom hee was accustomed to giue audience euery fift day; as it was his ordinary manner also to giue monethly satisfaction to forraine Embassadours. Hauing therefore for that time dismissed them, he kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent vnto him; who comming to his presence (accompanied with those presents which the high Priest had deliuered them to present vnto him, with the originall wherein the law was written with golden letters) he asked them where their bookes were: and they discouering and opening them, shewed them vnto him. After the King had seene them, he was very much astonished, to see the membranes and parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole forme thereof so perfectly conioyned, that it was impossible to discouer the seames: and he told them that he gaue them thanks for that they were come vnto him, and more
D great thanks vnto him that he had sent them, and the greatest and most speciall thanks vnto God, who was the author of these lawes. Whereupon, the Elders and those that assisted them, cryed out altogether, and wished that all good hap might befall the King: who, through the excessiue ioy that he conceiued, burst out into teares: For naturally extreame ioy and most grieuous sadnesse haue like effects. After he had commanded that these bookes should be committed to their trust, who were deputed to that office, at length he saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behouefull for him first of all to debate with them vpon the matter, to which intent hee had sent for them: and afterwards to giue them entertainment: In a word, hee confessed vnto them, that their accesse was so gratefull vnto him, that hee promised them, so long time as hee liued, hee would euery yeere renue and honour the memory of the same (and by good hap it was the very E same day wherein he ouercame Antigonus by sea.) His pleasure was also, that they should be his guests, and he caused diuers goodly lodgings to be assigned them vnder the Castle.

The 70. interpreters comming to Alexandria are royally entertained.

Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertaine strangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily emploied in the same) to prepare for euery one of them such things, as were necessary for their diet and entertainment. For so was it ordained by the king, that in euery City that had any particularity in their manner of life; there should bee a commissary appointed to prouide for forrainers that arriued in that place, to the intent they might be entreated according to their customes: intending thereby that their entertainment should be the more agreeable vnto them, and that they might be the lesse tired with forraine nouelties. This custome of his was put in practise at this time by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his owne person disposed all that which was necessary for that hospitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in F two seuerall parts (according as the king had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him, and the rest might be placed neere vnto his table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kind enteruiew. When they were in this sort placed, the king commanded Dorotheus to entertaine them in like manner, as he was wont to doe those, who repaired vnto his court from Iudæa. Hereupon, he dismissed the Ægyptian priest, and other that were woont to make the ordinary praiers: which done, hee commanded that one of the elders called Eliſeus (who in like ſort was a prieſt) to bleſſe the table: whereupon he ſtanding vpright in the midſt of them all, beſought God to bleſſe both the king and his ſubiects with all happines. Whereupon there aroſe an applauſe and acclamation of all men, intermixed with ioyfull delight; which being ceaſed, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheere, with that which was ſet before them. When the king had held his peace ſo long as he thought conuenient, he began at laſt to play the Philoſopher, asking of euery one of them certaine queſtions in Phiſicke, praying them to decide and diſcuſſe the ſame: and when as each of them in order had very pertinently anſwered to the queſtion that was propounded vnto them, the king tooke great pleaſure therein, and for twelue daies ſpace hee continued this feaſt. Who ſo deſireth to know the queſtions that were propoſed vnto them in particular, let him reade the booke which Ariſtæus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was not onely aſtoniſhed at their anſwers, but the Philoſopher Menedemus alſo: who hauing affirmed that all things were adminiſtred by diuine prouidence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this diſcourſe was, this queſtioning debate was finiſhed. But the king proteſted in their preſence, that their acceſſe had infinitely contented and inſtructed him, in that by their meanes hee had obtained the good hap to bee enformed by them how to gouerne his kingdome. Whereupon hee commanded that each of them ſhould haue three talents giuen him, and that they might bee conuaied to their lodgings. Some foure dayes after, Demetrius tooke them with him, and led them ouer that trench of the ſea, that containeth ſeuen furlongs, and that bridge which couereth the Iſland with the continent, and towards the northermoſt end therof, he aſſigned them a lodging remote from all noiſe, an fit for contemplation: to which place after he had brought them, he beſought them, that ſince they had all thoſe things that were neceſſary for the interpretation of their lawes, they would intend the ſame without any diſcontinuance of the worke, vntill they had brought it to perfection; and they for their parts imployed all their labour and diligence that was in them poſſible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning vntill three houres after noone: after which time they imployed the reſt of the day in their refections; and to that end they were furniſhed in all aboundance with all ſorts of victuals. Ouer and beſides, Dorotheus preſented them with a part of diuers diſhes, which were prepared for the King: for ſo had his maieſty commanded it. Thus euery morning entred they the Kings palace, and after they had ſaluted him, they retired themſelues to their accuſtomed place; and after they had waſhed their hands in the ſea water, and were purified, they ſet them downe in that manner to proceede, and proſecute their tranſlation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the worke was fully finiſhed in the ſpace of ſeuentie and two daies: Demetrius aſſembled all the Iewes in that place where the law had beene tranſlated, and cauſed it to be read ouer in the preſence of the interpreters themſelues. Which done, the aſſembly approoued the expoſition of the interpreters; and praiſed Demetrius, by whoſe ſuggeſtions, and inuention they enioyed ſo great a good. They requeſted likewiſe, that this expoſition ſhould be peruſed, and ouerread by the Nobles and Gouernours. After this, both the Prieſt, the Elders of the interpreters, and the magiſtrates of the people required, that ſince this tranſlation was ſo happily atchieued, it might remaine vnaltered; ſo that no iot thereof might be changed.

The tranſlation of the Bible into the Greek tongue

Which reſolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered that if any man perceiued any thing in that tranſlation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he ſhould conſider thereupon and giue notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing herein very diſcreetly, to the end that that which had once beene adiudged good, ſhould continue inuiolable for euer. The King therefore was highly contented, ſeeing his endeuours and purpoſe in that behalfe ſo happily and profitably finiſhed: but aboue all things, he tooke pleaſure in reading of the law, admiring at the deepe conceit and wiſedome of the law-maker; and began to queſtion with Demetrius, by what meanes it came to paſſe, that neither any Poet, nor Hiſtoriographer had made mention of that law, notwithſtanding that in it ſelfe it was ſo admirable. To whom Demetrius gaue this anſwer: that no man was ſo hardie to touch that worke, by reaſon that it was diuine and euery way venerable: aſſuring him alſo, that certaine men who had attempted to ſet their hands thereto, had beene puniſhed by God: giuing him to vnderſtand, how Theopompus intending to reduce certaine contents of that law into his hiſtory, had beene diſtraught in minde for more then thirtie daies, and that hauing ſome intermiſſion of his fit, he appeaſed God by prayer; thereby eaſily coniecturing what was the cauſe of his malady. Moreouer, he was certified by a viſion that appeared vnto him in his ſleepe, that this inconuenient befell him, in that he had too curiouſly ſearched into ſacred and diuine matters, and had intended to communicate the ſame with

Hee likewise insinuated further, that Theodestes the tragicke Poet, intending to make mention in some of his Poems of a certaine historie written in the sacred Scriptures, was strooken blind; and acknowledging the cause hereof to proceede from his audacious presumption, he was restored to his sight after he had appeased Gods displeasure. The yeere of the world, 3684. before Christs Nativity, 280.

When the King had considered on these words, according as Demetrius had discoursed them vnto him, hee prostrated himselfe on the earth, and commanded that the bookes should be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integritie. Furthermore, he exhorted the Translators to repaire oftentimes vnto him from Iudæa, assuring them that in so doing the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time hee thought
B good to dismisse them: but when they should returne vnto him againe of their own motion, they should obtaine all that which their wisedome deserued, or his magnificence might impart vnto them. This said, he gaue them leaue to depart, after he had giuen each of them three seuerall sutes of apparrell, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certaine bed or curious seate to sit and banquet vpon. This gaue he them for themselues. But to Eleazar the hie Priest hee sent by them ten couches, whose feete were of siluer, and the furniture correspondent, and a vessell of thirty talents. Tenne purple robes likewise, and a magnificent crowne, and one hundred peeces of fine linnen: and besides that, he sent in way of present vnto the Temple, Ewers, Basons, and two golden vessels: beseeching Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his subiects had a will to come vnto him, hee would permit him, assuring him that hee would highly e-C steeme the conuersation of so learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleasure in such affaires. See heere how Ptolomey Philadelph esteemed and honoured the Iewes.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Asia honoured the nation of the Iewes, and gaue them libertie and freedome to dwell in those Cities that were builded by them.

D THEY receiued honor likewise at the hands of the Kings of Asia, because they had borne armes vnder them. For Seleucus surnamed Nicanor, highly respected them, and permitted them to dwell in those Cities, which hee built in Asia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewise, which was the Metropolitane and chiefe Citie. Moreouer he ordained, that they should be held in as great estimation, as either the Macedonians or Greekes that inhabited therein: so that euen vnto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Iewes refusing to annoint themselues with forraine oyle, doe receiue a certaine summe of money from the masters of the exercises in lieu of the oyle. Which when the people of Antioch intended to abolish, during the present warre, Mutianus at that time gouernour of Syria, opposed himselfe against them. Againe, when as Vespasian and his sonne Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priuiledges that the Iewes enioyed
E might continue no more; yet could they not obtaine the same. Whereby the humanitie and valour of the Romanes may appeare, and in especiall of Vespasian and Titus, that notwithstanding they had beene so trauelled by the wars of the Iewes, and were so bitterly incensed against them, for that they had not by laying downe their armes submitted themselues, but had continued war against them to the vttermost; yet depriued they them not of their afore-said priuiledges, but surmounted their displeasure, which they had long before conceiued against them: and in like sort had not regard to the request of two so puissant cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were: In such sort as they granted nothing in fauour of them, neither ordained any thing in disfauour of those whom they had ouercome in warre, to the intent to abolish one onely iot of those priuiledges which they had in times past; but said that they that had resisted them by armes, & who had bin ouercome, were sufficiently punished for their obstinacie: and as touching those that had not
F committed any offence, they saw no reason to depriue them of their rights and prerogatiues. We know likewise, that Marcus Agryppa was of the same opinion, as touching the Iewes. For whereas the Ionians were sediciously bent against them, and besought Agryppa that it might bee onely lawfull for them to make vse of the priuiledge, which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greekes intituled by the name of God) had giuen them; requiring that if the Iewes were of their blood, they might be tied to adore the same gods which the Ionians worshipped: When as therfore fore this matter was referred to the determination of the Iudges, the Iewes had the day, and obtained the libertie to liue according to their owne lawes and cuſtomes: and he that at this time pleaded their cauſe, was Nicholas Damaſcene. For Agryppa pronounced, that it was vnlawfull for them to innouate any waies: And if any man deſire to haue exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twentie three, and twentie fourth booke of the hiſtories of Nicholas. Neither ought this iudgement of Agrippaes to ſeeme in any ſort ſtrange: for at that time our Nation had not by any wars procured the Romans diſpleaſure. But vpon iuſt occaſion may a man admire the magnanimitie of Veſpaſian and of his ſonne Titus, who behaued themſelues with ſuch moderation after ſo great a warre, and ſo grieuous battels, as they had fought againſt vs. G

Antiochus the great, king of Aſia and Syria vexeth the Iewes,

Now will I returne to my purpoſe, from whence I haue digreſſed. At ſuch time as Antiochus the great raigned in Aſia, the countrey of Iewrie was grieuouſly ſpoiled, and both the Iewes and the inhabitants of Cœloſyria endured many miſeries. For Antiochus making warre againſt Ptolomey Philopator and his ſonne, called Ptolomey the Famous, they were pitifully perplexed. For whether Antiochus either ouercame or was ouercome, they were continually ſpoiled: ſo that betwixt the proſperitie and aduerſitie of Antiochus, they fared like a ſhippe toſſed and tormented with a ſtorme. Finally, after Antiochus had ouercome Ptolomey, he conquered Iewrie. After the death of Philopator, his ſonne ſent a great army into Cœloſyria vnder the conduct of Scopas, who ſeized a great number of thoſe Cities; and our nation alſo was inforced by warre and conquered by him. H

The yeare of the world, 3742. before Christs Natiuitie. 222.

Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, neere vnto the flood Iordan, and obtained the victorie, diſcomfiting the greater part of his enemies armie; at which time Antiochus recouered againe thoſe Cities of Cœloſyria, which were before time ſurprized by Scopas. He tooke Samaria alſo: which when the Iewes perceiued, they ſubmitted themſelues of their owne accord vnto him, and hauing entertained him in the Citie of Ieruſalem, they gaue both his armie and his Elephants abundance of prouiſion, and willingly aſſiſted him with their forces, to ſubdue thoſe garriſons which Scopas had planted in the fortreſſes of the higher Citie. For which cauſe Antiochus ſuppoſing it to be a matter behoouefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardneſſe which the Iewes had expreſſed in his ſeruice, wrote vnto his captaines and friends, ſignifying vnto them how forward the Iewes had beene in his wars: and to expreſſe likewiſe what gifts he intended to beſtow vpon them. Ptolomey Epiphanes king of Ægypt warreth againſt the kings of Syria.

Hereafter I will inſert the copie of his letters, which he wrote in fauour of them, after I haue recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane writeth, anſwerable to this purpoſe, which I will recite out of the ſixteenth booke of his hiſtories. Scopas (ſaith he) the Generall of Ptolomeys army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter ouercome the whole nation of the Iewes. He reciteth alſo in the ſame booke, that after that Scopas had beene ouercome, Antiochus ſeized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and anon after the Iewes, which dwelt at Ieruſalem where the temple was, ioyned themſelues with him: and although we are to ſpeake more amply and particularly of that apparition that hapned neere vnto the temple; yet notwithſtanding we will defer the recitall thereof vntill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to returne vnto our purpoſe: I will recite in this place the copy of thoſe letters which were ſent by the King. King Antiochus to Ptolomey; Health. Whereas the Iewes haue giuen vs a moſt apparent teſtimony of their affection towards vs, ſince the firſt time of our entrance into their country, and haue magnificently entertained vs at ſuch time as we were in perſon before their Citie, by preſenting themſelues before vs with all their Elders; and haue alſo furniſhed vs largely with all that which was neceſſarie for our ſouldiers and our Elephants; and haue likewiſe taken armes with vs againſt the Ægyptian garriſon: we haue thought it a matter anſwerable to our honour, to affoord them ſome ſatisfactiō in repairing their City, ruinated by humane caſualties, to the intent it might be inhabited and peopled againe, by gathering together thoſe Iewes that are ſcattered abroad in diuers places, and planting them againe in the ſame. And in eſpeciall (to the end that the ſeruice of God may be renued) we haue ſet downe a certaine ſumme of money to be imployed in ſacrifices, and in buying beaſts for their offerings, wine, oyle, and incenſe; that is to ſay, twentie thouſand ſicles of ſiluer; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one thouſand, foure hundred and ſixtie meaſures of wheate, and three hundred, ſeuentie and fiue meaſures of ſalt. And my will is, that all theſe things that are aboue named, be deliuered vnto them according to the forme of our ordinance. We likewiſe command, that the worke of the temple be finiſhed with the galleries, and other neceſſarie buildings; and that all the ſtuffe of timber be brought out of Iudæa and other places, and eſpecially out of Libanus, without any taxe or tallage: which exemption alſo ſhall take effect in all other neceſſaries that are requiſite towards the reparation of ſo famous K L M

Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the temple also, and the singing men be freed from all taxations, that are paid by the powle, and the tributes of the crowne, and al other whatsoeuer. And to the end that the city may be the sooner builded, I grant vnto all them that inhabit the same at this present, or that hereafter shal transport themselues thither within the moneth of October to inhabite, the same exemption of all charges for three yeeres space. Wee forgiue them moreouer the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recouer themselues of their losses. We wil also that those Citizens that haue bin forcibly led from thence into seruitude, be set at liberty, both they themselues as also those that are of their alliance; commanding their goods to be restored vnto them. B These were the contents of this Letter. And to yeeld the more honour vnto the Temple, he sent an Edict thorow all his kingdome to this effect: That it should not be lawfull for any stranger to enter within the inclosure of the Temple, without the Iewes permission; except those that should be purified, according to the law and custome of the place. That no man should bring into the City any flesh of horse, mulet, wild or tame asses, leopards, foxes, or hares, or generally of any cattell prohibited to be eaten by the lawes of the Iews. That it should not be lawful likewise for any man to bring their skinnes into the City, or to nourish any such beasts in the same; but that it might onely be lawfull to vse those beasts which might be sacrificed vnto God, according to the law of their ancestors. That whosoeuer should contradict those inhibitions, he should pay 3000. drachmes of siluer vnto the Priests. Furthermore, to expresse his piety and fidelity towards

C vs, at such time as he heard of the troubles that hapned in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also vnto Zeuxis gouernour of one of the higher prouinces, and his intire friend, commanding him to send certaine of our nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing vnto him to this effect. King Antiochus to Zeuxis his father: Health. If thou art well, I am glad of it: I likewise am no lesse healthy. Vnderstanding that those of Lydia and Phrygia are newly grown to rebellion, I haue thought good (according to my duty) to preuent the same: and whil'st I consulted with my friends what was to be done, it hath beene thought fit that two thousand families of the Iewes, with all their houshold should be sent thither, all which should be drawne out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in garrisons, and places of security. For I am perswaded of their good affection and zeale towards vs, both in respect of their deuotion towards God, as also for the testimony which

Now when as they shall arriue in that place, thou shalt bestow on euery one of them places to build them houses on, with sufficient lands both for tillage and to plant their vineyards in: for which they shall pay no tribute for ten yeeres space: and during such time as they may gather of their owne for their sustenance, they shall be allowed their prouision of corne for them and their seruants. Hitherto we haue sufficiently declared, what friendship Antiochus the great bare vnto the Iewes. After this, Antiochus contradicted alliance and friendship with Ptolomy, who gaue him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and assigned him for her dowrie Cœlosyria, Samaria, Iudæa, and Phœnicia: and for that these two kings diuided the tributes betweene them, the chiefest in authority in euery Prouince, redeemed the exaction of their countrey, and paid the sum agreed vpon to the kings treasurie.

Whereupon Ptolomey Euergetes, the father of Philopater, was grieuously incensed against him; so as he sent an Embassador to Ierusalem to accuse him, for that he failed to pay his accustomed tribute, threatning him, that if henceforward hee receiued it not, hee would diuide his countrey amongst his

IOSEPH the ſonne of TOBIAS preuenteth the imminent calamitie of the Iewes, and becommeth PTOLOMIES friend.

The taxation of the high Prieſt for offending the King.

BVT a certaine man called Ioſeph, the ſonne of Tobias, and of Onias ſiſter, who was the high Prieſt, being yong in yeeres) but honoured in Ieruſalem for his wiſedome, foreſight, and iuſtice) hauing certaine notice by his mother of the arriuall of this Embaſſadour, came vnto the Citie (for he had beene abſent in the village of Phicala where he was borne) and ſharp- H ly reproued Onias his vncle on the mothers ſide, for that he did not any waies prouide for the ſecuritie of his Citizens, but ſought to draw his countrey-men into a generall hazzard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was leuied for the tribute: Whereby he told him that he had obtained the gouernment ouer the people, and purchaſed the high Prieſthood. And that if he were ſo bewitched with money, that for the loue of the ſame he could haue the patience to ſee his countrey in hazzard, and behold his Citizens alſo ſuffer all that which crueltie could inflict vpon them; he counſelled him to repaire vnto the King, and to require him to beſtow the whole or the halfe of the tribute vpon him. Hereunto Onias anſwered, that he would no more execute the gouernment, and that if it were poſſible for him, he was ready to giue ouer the Prieſthood, and that that therefore he would not repaire vnto the King, becauſe he was not any waies mooued with theſe occurrences. Whereupon Ioſeph asked him, if hee would permit I him in the peoples behalfe to goe Embaſſadour vnto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias anſwered that he gaue him free leaue. Vpon this occaſion Ioſeph went vp into the temple, and ſummoned the people to a generall aſſembly, exhorting them to be no waies troubled, and to conceiue no feare through the negligence of his vncle Onias, requeſting them to be confident in heart, and eſtranged from all ſiniſter ſuſpicion; promiſing them that he himſelfe would go in Embaſſage vnto the King, and faithfully plead their cauſe before him, and perſwade him that they had committed no inſolent neglect, or contempt againſt his maieſtie. Which when the people vnderſtood, they gaue Ioſeph heartie thankes. Whereupon he preſently came downe from the temple, and honourably entertained the Embaſſadours that came from Ptolomey, and hauing preſented them with gifts of great price, and feaſted them magnificently for many daies, he ſent them backe to their Prince; K aſſuring them that he would in perſon follow them. And the rather was he incited to this iourney, becauſe the Embaſſadour had perſwaded him to repaire into Ægypt, vnder ſuch aſſurance, that he would obtaine all his requeſts at Ptolomeys hands; the rather for that he was won with the yong mans free ſpirit and noble entertainment.

The Kings Embaſſadour honourably entertained, who reporteth Ioſephs liberalitie vpon his returne into his countrey.

Aſſoone as the Embaſſadour returned into Ægypt, he certified the King of Onias ingratitude, and Ioſephs humanitie: certifying him that he would come in perſon to intreat pardon for the people, for that offence they had committed againſt him; and the rather, for that he was in eſpeciall authoritie among the people: and ſo farre vſurped hee vpon Ioſephs praiſes, that both the King and the Queene Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithſtanding hee was as yet abſent. But Ioſeph ſent vnto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Hauing therefore furniſhed himſelfe with apparell, veſſels, and horſes, with the L expence of almoſt twentie thouſand drachmes, he arriued in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and gouernours of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the King was accuſtomed euery yeere to ſell them to the men of moſt reſpect in euery city: Theſe meeting with Ioſeph on the way, began to mock at his baſeneſſe and pouerty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the King was at Memphis, he ſet forward and went out to meet him. When as therfore the king, accompanied with the Queene & Athenion his friend, who had diſcharged the place of Embaſſadour in Ieruſalem, came riding onward in his charriot; Athenion (who had beene honourably entertained by Ioſeph) per- M ceiuing him vpon the way, certified the king that it was he, of whom he had ſpoken vpon his returne from Ieruſalem; proteſting on his behalf that he was both a good & honorable yong man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him aboue the reſt, and made him mount his charriot. Where he was no ſooner ſeated, but the king beganne to accuſe Onias for that which he had committed. But Ioſeph ſaid vnto him: Pardon him, O King, and haue reſpect to his olde yeeres. For you know

A know that ordinarily old men and yong children haue one and the ſame vnderſtanding ; but for our ſelues, who are yong, you ſhall haue what you pleaſe to require without any pretext or cauſe of diſcontent. Hereupon the King tooke pleaſure in the good behauiour and pleaſant diſcourſe of the yong man, and began to loue him the more, as if hee had receiued a preſent atteſtation of his wiſedome: whereupon he commanded that he ſhould be lodged in his owne palace, and that daily he ſhould accompany him at his princely Table. The yeere of the world, 3770. before Chriſts Nativitie, 194.

As ſoone as the King came backe to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria ſeeing Ioſeph ſitting neere vnto the King, were ſore diſpleaſed: and the day drawing neere wherein they were to receiue the aſſurance of their tribute, they that were of the greateſt reckoning in their Countrey farmed the ſame ; ſo that the tributes of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, Iudæa, and Samaria, amounted together to
B eight thouſand talents. Whereupon Ioſeph ariſing, blamed the farmers for that they had plotted amongſt themſelues to beate downe the price of the tributes, promiſing to giue the double ; and that hee would likewiſe returne the forfeitures that were leuied vpon the goods of ſuch as offended ; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gaue eare to this diſcourſe of his with great content, and ſaid, that hee approoued the ſale of theſe tributes vnto Ioſeph, who in this ſort augmented his reuenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could giue ſureties : he made him anſwer with a bold courage : O King (ſaid he) I will giue thee ſuch pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and ſuch as you cannot miſtruſt. When as therefore the King inſtanted him to produce them: I will (ſaid he) O King, preſent thee for ſureties, thy ſelfe, and the Queene thy wife, that one of you may be a ſurety for me to the other. Ptolomey ſmiling heereat,
C granted him the farme of the tribute, without further ſurety. This fauour of his diſpleaſed thoſe Gouernours of the Cities that were come into Ægypt, in that they ſaw themſelues contemned and conſtrained to returne with ſhame vnto their houſes. But Ioſeph obtained two thouſand footmen from the King, to the end to enforce the tribute from thoſe Cities, who were negligent in their paiments : and after he had borrowed fiue hundreth talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria. The tributes of Cœloſyria committed to Ioſeph.

As ſoone as hee came to Aſcalon, hee demanded the paiment of the tribute at the Citizens hands, which they not onely refuſed to performe, but moreouer vpbraided him with iniurious words. For which cauſe laying hold on about ſome twenty of the principals among them, hee put them to death : and hauing gathered their ſubſtances together, hee ſent the King ſome thou-
D ſand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomey admiring at his wiſedome, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to diſpoſe of all things at his pleaſure. The Syrians vnderſtanding hereof, were ſore abaſhed; and perceiuing that the Aſcalonites were ſlaine by Ioſeph, through the ſeueritie of his iuſtice and their diſobedience, they opened him the gates, and receiued him willingly, and paied him their tributes. Wheras alſo the Scythopolitanes in way of contumacie refuſed to lay downe according to order, their accuſtomed tributes ; he ſlew the chiefeſt amongſt them : the confiſcations of whoſe goods he ſent vnto the King. When as therefore he had gathered much ſiluer, and made great gaines of the purchaſe of the tributes, to the intent to eſtabliſh and make his power of more continuance, hee liberally employed his gettings ; conſidering with himſelfe that it was a part of wiſedome to keepe and entertaine his good hap, by thoſe
E riches which he himſelfe had gotten : For he ſent many preſents both to the King and Queene, and beſtowed liberall bountie both on their familiars and fauourites, and alſo on all thoſe which had any authority, credite or fauour in the Court, to winne and bind them vnto him by his beneuolence. And in this felicitie of his continued hee the terme of twenty two yeeres ; during which time he was the father of ſeuen children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, whom he begot on the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he married vpon this occaſion which enſueth. The Aſcalonites and Scythopolitanes puniſhed for their contẽpt. Ioſephs wealth and children.

Walking vpon a time in Alexandria in the company of his brother (who ledde with him his daughter already mariageable, to the intent to beſtow her vpon ſome Iew of good quality (whilſt he ſate at meate with the king, there entred into the banquet a certaine faire damſell, trained vp in F dancing ; with whom growing enamoured, he tolde his brother thereof, praying him that ſith by the lawes of their Countrey it was forbidden that a Iew might marry with a ſtranger, that he would hide his fault, and bee a faithfull aſſiſtant vnto him, to the end that he might enioy her whom his heart deſired. His brother promiſed him to ſhew his willing forwardneſſe herein ; and in the meane time he adorned and decked his owne daughter, and brought her by night vnto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who ſhe was, by reaſon he had drunke ouermuch) and had her company. Which comming to paſſe diuers times, he was as yet far more burningly burningly inflamed with the loue of this Dancer, and told his brother that hee was in danger to G be enamoured all his life time; and that notwithstanding the King would not grant her vnto him.

His brother told him that he ought not to vexe himselfe, promising him that he should assuredly enioy her whom he loued, and that already shee was his wife; opening vnto him how all things had hapned, and how hee had rather wrong his owne daughter then to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Ioseph had praised the kinde and naturall affection of his brother to-Hircanus offspring and towardnesse. wards him, he tooke his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath beene said. Who beeing thirteene yeeres olde, gaue testimony of that naturall spirit, and dexteritie that was in him; by reason whereof his brethren conceiued a certaine hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled them in all things, and had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate him. Whereas therefore Ioseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest iudge-ment, and vnderstanding; hee sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most re- H nowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned backe vnto him rude, and illettered, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, hee sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desert place distant from the high way some seuen daies iourney, and gaue him with him three hundreth couple of oxen, to sowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

When as therefore he came vnto the place, and perceiued that the yokes were missing, he asked aduise of some of the husbandmen: who counselled him to send some one backe vnto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would bee spent in sending backe a messenger, deuised a cunning expedient stratageme, more then might bee expected from one of his yeeres. For he caused tenne couple of oxen to be slaine, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the skinnes, and fashion couples thereof, and I hauing yoked his oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home vnto him. Who loued him the more intirely, by reason of his wise-dome, and the subtiltie of his vnderstanding; praising besides that his resolution and execution, esteeming him the more, for that he was his onely true son, to the generall discontent of the rest.

Ioseph sendeth his sonne Hircanus to Ptolomey. When as therefore newes was brought vnto Ioseph, that about that time King Ptolomey was blessed with a yong sonne, and how all the chiefest Lords of Syria, and the countries vnder his obeisance, repaired to Alexandria in great pompe to celebrate the birth day of the Kings sonne;
hee beeing of himselfe vnable (by reason of his age) to repaire thither, hee sounded his children, whether any one of them would goe and visit the King. When as therefore the eldest sonnes had excused themselues, and made refusall to vndertake the iourney, pretending that they were of in- K sufficient ability to performe the message, and all of them gaue counsaile that their brother Hir-canus might be sent: Ioseph tooke great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would goe to King Ptolomey: who promised to vndertake the iourney, and tolde his father that he needed no great sum of money to performe the voyage; because in the way he would trauell frugally, and content himselfe for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Ioseph was very glad to heare of his sonnes prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for a while, he coun-sailed his father, that hee should not present the King with any thing out of Iudæa, but that hee should write vnto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliuer such summes of money as hee thought conuenient to buy that which hee found to bee most magnificent and of best ten talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsell, wrote vnto his factor Arion (who had L the vse of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering vp his money in Sy-Treason intended against Hircanus. ria, he was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to defray the same. Hauing therefore letters of credence vnto him, he iourneyed towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote presently vnto all the Kings friends, that by some meanes they would make him away.

As soone as he was arriued in Alexandria, and had deliuered his fathers letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would haue? hoping that he would craue but ten, or some little ouerplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth and reprooued him for his prodigalitie, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with M much trauell, & thrifty sparing; and refusing his demands, he praied him to imitate his fathers example who had begot him: and in a word he told him, that he would deliuer him no more then ten talents; & that for no other vse, then to buy gifts to present the king withall. Whereupon Hir-canus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra,

Whereupon Ptolomey ſent for Hircanus, and ſaid vnto him; that he maruelled that being ſent vnto him from his father, he had not as yet viſited him; and beſides that, he had committed his fathers agent to priſon: he therefore commanded him to yeeld him a reaſon thereof. Whereunto he anſwered, that there was a law among the Iewes, that no man ſhould taſte of the ſacrifices that had not firſt of all viſited the temple, and ſacrificed vnto God; and that in that reſpect he had not hitherto viſited his maieſtie, becauſe he expected certaine preſents to preſent his Highneſſe with from his father, who was his bounden ſeruant. Furthermore, hee alleadged, that he had puniſhed his fathers ſeruant, becauſe hee had diſobeyed his commandement, which he ought not to doe, whether his maſter were ei-

Hircanus apologie of his actions.

When Ptolomey heard theſe words, he began to ſmile, and wondred at the magnanimitie of the yong man. Arion perceiuing that the King held himſelfe ſatisfied, and that he was like to haue no aſſiſtance at his hands, deliuered Hircanus the thouſand talents, and by this meanes was he ſet at libertie. Some three daies after, Hircanus came and ſaluted both the King and Queene; who entertained him graciouſly, and feaſted him kindly, for the affection ſake which they bare vnto his father. He priuily enquiring among the marchants, bought one hundreth yong lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age; paying a talent for euery one; and the like number of virgins for ſo many talents. Being therefore inuited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and o-C ther Lords, he was placed beneath them all, becauſe that (by reaſon of his yong yeeres) they that aſſigned the places, according to euery mans dignitie, made ſmall account of him. Now when as all the gueſts, after they had eaten their meates, laid all their bones before Hircanus, ſo that the table was loaden round about him, a certain pleaſant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whoſe merry conceits and ieſts the king very willingly liſtned vnto) during the time hee was at meat, being ſollicited by thoſe that were at the table, came vnto the king and ſaid vnto him. See here my liege, what ſtore of bones are before Hircanus: hereby you may coniecture, that his fa- Hircanus ieſts ther hath fleeced all Syria, as he hath bared theſe bones of fleſh. The king laughing at Triphons words, asked Hircanus how he came by ſo many bones before him? Not without great cauſe (ſaid he) O king; for dogs deuoure the fleſh with the bones, as theſe do (in which ſpeech he glan-D ced at thoſe who ſat with him at the table, becauſe they had no bones before them) but men eate the fleſh, and caſt the bones away, as I do, becauſe I am a man. The king wondring at his diſcreete anſwer, commanded all the reſt to applaud him, in approbation of his witty vrbanity.

The next day he ſought out all the kings friends, and the principals in court, and ſaluted them Hircanus ſounding what other men would giue, gaue more then the reſt, for which he receiueth another kingly reward.
one by one, enquiring of their ſeruants, what preſents they would court the king with vpon the birth of his ſonne? Who told him, that ſome of them would giue twelue talents, and otherſome that were in dignity, would preſent them according to their ability. Whereupon Hircanus made a ſhew of diſcontent, in that he wanted power to offer ſuch a preſent, pretending that he had no more but fiue talents. All which theſe ſeruants preſently reported to their maſters: who were very ioyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceiued that Ioſeph ſhould be blamed, and would
E offend the King thorow the abiectnes of his preſent. Now when the day of the ſolemnity was come, and they likewiſe that pretended to preſent the king moſt magnificently, offered no more then twenty talents: Hircanus preſented the hundreth young Lads he had bought, to the King, and the virgins vnto Cleopatra: for whom hee had paid a talent by the powle. At this vnexpected magnificence of his gift, al men were amazed: but beſides this, he gaue gifts of diuers talents to the King and Queenes fauourites and ſeruants, and their attendants; whereby hee warranted himſelfe from the danger that might fall vnto him by their meanes. For the brothers of Hircanus had written vnto them, to murther him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this young man, and willed him to aske whatſoeuer gift he beſt liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would pleaſe the King to recommend him, by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the King had ſingularly honoured him, and had F giuen him many bountifull rewards, he wrote vnto his father and his brethren, and all his gouernours, and commiſſaries, and in that ſort ſent him away. His brothers hearing newes how hee Hircanus brothers aſſailing him on the way, are ſlaine and diſcomfited.
had in all things highly contented the King, and that hee returned with great glory, they iſſued out to meete with him, with an intent to murther him, with their fathers knowledge. For he being diſpleaſed with him, by reaſon of his aboue named large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yet concealed he his diſcontent for feare of the king. But when his brothers came and encountred him on the way, he ſlew diuers of thoſe that accompanied them, and two of his bre- G thren alſo were left ſlaine vpon the place, and the reſt fled vnto Ieruſalem vnto their father. And when as vpon his repaire vnto Ieruſalem, he perceiued that no man entertained him, he was afraid, and departed preſently from thence to the other ſide of Iordan, where he paſt his life in receiuing and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus ſurnamed Soter the ſonne of Antiochus the great raigned in Aſia. At that time alſo died Ioſeph, Hircanus father, who was a man of good conceit and great courage; who eſtabliſhed the people of the Iewes in their entire peace, and hath releaſed them from pouerty and many diſaſters, and had held the tributes of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres. His vncle Onias dyed alſo about the ſame time; leauing the Prieſthood to his ſon Simon; after whoſe death, his ſonne Onias was made high prieſt: to whom Arius king of Lacedemon ſent an Embaſſade and letters, the copy whereof H

The friendſhip and ſociety of the Lacedemonians, with ONIAS the high Prieſt of the Iewes.

ARIVS King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We haue found out a certen writing wher-in it is recorded, that the Iewes and Lacedemonians are of the ſame race, and both of them deſcended from Abraham. It is therefore requiſite, that ſince you are our brethren, that you giue vs to vnderſtand wherein we may pleaſure you. The like will we doe alſo, and will I repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours, ſhall in community be yours. Demoteles our meſſenger bringeth you our letters foulded in ſquare, the ſeale whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. Theſe were the contents of the Lacedemonians letters. After the death of Ioſeph it came to paſſe, that the people began to mutine in the quarrell of his children. For the elder brethren made warre againſt Hircanus, who was the younger, by meanes whereof the people were diuided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the high Prieſt Simon alſo, by reaſon of his affinitie with them, followed their party. Whereupon Hircanus reſolued to repaire no more vnto Ieruſalem, but fixing his habitation on the other ſide of Iordan, he made continuall warre againſt the Arabians, ſlaying a great number of them, and taking many priſoners. He builded a huge tower of white marble from the bottome to the top, and K on the ſame planted he the figures of many liuing creatures in ſculpture of great height. About the ſame he drew and forced a deepe trench of flowing water; and hauing hewed the front of the rocke that ſtood oppoſite againſt his building, he made diuers caues therein, many furlongs long.
He made alſo diuers chambers therin, both to eate, ſleepe, and dwell in. He drew thither likewiſe currents of ſpringing water, in ſo great aboundance, that it gaue much delight to thoſe that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of euery caue was ſo little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made ſo narrow, becauſe they might the better ſerue for his ſecurity and refuge; that if ſo be he were at any time aſſailed by his brethren, he might auoid the danger of ſurpriſall. Moreouer, he builded many huge halles, which he adorned with great and goodly gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him Tyre: and is L ſituate betweene Arabia and Iudæa, on the other ſide of Iordan, not far from the countrey of Eſ-ſebonitis. He commanded in this countrey ſome ſeuen yeeres, all that time that Seleucus raigned in Syria. After whoſe death, his brother Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdome.
Ptolomey alſo king of Egypt (who was likewiſe called Epiphanes) died, and left two children very yong behind him, of whom the eldeſt was called Philometor, and the yonger Phiſcon. When as therefore Hircanus perceiued Antiochus grew mighty and ſtrong, and feared to be puniſhed by him for his executions done againſt the Arabians, he ſlew himſelfe with his owne hands, and An-tiochus enioyed all his goods.

A mutinie of the rich Iewes againſt the other.

ONIAS the high Prieſt being dead about this time, Antiochus gaue the prieſthood to Ieſus his brother. For that ſonne, vnto whom Onias had left the ſucceſſion, was as yet very young (of whom wee will ſpeake in conuenient time and place.) This Ieſus (Onias brother) was depriued of the prieſthood, thorow the kings diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him, who gaue

Ieſus created high Prieſt by Antiochus Epiphanes.

Ieſus depriued of the prieſthood.

A gaue it ſhortly after to his yonger brother called Onias: For Simon had three ſonnes, who, as we haue declared, ſucceſſiuely poſſeſſed the prieſthood: this Ieſus cauſed himſelfe to be called Iaſon, as his other brother cauſed himſelfe to be called Menelaus, wheras his name was Onias. But Ieſus, who had firſt of all beene eſtabliſhed in the place of the high Prieſt, aroſe againſt Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were diuided into factions, and Tobias ſonnes were on Menelaus ſide: but the greater number of people followed Iaſon: ſo that Menelaus and the ſonnes of Tobias being grieuouſly vexed by them, retired themſelues to Antiochus, giuing him to vnderſtand, that it was their intent to forſake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the kings, and to liue after the maner of the Greeks; exhorting him to giue them licence to erect a place of Exerciſes in Ieruſalem. Which when Antiochus had gran-
B ted them, they ſo demeaned themſelues, that there appeared no more ſigne of Circumciſion in them; ſo that at ſuch time as they were naked, there was no difference betweene them and the Greekes, and neglecting all the ordinances and cuſtomes of euery countrey, they conformed themſelues to the behauiour and manners of other nations. Antiochus hauing all things in his kingdome, according to his hearts deſire, reſolued to make warre in Egypt: deſiring to bee poſſeſſed of the ſame, both for that he contemned Ptolomeies ſonnes age (who were as yet weake) as alſo for that they were not as yet capable to manage their ſo mighty eſtates. Arriuing therfore neere to Peluſium with a great power, he circumuented by a ſubtill policy the young Ptolomey Philometor, and ſubdued Egypt: for after he had beſieged Memphis and taken the ſame, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to beſiege the City, and to lay hold of the king who was therein.
C But he was driuen, not onely from Alexandria, but alſo out of all Egypt, by the ſommons that was ſent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and diſlodge his army out of that countrey, as we haue heretofore declared in an other place. Now will I more largely and particularly diſcourſe the actes and geſts of this king, who ouercame Iudæa, and ſpoiled the temple: For hauing onely made a briefe mention of him in my former workes, I thinke it neceſſary in this place to make a more exact recitall of his Hiſtory.

ANTIOCHVS leadeth out his army againſt Ieruſalem, taketh the City
D and ſpoileth the Temple.

AFTER that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the feare of the Romans, had forſaken that countrey, hee led his army againſt Ieruſalem, and encamped before the City, and ſurpriſed it by ſurrender, in that the gates of the City were ſet open vnto him by thoſe of his faction: all which hapned in the hundreth, forty and third yeere of the raigne begun by Seleucus. Now when he ſaw himſelfe Lord and maſter of Ieruſalem, he ſlew diuers of the contrary faction; and after hee had gathered together many great and rich ſpoiles, he returned backe to Antioch. This misfortune hapned ſome two yeeres after the ſur-
E priſall of the City, in the hundreth, forty and fiue yeere of the raigne of that family, on the fiue and twentith day of that moneth which we call Chaſleu, and the Macedons Apellaus, the Romans December; in the hundreth, fiftie and three Olympiade; at which time he neither ſpared them, who gaue him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, and effected him the meanes to ſpoile the ineſtimable riches of the temple, with greater freedome: but being no leſſe tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, he ſpared neither. For hauing ſeene what quantitie of gold was in the temple, and how huge a number of preſents and precious ornaments were in the ſame, he was ſo ouercome with couetouſneſſe, that hee brake and violated all conuentions and conditions. After therefore hee had ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels dedicated vnto God, the golden candleſticke, the golden altar, the table of the ſhew-bread, the cenſers, and pulled downe the curtaines made of fine linnen and ſcarlet; after hee had emptied the treaſures that were hidden, and left nothing behind him of any valew: he drowned all the Iewes in grie-F uous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbad them to offer their vſuall and daily ſacrifice vnto God, according to the preſcript order of the law: and after he had ſpoiled the whole City, he ſlew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the reſt of them into captiuity, with their wiues and children, to the number of ten thouſand. Furthermore, he burned the faireſt buildings of the City, and raſed the walles, and raiſed a fortreſſe in the lower City. For the temple was as it were a high cittadel, commanding the reſt. For this cauſe, hauing incloſed it with high walles and towers, he planted a garrison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and G

scumme of the wicked Apostate Iewes, who were giuen ouer to all impieties, and who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischieuous iniuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and ordinance of the Iewes. He constrained them likewise to forsake their deuotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he reuerenced for Gods, building in euery City and Borough both Temples and Altars, on whom he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbade them likewise to circumcise their children, threatning to punish him whosoeuer he were, that was found to doe the contrary. Moreouer, he chose certaine ouerseers that should constraine them to fulfill his commandement; so that a great number of Iewes, some of their owne accord, other some for feare of the threatned punishment, endeuoured themselues to satisfie the Kings decree. But those men who were of vpright hearts, and valiant minds, little re- H spected these menaces: For hauing more respect to their laws and customes, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced, if they performed not the edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruell punishment, for many daies, amidst the which they yeelded vp the ghost. For after they were whipt and maimed in their bodies, they were crucified and tortured aliue: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the neckes of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred scripture, they defaced and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruell death.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Iewes, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, I and called their temple of Garizim no more the temple of God, but (as we haue heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt and vnconstant natures, and challenged their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent embassadours to Antiochus with letters to this effect; To King Antiochus the mightie God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem. Our ancestors enforced by the continuall pestilence that raunged in their countrey, and induced by a certen ancient superstition, haue bin accustomed to obserue that day as festiuall, which the Iewes call their Sabbath; and hauing builded on the mount of Garizim a temple, and dedicated it vnto a God, who hath no name, haue offered vp in the same diuers and solemne sacrifices. But since that you haue inflicted punishment on the Iewes, according as their wickednes deserueth, the commissaries of the king supposing that we were tied to their customes K
(by reason of some alliance between vs) couple vs with them, and charge vs with the same accusations: whereas we are borne Sidonians, as it appeareth by the rolles of our common-weale. We therefore beseech you, who are our benefactor and Sauiour, to command your gouernour Apollonius, and your steward Nicanor, not to molest vs any more, by charging vs with those accusations which appertaine vnto the Iewes: who neither are tied vnto vs by alliance, neither accord with vs in manners; but that our temple, which hath not hitherto borne the name or title of any God, may now be called the temple of Iupiter of Greece: by which means we shall be deliuered from all trouble, and being at liberty to attend our affaires, we may the easier and more willingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritanes the King answered, sending them backe their owne letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor; Health. The Sidonians of Sichem haue L sent vs this suggestion; which we annexe vnto these our letters. Since therefore they, who were sent vnto vs to this intent, haue sufficiently approoued both to vs and our councell of friends, that they are vtterly strangers vnto those crimes, wherewith the Iewes are charged, and are desirous to liue according to the lawes of the Græcians, wee absolue them in as much as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of Iupiter of Greece: we haue written to the like effect also to Apollonius our Magistrate. ANTIOCHVS forbiddeth the Iewes to vse their lawes: onely MATTHIAS the sonne of ASMONAEVS contradicteth him, and obtaineth the victory against ANTIOCHVS captaines. M

AT that same time there dwelt a certen man in Modin (a village of Iury) whose name was Matthias, who was the sonne of Iohn, and who was the sonne of Simon, the sonne of Asmonæus a priest of the ranke of Ioarib, borne in Ierusalem: This Matthias had fiue sonnes,

Iohn

A Iohn called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Iudas called Machabæus, Eleazar named Auran, and Ionathas called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained vnto his ſonnes, as touching the miſerable eſtate of their Common-weale, the ſacke of their Citie, the ſacriledge of the Temple, and the miſeries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the law, then to liue in ignominie. When as therefore the Commiſſaries deputed by the King, came vnto the Borough of Modim, to conſtraine the Iewes to performe that which was enioyned them, and to command them to ſacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who ſurpaſſed the reſt in honour, and other qualities, but in eſpeciall in excellency of deſcent and nobilitie) to begin firſt of all to offer ſacrifice, to the end that the reſt might follow him and bee induced by his example; promiſing him that in ſo doing, the King would honour him greatly: Matthias anſwered
B thereunto, that he would in no ſort commit that idolatry, aſſuring them that notwithſtanding all other nations of the world, either in reſpect of loue, or for feare of iuſtice ſhould obey the edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither hee, nor any of his children could or would be induced to forſake their fathers religion. Now as ſoone as hee had returned this anſwer, and held his peace, a certaine Iew ſtepped forth to offer ſacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in ſuch ſort diſpleaſed, that both he and his ſonnes fell vpon him, and with their ſwords hewed him in peeces. He ſlew Apelles the kings captain likewiſe, with certen other ſouldiers, who would haue withſtood him. And not content herewith, he ouerthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice: If (ſaid he) any one bee affectioned to the lawes of his fathers, and the ſeruice of God, let him follow me: and this ſaid, he ſodainly retired himſelfe into the deſart with his ſonnes,
C leauing the borough vtterly diſpoſſeſſed. The reſt doing the like, retired themſelues into the deſart, with their wiues and children, and made their habitation in certen caues. The kings captaines hauing intelligence hereof, gathered thoſe forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Ieruſalem, and purſued the Iewes into the deſart. And hauing ouertaken them, they laboured firſt of all, to make them ſubmit themſelues, and to make choice of that which ſtood with their profit, rather then to indanger themſelues, and inforce them to chaſtice their diſobedience, with blood in war. But the Iewes reſpected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands who had already concluded and reſolued among themſelues, rather to die then commit ſuch an impietie: For which cauſe they (who omitted no opportunity) aſſailed the Iewes on a Sabbath day, and burned them within their caues, who neither reſiſted their enemies, nor ſo much as clo-
D ſed vp the mouths of their caues: And therefore abſtained they from all defence by reaſon of the day, reſoluing with themſelues in no ſort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to ceaſe from all labour, on that day.) There were therefore about ſome thouſand ſtifled in their caues, accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithſtanding, diuers eſcaped, who ioined themſelues with Matthias, whom they appointed likewiſe for their captaine; who declared vnto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day, aſſuring them that if they did it not, but ſcrupulouſly obſerued the law, they themſelues ſhould be enemies vnto themſelues, if perhaps the enemy ſhould aſſaile them that day, and ſhould not ſtand vpon their guard: for by that meanes they ſhould be deſtroyed without reſiſt. By theſe words he perſwaded them to doe as he had ſaid: and vntill this day it is a cuſtome among vs, that if need require wee make no dif-
E ficulty to fight on the Sabbath day. Matthias therefore hauing aſſembled a ſufficient number of men about him, deſtroyed the Altars, and ſlue thoſe that had forſaken their religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For diuers were ſcattered heere and there among the nations, for the feare they had; theſe commanded hee to circumciſe their children that were not circumciſed; driuing thoſe from euery place, whom King Antiochus had ordained to ſee his law executed.

APOLLONIVS generall of ANTIOCHES army, commeth into Iurie, and is discomfited and slaine.

K

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. Iudas Machabæus ouercommeth Apollonius in battell. Seron gouernour of Cœlosyria is put to flight in Iudæa.

WHen Apollonius, who was Antiochus generall in Samaria heard hereof, he gathered his army together, and inuaded Iudæa: against whom Machabæus made head, and ouercame him in a battell, wherein there died many, and amongst the rest Apollonius; whose sword Machabæus got as his part in the spoile. There were a great number of them also who were wounded, and much bootie was taken in the enemies campe: after which execution enriched with spoiles, hee retired himselfe. But Seron gouernour of Cœlosyria hearing hereof, and vnderstanding that diuers had ioyned themselues with Iudas, and that hee had already about him a sufficient power to keepe the field, and bid the battell; he thought that it concerned him to begin to punish those, who resisted the kings Edicts. For which cause, after he had assembled all the forces that he had, and besides them hired certaine apostate or fugitiue Iewes, hee marched L forth against Iudas, and came as farre as Bethoron a village in Iewry, where he incamped. Iudas also came out to meete with him, determining with himselfe to bid him battell: and seeing that his souldiers would hardly be drawn out to fight (both by reason of their inequality of number, as also for that they had eaten no meate, but had fasted a long time) he encouraged them, saying, that the meanes to obtaine victory, and to haue the vpper hand ouer their enemies, consisted „ not in the greatnes of their number; but in their deuotion towards God: wherof they had a most „ euident example in their forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a small number of men „ diuers thousands of their enemies, because they fought for iustice, for their law, and for their chil„ dren: for the greatest force (said he) that a man may haue, is to bee innocent and without iniurie.
„ By these words perswaded he his souldiers, so that without any feare of the multitude of their e- M nemies, they altogether ranne vpon Seron, and encountring with him, they discomfited the Syrians. For their chieftaine beeing slaine, all the rest betooke them to their heeles, in which thing onely consisted the safetie of their liues. Iudas therefore, pursuing them as farre as the champaine, slew about eight hundreth of them. The rest saued themselues in those quarters that bounded vpon the sea.

LYSIAS and GORGIAS lead their armies into Iewry, and are ouerthrowne.

WHEN King Antiochus heard these tidings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled al his forces, and hiring diuers strangers and mercenary Islanders, he prepared himselfe to inuade Iudæa about the spring time. But after the muster of his army, when he truely found that his treasure failed him, and that hee was in great scarcitie of money (for all his tributes were not truely paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his owne nature a man of great and magnificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolued first of all to goe into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affaires with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as gouerned all the counrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giuing him likewise a part of his army and some of his Elephants. To him had the king giuen charge to see his sonne Antiochus well and carefully trained vp, vntill his return: commanding him expresly, that when he had conquered Iudæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaues, and sel them to those that would giue most, and destroy Ierusalem, and vterly abolish that race. The king hauing giuen this charge to Lysias, led foorth his army towards the country of Persia, in the hundred, forty and seuenth yeere: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the gouernours of the higher countrey.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the sonne of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authority amongst the kings friends) and gaue them forty thousand footmen, and seuen thousand horsemen, to inuade Iewry. Who marching as farre as the city of Emaus, encamped in the plaine fielde, and strengthened their army with diuers allies out of Syria, and of the countries thereabouts, and with diuers Iewes also, who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Giues with them to manicle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

The yeere of the world, 3800. before Christs Natiuitie. 164.

When Iudas had viewed the campe, and numbred the enemy, he encouraged his souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to inuocate and call vpon him, according to their law, and that clothing themselues in sackcloth, they should humble themselues according to their accustomed maner in such extreame dangers, and call vpon God with supplications and praiers; and that in so doing, God would haue compassion on them, and giue them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battell, according to the ancient custome of his countrey, by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for feare least such men being too niggard of their liues, or distracted by such affections, should not fight couragiously: he stood vp in the midst of them, inciting his souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words; My countrimen and companions, neuer haue wee hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to expresse our courages, and contemne our dangers, then at this present. For at this time, if you fight couragiously, you may recouer your liberty: which of it selfe is so acceptable vnto you all, that being of it selfe most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to be affected, because by it onely you shall win the meanes to serue God. As therefore you shall be disposed at this time, you may obtaine the same, and withal enioy a happy life (which consisteth in liuing according to our lawes, and ancient customes) if you behaue your selues valiantly: but if you proue cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extreamity of infamy, and hope no lesse then the vtter extermination of all your race. Thinke therefore with your selues, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your selues that in fighting for your libertie, for your lawes, and for pietie, you shall obtaine immortall glorie: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you may bid your enemies battell. Thus spake Iudas to his armie, to encourage them.

Iudas oration to his soldiers.

Whil'st thus he was intent about the future battell, certaine tidings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and fiue thousand footmen, to the end that (vnder the conduct of some fugitiues, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set vpon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to breake into the enemies army, especially for that he knew that their forces were diuided. Hauing therfore refreshed both himselfe & his army somewhat liuely, aad left a number of fires in his campe, hee marched all the night, and sought out the enemie, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiuing that the Iewes had forsaken their campe, supposed ſuppoſed that they were retired for feare into the mountaines to hide themſelues: For which cauſes trauailing onward, he determined to ſearch diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Iudas accompanied with three thouſand men (who were ſlenderly armed by reaſon of their pouerty) ſhewed himſelfe vnto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after hee had ſurueyed and ſeene their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how ſouldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithſtanding they ſhould be naked: for although they were in that eſtate, yet God (who tooke pleaſure in the greatnes of their courage) had already giuen them the victorie againſt a number of armed ſouldiers: and ſuddainly hee commanded the trumpets to ſound, ſo that ruſhing in vpon his enemies on the ſuddaine, he diſmaied them, and diſcomforted their hearts. And after hee had ſlaine diuers of them who reſiſted, and put all the reſt to flight, he purſued them as farre as Gadara; and the Plaines of Idumæa, of Azot, and of Iamnia. In this encountrie there died about ſome three thouſand of the enemy. Notwithſtanding, Iudas would not permit his ſouldiers as yet to take the benefit of the ſpoile, becauſe they were as yet to fight againſt Gorgias and his army; aſſuring them, that as ſoone as they had valiantly executed the ſame, it ſhould be lawfull for them to make their booty, without feare, becauſe they ſhould haue no further enemies either to feare or expect.

Iudas ouercommeth Lyſias army.

Whileſt he ſpake in this ſort vnto his ſouldiers, they that were with Gorgias diſcouering from the toppe of a certaine hill, perceiued that the armie that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their campe was on fire: for although they were farre off, yet did the ſmoake aſſure them of the ſame. When theſe men vnderſtood that the matter had fallen out in this ſort, and perceiued Iudas and his fellowes in battell ray expected their comming, they feared, and betooke them to flight. When as therefore Iudas perceiued that Gorgias troupes were diſcomfited, without ſtroke ſtriken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great ſtore of gold, ſiluer, ſcarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling place, with ioy, praiſing God for their happy ſucceſſe: for this victory did not a little aduantage them, towards the attainement of their libertie. But Lyſias being confuſed at the diſcomfiture of thoſe whom he had ſent, aſſembled an other army of almoſt threeſcore thouſand choſen men, and fiue thouſand horſmen, to inuade Iudæa. After he had therefore made his entry by the mountaines, he incamped in Bethſura, a village of Iudæa.

Iudas gathereth a huge prey.

Lyſias once more inuadeth Iudæa and loſeth fiue thouſand of his ſouldiers.

Iudas hauing knowledge therof, came forth againſt him, accompanied with ten thouſand men; and diſcouering the number of his enemies far to exceed his (after he had beſought God by praier that it would pleaſe him to fight with him) hee charged the vauntguard of the enemy with ſo great force, that he diſcomfited them, and ſlew about ſome fiue thouſand of them, leauing the reſt in great feare. Lyſias knowing the reſolution of the Iewes, and how they were preſt to die, except they might liue in liberty; on the other ſide redoubting their deſperations, more then their forces, he gathered together the reſt of his army, and returned backe to Antioch: where he ſoiourned, hiring many forraine ſouldiers, to make a greater army and preparation to inuade Iewry withall. After that Antiochus captaines had beene diſcomfited ſo many times, Iudas aſſembled the people together, and tolde them, that after they had obtained ſo many victories thorow the mercy of God, it behoued them to aſcend vp vnto Ieruſalem, and to purifie the temple that was deſolated; and to offer thoſe ſacrifices ordained by the law. Aſcending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the temple deſert, and the gates thereof burned, and graſſe growing within the ſame, thorow deſolation. Being therefore confuſed with ſo pitious a ſpectacle, he began to weepe with al thoſe that accompanied him: And hauing choſen out certen of his beſt ſouldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garriſons that were in the fortreſſe; whiles hee himſelfe purged the temple. Which command of his being exactly and reſolutely fulfilled, he ſent for new veſſels, a candleſticke, a table, an altar of incenſe, all made of gold. Hee put alſo vailes or hangings to the doores, accuſtomed to be ſpred abroad; and ſet gates to the temple. And hauing throwne downe the altar of burnt offerings, which had bin prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all ſorts of ſtones, neither hewen, nor hammered according to art. The fiue and twentith day of the moneth of Chaſleu (with vs September) there were lights ſet vpon the candleſticks, and perfumes laid vpon the altar, and loaues impoſed vpon the table, and ſacrifices offred vpon the new altar. Al which hapned the ſame day three yeeres wherein before time the ſacred Religion was changed into prophane and hatefull impiety. For the temple was ruinated and left deſolate by Antiochus, and remained in that eſtate for the ſpace of three whole yeeres. For this deſolation hapned in the hundreth, forty and fift yeere, and the fiue and twentith day of the month called Apellæus or Auguſt; in the hundreth, fiftie and three Olympiade: and the temple was repurged on the ſame day,

A in the yeere one hundreth, fortie and eight; and the hundreth, fifth and fourth Olimpiade. This desolation of the Temple hapned, according as Daniel had foreprophecied, foure hundred and eight yeeres before: for he declared euidently that the Macedonians should destroy the same. The yeere of the world, 3801. before Christs Nativitie. 163.

After that Iudas had reestablished the seruice of the Temple, both hee and his countrimen solemnized a feast for eight daies, omitting not any kinde of honest pleasure, banquetting them sumptuously and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Psalmes. Thus reioyced they at this reestablishment, seeing that contrary to all hope after so long time, they had recouered the customes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: so that a decree was made for those which should come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the space of eight daies the rebuilding of the Temple should bee solemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: The festiuall solemnized for the reestablishment of the temple.

B and euer since that time vntill this day wee celebrate this feast, called the feast of Lights; for this cause in my opinion, for that this so great felicitie began to shine vnto vs as a light, contrary to all hope. He inclosed the Citie likewise with a wall, and builded high towers thereon, in which hee planted garrisons against the incursions of the enemies. Hee fortified the Citie of Bethsura also, that it might serue as a fort against the enemy.

Whilest these things passed thus, the nations round about displeased with the reestablishment and force of the Iewes, oppressed diuers, whom they surprised by ambushes and treacherie. On those Iudas made continuall warre to hinder their incursions, and to make them partakers of those euils they had inflicted vpon the Iewes. So that inuading Acrabathan, hee slew the Idumæans that were descended from Esau, and brought away a great prey out of their countrey, and shut vp Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11 Machab. 5. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, assembled themselues together in Galaad against the Iewes, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who hauing retired themselues to the fort of Dathema, sent letters vnto Iudas, giuing him to vnderstand, that Timotheus intended to surprise the place whereunto they were retreated, and requested him to deliuer them from this danger. E IVDAS bethinking himselfe of that which best concerned him in these two vrgent and instant occasions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thousand chosen men with him, and to goe and succour those Iewes that were assailed in Galilee: and himselfe, accompanied with Ionathan his other brother, and eight thousand fighting men, repaired vnto the countrey of Galaad; leauing the gouernment of the rest of the forces in the hands of Ioseph the sonne of Zachary, and with Azarias, commanding them to haue a carefull and diligent eye to Iudæa, and not to enter battell with any one, vntill his returne. Simon arriuing in Galilee, fought against his enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that fledde as farre as the gates of Ptolemais, hee slew about three thousand: and after hee had gathered the spoiles of such as were slaine, hee set many Iewes at liberty, who were prisoners; and hauing restored them their goods, retired himselfe backe againe to his countrey. But Iudas Machabæus, and Ionathan his brother hauing past Iordan, and marched on the other side thereof for the space of three daies, encountred with the Nabatheans, who peaceably came out to meete them; by whom hee vnder- Simon ouercomming his enemies in Galilee, deliuereth the Iewes that were captiue. Chaſpoma & Boſor taken.

Anon after Timothy leuied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his ſuccour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his paſſed he the floud, and encamped neere vnto a towne called Rapha; exhorting his ſouldiers to behaue themſelues like valiant men againſt their enemies the Iewes, and to hinder their paſſage ouer the ſtreame: foretelling them, that if they ſhould win the paſſage, both he and his were aſſured of the worſt. Iudas vnderſtanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him all his forces, and marched haſtily againſt the enemy; ſo that hauing paſſed the riuer he ſet vpon them, killing diuers of them that reſiſted, and grieuouſly affrighting the reſt, who caſting away their armes, were conſtrained to flie. There were ſome of them, who ſaued themſelues by ſwiftneſſe of foot: and ſome alſo, who retired themſelues into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be ſecured and ſo to eſcape: but after that Iudas had taken in the City where the temple was, he ſlew them, and burnt the ſame, enforcing his enemies to ſuffer diuers and dreadfull ſorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Iewes, their wiues and children, and ſubſtance, and brought them with him vnto Iudæa. When as therfore he drew neere vnto the towne of Ephron, which was ſituate directly in his way, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to march any other waies or returne home, except they leuelled their way (which they refuſed to doe) he ſent Embaſſadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free paſſage thorow their city. For they had made Baricadoes of ſtones to cut off the paſſage. When as therfore the Ephronites would giue no eare vnto him, he beſieged their City for a day and a nights ſpace, and tooke and burned the ſame, and ſlew all the men that were therin; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and ſo great a number was there of thoſe that were ſlaine, that he marched vpon the bodies of dead men. H I K

Timothy gathereth new forces, and is ouercome by Iudas.

The Iewes are brought out of the country of Galaad into Iudæa.

Ephron beſieged & burnt.

After they had paſt Iordan, they came into a great Plaine, wherein the City of Bethſan (by the Greekes called Scythopolis) confronted their eies; from whence they departed and came into Iudæa with ioy and gladnes, ſinging and praiſing God, and vſing their accuſtomed paſtimes and ſongs of victory. This done, he offered vp ſacrifices of thankſgiuing for their happy ſucceſſe, and the ſafetie of his army; for that in all thoſe battels and encounters he had not loſt one Iew.

An admirable victory of Iudas Machabæus, who in all theſe conflicts loſt not one man.

In the meane while two captaines, to wit, Ioſeph the ſonne of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garriſon of Iudæa (whil'ſt Simon went into the countrey of Galilee againſt thoſe of Ptolemais, and Iudas and Ionathan his brother were in Galaad againſt the Ammonites) deſirous alſo for their part to obtaine the honour and reputation of valiant men of war by ſome notable exploit; tooke their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Againſt theſe iſſued out Gorgias, who was Gouernour in that place, and charged them in ſuch ſort, as the Iewes loſt ſome two thouſand men, and fled as farre as the marches of Iudæa. This miſchiefe fell vpon them, becauſe they had diſobeyed Iudas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For beſides many other proiects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foreſaw that if they ſhould attempt any thing contrary to his command, they ſhould haue but bad ſucceſſe therein. Iudas and his brethren making war againſt the Idumæans, gaue them no reſpite, but continually charged them on euery ſide: they tooke alſo the City of Chebron, and deſtroied all the fortifications in the ſame, and burnt the towers, ſpoyling all the country of the enemies, and raced the City of Mariſſa likewiſe. Afterwards comming to Azot, they took and ſpoiled it, and carried away a great quantity of bootie from thence, and returned backe into Iudæa in ſafety, ioyfull of their victory. L M

Ioſeph & Zachary ouercome by Gorgias, loſe two thouſand ſouldiers.

Antiochus deſirous to ſpoile Dianaes temple, beſiegeth Elymais, and is ſhamefully repulſed to Babylon.

The yeere of the world, 3902. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 162.

Antiochus Epiphanes burdened with cares, falleth ſicke.

Polybius Megalopolitan of the cauſe of Anciochus ſickneſſe.

A T that time Antiochus trauelling along the higher countries of his kingdome, vnderſtood that there was a very wealthy Citie in Perſia called Elymais, in which there was a rich temple of Diana, repleniſhed with all ſorts of preſents: wherein alſo he was enformed, that Alexanders armes and curets, who was Philip King of Macedons ſonne, were reſerued there of long time. Vpon theſe conſiderations he was incited to repaire vnto Elymais, which he beſieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof, were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his ſiege, but ſuſtained the ſame valiantly, he failed of his purpoſe. For they draue him from their citie, and ſallying out vpon him, they purſued him ſo hotly, that he fled backe to Babylon, and loſt a great number of his men. Whileſt thus he was diſcomfited, for that he had beene fruſtrated of his hope, newes was brought him of the ouerthrow of his captaines, whom he had left to warre againſt the Iewes, and how they of Iewry were now the ſtronger, and had the vpper hand. This trouble ſeconding his former diſcontent, he was ſurpriſed with deſpaire, and fell ſicke; which ſickneſſe aggrauated with other accidents, increaſed in ſuch ſort, that he knew well that he ſhould die: and for that cauſe he called for his moſt familiar friends, and certified them, that his ſickneſſe was violent and deſperate, and that he was ſeized with ſuch affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Iewes, and deſtroied their temple, committed horrible ſacriledge, and contemned the reuerence of God: and whil'ſt thus he ſpake vnto them, he gaue vp the ghoſt. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwiſe praiſe-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would haue ſpoiled the temple of Diana in the countrey of Perſia. For ſith he had onely intended to commit ſacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to ſuffer puniſhment for the ſame. And if it ſeemeth good vnto Polybius, that Antiochus was puniſhed by death for this occaſion, it is far more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the ſacriledge he had committed in the temple of Ieruſalem. But our purpoſe is not to argue againſt thoſe that maintaine, that Polybius reaſons are of greater truth and conſequence, then ours are.

Lyſias createth Antiochus the yonger, King, and ſurnameth him Eupator.

The Macedons in the caſtle of Ieruſalem doe much harme to the Iewes.

Iudas Machabæus beſiegeth the caſtle.

The fugitiue Iewes flie out of the caſtle, and require Antiochus aſſiſtance.

B EFORE Antiochus gaue vp the ghoſt, he called for Philip one of his chiefeſt familiars, and made him gouernor of his kingdome. And hauing deliuered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other iewels, he charged him to beare and deliuer them to his ſon Antiochus, requiring him earneſtly to haue care of his bringing vp, and to maintaine the kingdome in his behalfe, vntill hee comming vnto the yeeres of diſcretion, were fit to manage it himſelfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred, fortie and ninth yeere of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lyſias had certified the people of the Kings death, he proclaimed his ſonne Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, ſurnaming him Eupator (according to the inſtructions that were giuen him.) About that time, the garriſons and Apoſtataes that were in the fortreſſe of Ieruſalem, did much miſchiefe vnto the Iewes. For ſetting vpon thoſe at vnawares, who aſcended the temple to worſhip and offer their ſacrifice, they ſlew them: for the fortreſſe commanded the temple. For theſe cauſes Iudas reſolued to cut off theſe garriſons, and to that intent he aſſembled all the people, and beſieged it. This enterpriſe was vndertooke in the yeere one hundred and fiftie, after that Seleucus had vſurped the gouernment of thoſe countries. Hauing therefore made him certaine engines, and raiſed diuers rams, he induſtriouſly continued the ſiege: But diuers of thoſe Apoſtataes that were reuolted, and of that garriſon, iſſued out by night, and aſſembling together ſuch men as were of ſo malicious nature as themſelues, they came vnto king Antiochus, requiring him that he would not ſuffer them to be abuſed in ſuch ſort by thoſe of our nation, nor ſo careleſly neglected by them, conſidering their diſgrace grew by his fathers ſeruice, for whoſe ſake they had forſaken their owne religion, and followed his lawes and ordinances. Furthermore they inferred, that the fortreſſe was in danger to be ſurpriſed by Iudas, and his aſſociates, except ſome preſent ſuccours were ſent vnto them. When Antiochus the yonger had notice hereof, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and ſent for his Captaines and friends, commanding ding them to hire ſtrange ſouldiers, and all thoſe in his kingdome, who were of yeeres to beare armes; ſo that he gathered in ſhort time an army of one hundred thouſand footemen, and twentie thouſand horſemen, and thirty two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed hee out of Antioch, committing his army to Lyſias direction. As ſoone as he came into Idumæa, hee went vp vnto Bethſura a walled Citie, and very difficult to be ſurpriſed, which he beſieged and begirt: but with ſuch diſaduantage, that the Bethſurians reſiſting him valiantly, and ſallying out vpon him, burned thoſe preparations and engines which he had furniſhed for the battery of the towne. When as therefore a long time was conſumed about this ſiege, Iudas hauing intelligence of the Kings approach, raiſed his campe from before the Caſtle of Ieruſalem, and marching forward to meete the enemy, he ſhut his army in a certaine ſtreight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, ſome ſeuenty ſtounds diſtant from the Enemies campe.

The King hauing tidings hereof, raiſed his ſiege from Bethſura, and marched toward the ſtreight wherein Iudas army was incloſed, and about the morning hee ſet his ſouldiers in battell array. Hee firſt of all cauſed his Elephants to march one after another thorow the ſtreight (for that it was impoſſible for them to march in ſquare. About euery Elephant were one thouſand footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen. Theſe Elephants bare high towers on their backs, garniſhed with Archers. Touching the reſt of his forces, he cauſed them to aſcend two ſeuerall waies by the mountaines, vnder the conduct of his moſt intireſt friends, commanding them with a huge ſhout and cry to charge their enemies, and to diſcouer their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Iewes: whereupon, the mountaines reſounded with fearefull cries of Antiochus army: Yet was not Iudas any waies amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, hee ſlue almoſt ſixe hundred of the forlorne hope. But Eleazar, ſurnamed Auranes, Iudas brother, ſeeing a huge Elephant among the reſt armed with royall trappings, and ſuppoſing that the King was vpon the ſame, he ranne againſt him with a mighty courage; and after he had ſlaine diuers of them that enuironed the Elephant, and ſcattered the reſt, he thruſt his ſword into the belly of the beaſt, and wounded him to the death: ſo that the Elephant falling vpon Eleazar, ſlew him with the waight thereof; and thus nobly died this worthy man, ouerthrowing a great number of his enemies, through his infinite valour. Iudas ſeeing his enemies forces ſo great in number, retired backe to Ieruſalem to continue his ſiege: and Antiochus ſent part of his army to Bethſura to ſurpriſe the ſame, and with the reſt he himſelfe marched onward to Ieruſalem.

Eleazar Iudas brother killeth an Elephant. Iudas returneth to Ieruſalem, and Antiochus followeth him.

The Bethſurites being affraid of this mighty army of the King, and ſeeing their neceſſary prouiſions failed them, yeelded vp their Citie, after they had taken the Kings oath, that they ſhould receiue no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this Citie, he offered them no iniurie; onely hee thruſt them out diſarmed from the Citie, and planted a garriſon therein. Hee ſpent a long time alſo in beſieging the temple of Ieruſalem, for that they who kept the ſame, defended it valiantly. For againſt euery engine the King builded and raiſed vp againſt them, they erected a contrarie engine. Their onely want was victuals, becauſe their old prouiſion was conſumed, and the ground had not bin manured that yeere becauſe it was the ſeuenth; in which, according to the law, the countrey and ſoile ſhould not be ſtirred: which was the cauſe that diuers of thoſe that were beſieged, fled ſecretly for want of victuals, inſomuch that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this eſtate were they who were beſieged in the temple.

The Bethſurites yeeld vp their citie. The Temple of Ieruſalem beſieged.

When as King Antiochus and Lyſias the Generall had receiued tidings, that Philip comming out of Perſia, intended to make himſelfe Maſter and Lord of the countrey; they concluded to giue ouer the ſiege for that time, and to march forward againſt Philip, without giuing any inkling thereof either to his ſouldiers or captaines. He onely commanded that Lyſias ſhould communicate the ſame with the captaines, without diſcouering of his deliberation or enterpriſe againſt Philip; and to tell them that for theſe reaſons he leuied the ſiege: firſt, for the length thereof; next, for the ſtrength of the place; laſtly, for want of victuals, and for many affaires that required ſome circumſpect and carefull foreſight in the kingdome: Furthermore, for that he thought it moſt expedient to capitulate with the beſieged, and contract friendſhip with all the nation of the Iewes, promiſing and permitting them the exerciſe of their religion, becauſe they onely rebelled for that they were depriued of the ſame; and for that hee was aſſured, that hauing the grant thereof, they would each of them returne into their owne countries. When Lyſias had expreſſed and publiſhed theſe reaſons; all the armie and the captaines approoued the ſame.

Antiochus hearing newes of Philips intent to inuade Perſia, giueth ouer his ſiege to meete him.

VVHEREVPON Antiochus sent a herauld to Iudas and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to liue according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and hauing taken an oath and assurance from the king; they surrendred vp the temple. Wherupon Antiochus entred the same, and seeing it to be a place so well fortified, he contrary to his oath, commanded his army to leuel the wall that enuironed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with
B him the high priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the King to murther Menelaus, if he intended that the Iewes should liue in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the author of all these euils, by reason of the counsaile he had giuen to Antiochus his father, to inforce the Iewes to forsake their religion. The king for that cause sent Menelaus vnto Berœa a city of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enioyed the high priesthood for the terme of ten yeers. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his onely ambitious desire of authority had inforced our nation to reuolt from their religion. As soone therfore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made high Priest, who was called Iacimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slew him. But Onias the son of the C high priest (whom as we haue heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancie) seeing that the king had slaine his vncle Menelaus, and giuen the priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Eysias, he fled vnto Ptolomey King of Ægypt, where being honorably entertained by the King and his Queene Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signiorie, where he builded a temple like vnto that which was at Ierusalem: whereof we shall hereafter haue more fit opportunity to speake.

D BACCHIDES generall of DEMETRIVS army, commeth to make warre against the Iewes, and returneth backe againe vnto the King without performance of any thing.

AT that time Demetrius, Seleucus sonne fled to Rome, and tooke possession of Tripolis in Syria, and after he had set the Diademe vpon his head, and had leuied and hired certaine souldiers, he inuaded the kingdome: where he was receiued to the generall content of all men, who submitting themselues vnto him laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them aliue vnto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had raigned two yeeres, as we haue alreadie declared in an other
E place. To this new elected King, diuers Iewes (banished for their impietie) and with them the high Priest Alcimus made their resort: who in generall accused their nation, and as principals Iudas and his brethren, obiecting against them, that they had slaine his friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the kingdome and expected his comming, some of them were slaine; and that the rest being driuen from their natiue countrey were banished into other places: requiring him that hee would send some one of his friends to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Iudas and his brethren. Demetrius was much mooued by these reports of theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose gouernment at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gaue an army, ioyning with him the high priest Alcimus, F with commission to kill Iudas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his army, came into Iudæa, and sent a certaine herauld to Iudas and his brethren, to intreat with him vpon certaine articles of peace, because his intent was to surprise them by some subtiltie and treacherie. But Iudas smelling his drift, gaue little trust vnto him: for in that hee came thither with so great an armie, he easily coniectured that he intended no peace; but to make warre: notwithstanding some of the people gaue eare vnto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their countryman, they submitted themthemſelues vnder his gouernment. Hauing therefore receiued an oath from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers ſhould any waies be endomaged by them, they committed themſelues to their protection. But Bacchides ſetting light by his oath, ſlue threeſcore of them; and by this breach of his faith towards theſe, he cauſed others (who intended to ſubmit themſelues) to forſake and flie his gouernment. As ſoone as therefore he had remooued his army from Ieruſalem, he came vnto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of thoſe which had fled, and ſome others among the people, he ſlue them all, commanding all thoſe that liued in the countrey to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place for the guard of his perſon a part of his army: and that done, he returned vnto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the meane while Alcimus intending to aſſure his eſtate and gouernment; and ſuppoſing that it ſhould be ſo much the better confirmed, if ſo be he could obtaine the good will of the people, he vſed all kinde of plauſible and familiar ſpeech vnto them; and deuiſing with euery man pleaſantly and graciouſly, hee adioyned in ſhort time great forces to thoſe which he had before: amongſt whom there were many fugitiues and vngodly men, by whoſe helpe and aſſiſtance he marched thorow the countrey, killing all thoſe whom he found to be of Iudas faction. Iudas perceiuing that Alcimus hauing gathered great forces, had already ſlaine diuers of the moſt vprighteſt men, and ſuch as feared God in all his nation, he addreſſed himſelfe alſo to ouerrunne the countrey, and ſlue as many of Alcimus partakers, as he could meet with. Who perceiuing in himſelfe that he was vnable to reſiſt Iudas, made his account to recouer Demetrius fauour. For which cauſe he repaired to Antioch, and incenſed Demetrius grieuouſly againſt Iudas, accuſing him for inforcing many iniuries againſt him: proteſting that he ſhould endure farre more, except he were preuented and puniſhed by a good army ſent out againſt him.

NICANOR being ſent after BACCHIDES to be Chieftaine of the warre againſt IVDAS, is diſcomfited with all his army.

DEMETRIVS imagining, that if Iudas ſhould increaſe in power, it ſhould be ſome preiudice to his eſtate, he ſent Nicanor his moſt intire and faithfull friend, to make war againſt him: (who was one of them alſo, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Hauing therefore furniſhed him, in his owne opinion, with a ſufficient army, and able to make head againſt Iudas, he commanded him to ſpare no one of that nation. As ſoone as Nicanor came to Ieruſalem, hee intended not incontinently to make warre vpon Iudas, but caſt with himſelfe to ſurpriſe him by ſome ſubtiltie: to this intent he ſent him a peaceable meſſage, alledging that it was neither neceſſary nor conuenient for him to fight or hazzard his fortune; proteſting vnto Iudas, that he would offer him no iniurie; and that he reſorted thither with his friends, onely to expreſſe the good affection of king Demetrius towards him, and how well he was affected towards the nation of the Iewes. Iudas and his brethren beleeued this falſe embaſſage of Nicanors, and ſuſpecting no kinde of ſiniſter dealing, they gaue him credit, and entertained both him and his army. When as therefore Nicanor had ſaluted Iudas, he conferred with him, and in the meane while gaue a ſigne vnto his ſouldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiuing and diſcouering his treaſon betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled vnto his ſouldiers. When Nicanor ſaw that his intent and ſubtiltie was diſcouered, he reſolued to make open warre vpon Iudas, and to bid him battell neere vnto a borough called Caphar-ſalama: in which place obtaining the victory, he conſtrained Iudas to retire himſelfe into the fortreſſe in Ieruſalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the ſiege of Iudas in the temple of Ieruſalem, certain of the prieſts and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reuerence, they ſhewed him thoſe ſacrifices, which (as they ſaid) they intended to offer vnto God for the Kings proſperity and health. But he blaſpheming, threatned them; that if the people did not deliuer Iudas into his hands, he would deſtroy the temple vpon his returne, and with theſe menaces he departed out of the city. Which when the Prieſts heard, they began to ſhed aboundant teares, praying God that it might pleaſe him to defend his ſacred temple, together with thoſe which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

Nicanor diſſembling with Iudas laboured to ſurpriſe him.

Nicanor threatneth the people that except they yeeld vp Iudas he will deſtroy the temple.

When as therefore Nicanor departing from Ieruſalem arriued neere vnto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great ſupply of ſoldiers came vnto him out of Syria. Now Iudas was encamped in an other borough called Adas, about thirty furlongs diſtant from Bethoron, hauing with him at the moſt not aboue one thouſand men. Notwithſtanding he exhorted

A exhorted his ſouldiers not to be afraide of the multitude of their enemies; neither to thinke with themſelues againſt how many they were to fight; but againſt whom, and for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether couragiouſly ſet vpon the enemie, at ſuch time as he ſhould lead them forth to the onſet. Whereupon aſſailing Nicanor, there aroſe a dangerous conflict betweene them; wherein Iudas had the vpper hand: for hee ſlew a great number of the enemy, and finally Nicanor himſelfe fighting couragiouſly was ſlaine; and as ſoone as he fell downe dead, his army betooke them to flight. For hauing loſt their Chiefetaine, they diſperſed themſelues, and caſt away their weapons: Iudas ſpeedily purſuing them, made a great ſlaughter, and by ſound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that hee had diſcomfited the enemy. Whereupon the inhabitants thereabout vnderſtanding heereof, betooke
B them to their weapons, and meeting with thoſe that fled in the foreward, ſlue them, ſo as no one eſcaped from this battell: notwithſtanding they were to the number of nine thouſand. This victorie hapned on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countrimen call it, and the Macedonians Diſtre: And heereof each yeere there is both a ſolemne feaſt and memoriall obſerued. From this time forward the nation of the Iewes were in quiet without any inuaſion, and liued in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combates and dangers. Whereas therefore the high Prieſt Alcimus intended to beate downe an olde wall of the ſanctuarie, which had beene builded by the holy Prophets, he was ſuddainly ſtrooken by God; ſo that he incontinently loſt his ſpeech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured many grieuous torments for diuers dayes, at laſt he died miſerably: after he had enioyed the Prieſthood for the ſpace of foure yeeres.

C After his death, the people with a generall conſent gaue his place to Iudas. Who vnderſtanding of the great power of the Romanes, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spaine, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perſeus and Philip, and beſides all theſe, the great King Antiochus determined to make friendſhip with them, and ſent Eupolemus the ſonne of Iohn, and Iaſon the ſonne of Eleazar his two intire friends vnto Rome, to intreate the Romanes to be their allies and confederates, and to write vnto Demetrius, that hee ſhould giue ouer to warre againſt the Iewes. When the Embaſſadours that were ſent from Iudas, were arriued in Rome, the Senate entertained them; and after they had diſcourſed with them vpon the occaſion of their Embaſſage, they accepted and concluded vpon their alliance, and made a decree, the copie whereof was then brought into D Iudæa, and the originall reſerued in the Capitoll, engraued in a Table of Braſſe. Which arreſt or decree of the Romanes, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare vnto the Iewes, contained theſe articles. *That no man vnder the obedience of the Romanes, ſhould maintaine warre againſt the nation of the Iewes: neither ſhould furniſh them with victuals, ſhippes, or ſiluer, who ſhould make warre vpon them. And if any enemies ſhould aſſaile the Iewes, the Romanes ſhould giue them ſuccours to the vttermoſt of their power. And that likewiſe if any one ſhould make warre againſt the Romanes, the Iewes ſhould ſuccour them. BACCHIDES is ſent once againe into Iudæa, and obtaineth a victorie.

F WHEN as Nicanors death, and the diſcomfiture of his army was reported to Demetrius, hee ſent a new army into Iudæa, vnder the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and repairing to Iudæa, encamped in Arbela a citie of Galilee: where hauing inforced, conquered, and taken a great number of thoſe that were retired into caues, he departed from thence, and repaired in all haſte to Ieruſalem. And vnderſtanding that Iudas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out againſt him with twenty thouſand footmen, and two thouſand horſemen. Now Iudas had not on his ſide in all aboue two thouſand men, who perceiuing the multitude of Bacchides ſouldiers were afraide; ſo that ſome of them forſaking their campe, fled away: by which meanes there remained no more with Iudas, but eight hundred men. Seeing himſelfe therfore abandoned by ſo many of his men, and preſſed by his enemies, who gaue him neither truce nor time to reassemble his forces, hee resolued to fight with those eight hundreth which he had: whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiantly: but they answered, that they were insufficient to make head against so huge an army, and counsailed him to retire, and to stand on his guard for that time, vntill hee had gathered forces that might be able to confront the enemy. But Iudas replyed to this effect: God forbid (said hee) that the Sunne should see mee turne my backe vpon mine enemies. And if by this meanes I meete with my death, and that I must needes spend my last blood in this battell, I will neuer soyle so many notable actions so worthily atchieued, nor staine so much glorie obtained with so great vertue by one ignominious flight. And hauing in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those souldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselues altogether against the enemy.

BVT Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battell, placing the horsemen on both the wings; his light armed souldiers and archers in the front of the army; and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and hee himselfe led the right wing of the battell. And in this array hee approched Iudas campe, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding all his souldiers to giue a great shoute, and to charge their enemies. Iudas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruell conflict, which continued vntill the sunne-set. And when as Iudas perceiued that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certaine number of his most resolute followers, and drew towards that quarter, and setting vpon them, hee brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them hee forced them to flie, and pursued them as farre as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiuing the flight of those in the right, went after Iudas, and enclosed him on the back-part. Hee being vnable to flie, and seeing himselfe enclosed by his enemies, resolued with his souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore hee had slaine a great number of his enemies, and beeing infeebled more through wearinesse, then by the wounds receiued of them, hee fell to the ground, and was himselfe at last slaine likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploites. His souldiers seeing him dead, and hauing no Gouernour of respect left amongst them after the losse of so valiant a Captaine, betooke them all to flight. Simon and Ionathan his brothers vpon intreatie recouered his body, and carried it to Modim (a place where his father was buried) there was hee entered by all the people, who wept for him diuers dayes, and honoured him publikely according to the custome of their countrey. Such was Iudas ende, who was a valiant man, a great warriour and very respectiue of the commandements of his father Matthias, hauing done and suffered all that hee might for the liberty of his countrey. Beeing therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he hath left behinde him a perpetuall renowne of his worthy actes, and an honourable memorie of himselfe obtained by the liberty, in which he reestablished his nation, retyring them from the seruitude of the Macedonians: who died also after hee had discharged the office of the high Priest, for the space of three yeeres.

Iudas dispersed the enemies army, killeth some, and at last is slaine himselfe.

Iudas is buried in Modim.

IONATHAN after the deceaſe of his brother IVDAS, ſucceedeth him in the gouernment.

F WE haue declared in our former booke, how the nation of the Iewes (after they had beene vnder the ſubiection of the Macedonians) recouered their libertie: wee haue likewiſe diſcouered the great and grieuous conflicts, which Iudas their captaine performed, and in which hee finally died in the behalfe of their libertie: how likewiſe (after the death of Iudas) all the wicked Apoſtate Iewes, who had reuolted from their religion, tooke courage, moleſting and doing many iniuries to the reſt of their countrymen. Finally, how beſides their malice, the famine inuaded the countrey; so that diuers being vnable to sustaine these two mortall scourges of famine and warre, were constrained to submit themselues vnto the Macedonians. In the meane while, Bacchides gathering together the false Apostataes (who were fallen from the religion of the Iewes, with an intent to liue after the prophane manner of the Paganes) committed the gouernment of the countrey vnto them: who laying hold on Iudas friends and partakers, betraied and deliuered them to Bacchides: who first of all tormented and beate them at his pleasure, and afterwards put them to death. This so grieuous affliction (then which the Iewes had neuer endured a worse, since their returne from Babylon) was the cause that those of Iudas faction, who were yet aliue, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addressed themselues to Ionathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Iudas vertues, and to haue no lesse care of his countrymen, then the other had; who fought for their libertie vntill his latest breath, requiring him not to abandon the gouernment of his nation, especially in that so miserable estate wherein they were plunged. Ionathan answered them, that he was readie to die for them; and being in all things esteemed no lesse valiant and politique then his brother Iudas, hee was proclaimed Generall and chiefetaine of the Iewes.

The Iewes compelled by the Apostates and by famine submit themselues to the Macedonians.

Bacchides murthereth those of Iudas faction.

Bacchides hauing notice hereof, feared least Ionathan should be no lesse infestuous to the King and Macedonians, then his brother Iudas before him had beene; for which cause he sought the meanes to make him away by treason. But both Ionathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence hereof; and hauing discouered his practise, they tooke all their families with them, and fled into the desart that confined the Citie Ierusalem: and retiring themselues neere vnto a water called the lake of Asphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceiued that they mistrusted him, and were drawne thither; he went out against them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other side of Iordan, he gathered his army together. Ionathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seeke him, sent his brother Iohn (surnamed Gaddis) vnto the Arabians Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their goods vnto their hand, vntil the end of the warre betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whilest therefore Iohn marched towards the Nabatheans the sons of Amraeus laid an ambuscado for him (who were of the citie of Medaba and after they had furiously set vpon him on the way, and laid hold on whatsoeuer hee brought with him, they at length slew him and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his brethren, as we will make manifest in that which afterward followeth.

Ionathan by the publike inttigation of the Iewes vndertaketh the gouernment.

Bacchides complotteth to betray Ionathan and his brother.

Bacchides draweth out his forces against Ionathan.

Iohn the brother of Iudas is slaine by Amars sons.

When Bacchides knew that Ionathan was incamped in the marshes of Iordan, he made choise of the Sabboth day to set vpon him, hoping that hee would not defend himselfe on that day, because of the prohibition of the law. But he contrary to his expectation incouraged his companions, and declared vnto them how it concerned their liues to be valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut vp in the midst betwixt the floud and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the floud on their backes. As soone therefore as hee had made his prayer vnto God, that it might please him to grant him the victory, he set vpon the enemy with a stout courage, and slew a great number of them: and perceiuing Bacchides how with great fiercenesse he set forward against him, he stretched out his right hand to strike him; but he preuenting the stroke by stepping aside, Ionathan and his companions lept into the riuer, and so saued themselues by swimming ouer to the other side of Iordan, because the enemies durst not passe the water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Ierusalem (after he had lost about some two thousand of his men.) After this, he fortified diuers Cities (which were before time ruinated) namely Iericho, Emaus, Betheron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in euery one of them certaine towers, and great and strong walles, and afterwards hee planted garrisons therein to sally out vpon the Iewes, and vexe them; but in especiall he fortified the Cittadel of Ierusalem, in which he kept for hostages the children of the principallest men of Iudæa.

Bacchides assaileth Ionathan on the Sabbath day, and loseth two thousand of his men.

About that time there came a certaine man to Ionathan and his brother Simon, bringing them newes that the sonnes of Amraeus would solemnize their nuptials, and were to leade the bride from the Citie of Gabatha, which was daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians: for which cause she should be conducted with great magnificence and sumptuous pompe. Ionthan and his brother, supposing that a fit opportunity was offered them to reuenge their brothers death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done vnto their brother, they tooke with them the greatest forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba; where they lay in ambush vnder the couert of a mountaine. But when they saw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroome, and a great troupe of their friends likewise, according to the accustomed

A cuſtomed manner of marriages, they brake out of their couert, and put them all to the ſword; and after they had ſeized their Iewels, and all other bootie of that company that followed them, they retired backe againe ioyfully hauing obtained their purpoſe: and thus reuenged they the death of their brother Iohn vpon the ſonnes of Amaræus. For not onely theſe alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wiues and children, were all of them ſlaine, to the number of foure hundreth. And in this manner Simon and Ionathan returned into the marſhes aforeſaide, and aboade there. But Bacchides hauing fortified all the garriſons of Iudæa, returned backe vnto the king. And at that time the eſtate of the Iewes was in peace for the ſpace of welny two yeeres.

When Bacchides by the kings commandement came into Iury, he wrote vnto all his friends both Iewes and alſo his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Ionathan: but when by no policie nor prowes of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Ionathan hauing notice of their ambuſhes, ſtood vpon his gard) Bacchides the Macedonian was diſpleaſed with the Apoſtataes or fugitiues, obiecting againſt them that they had deceiued both the king and him, and laying hold on fiftie of the principalleſt of them, he put them to death. But Ionathan and his brother, with thoſe of their company, reti-
C red themſelues vnto Bethalaga (a certaine village in the deſart) for feare of Bacchides, in which place he builded towers, and walles to keepe his garriſon in more ſecurity. Bacchides vnderſtanding hereof, tooke the army that he had with him, and thoſe Iewes that were his confederates, and marched forward againſt Ionathan; where battering thoſe fortifications that were made by him, he beſieged him for many daies. But Ionathan for all his buſie ſiege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but reſiſted him valiantly; and leauing his brother Simon in the city to make head againſt Bacchides, he ſecretly ſtole out, and gathered a great number of ſoldiers that fauoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides campe; and after he had there ſlaine a number of them, he gaue his brother Simon notice of his comming: who, aſſoone as he heard the noiſe in the enemies campe, haſtily iſſued forth with his ſoldiers, and burnt
D al the Macedonians engines, and for his part alſo made a great ſlaughter of them. Bacchides ſeeing that he was circumuented by his enemies, and that both before and behinde hee was preſſed by them, being aſtoniſhed at this ſo hard, ſodaine and vnexpected encounter, was almoſt out of his wits; ſo ſore was he confuſed at the iſſue of his ſiege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cauſe he diſcharged all his choler vpon thoſe Apoſtataes, ſuppoſing he was abuſed by them, who had ſent vnto the king and had cauſed him to bee ſent thither:) and full gladly would he haue returned home, could he but make an end of the ſiege without his diſhonour.

Demetrius by the ſolicitation of the fugitiues ſendeth Bacchides againſt Ionathan with an army. Bacchides diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates for that they could not ſurpriſe Ionathan killeth fiftie of them. Ionathan and his brother beſieged in Bethalaga.

Ionathan ſtealing out of the city aſſaileth Bacchides by night. Bacchides reuengeth himſelfe on the fugitiues, and is inforced to retreat.

IONATHAN conſtraineth BACCHIDES to make peace with the Iewes, and to depart out of the countrey.

BVT Ionathan knowing his deliberation: ſent an Embaſſadour vnto him to conclude a peace and amitie betwixt them, with this condition; that they ſhould each of them deliuer vp thoſe priſoners that were taken on either ſide. Bacchides ſuppoſing that his requeſt would be to his great honour, and that a fit occaſion was now offered him, whereupon he might raiſe his ſiege without any diſgrace, promiſed Ionathan his friendſhip; ſo that both of them ſwore from that time forward neuer to make warre the one againſt the other; and each of them both receiued, and reſtored their priſoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch vnto his King, and
F after that retreat hee neuer made warre againe vpon Iudæa. But Ionathan hauing obtained this ſecuritie, went and dwelt in the towne of Machmas: where adminiſtring and gouerning the commonweale, he executed ſuch ſeuere iuſtice on thoſe that were reuolted from the religion of their countrey, that he cleanſed the nation of all ſuch kind of men.

ALEXANDER the sonne of ANTIOCHVS EPIPHANES, maketh warre against DEMETRIVS.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11. Alexander the son of Antiochus Epiphanes commeth into Syria, & seizeth Ptolomais.

IN the hundreth and sixtie yeare, Alexander the sonne of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and seized the City of Ptolemais, by treason of those soldiers that were therin; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that he granted no man accesse vnto him: for being locked vp in a royall fort defenced with foure towers (which himselfe had builded neere vnto Antioch) he suffered no man to approch his presence, but was carlesse and wholly negligent in his affaires; liuing in pleasure and idlenes: whereby he grew into great hatred amongst his subiects, as we haue already declared in an other place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolemais, he gathered all his forces and marched forth against him. H

Demetrius warre against Alexander. 1 Machab. 10.

MOREOVER, he sent Embassadors vnto Ionathan, that might confirme an alliance and ratifie a friendship betwixt them: for he determined with himselfe to preuent Alexander, for feare least he capitulating with him first of all, should obtaine his assistants. And I this did he especially for the feare he had of Ionathan, least remembring those iniuries he had before time receiued at his hands, he should oppose himselfe against him. He therfore sent vnto him requiring him to assemble his forces and to make preparation for the warre: commanding likewise, that those Iewes should be deliuered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut vp for hostages in the fortresse of Ierusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himselfe in this sort, Ionathan resorted to Ierusalem, and in the presence of all the people, and of the garrison that was in the fortresse, he read the Kings letters; and after the reading thereof, the cursed and reuolted Iewes that were in the fortresse were sore afraid, seeing that the king permitted Ionathan to leuy an army, and to receiue the hostages. But he receiuing them into his hands, restored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this meanes remained Ionathan in Ierusalem, where he made K

diuers reparations and buildings, according as him pleased. For he builded the City walles of hewen stone, to make them more forcible against the assaults of war. Which when they perceiued who were in the garrisons thorowout all Iudæa, they forsooke them all, and retired back into Antioch, except they that were in the City of Bethsura, and those in the fortresse of Ierusalem: for they consisted for the most part of those Iewes that had abandoned their religion, who for that occasion feared to forsake their garrisons.

ALEXANDER draweth IONATHAN to his partie. L

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 8.

BVT Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made vnto Ionathan, and beeing well assured how valiant he was, and how he behaued himselfe against the Macedonians; moreouer how he was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: He tolde his friends and familiars that it was impossible for him to meete with a better allie at that time then Ionathan, who had approoued himselfe a valiant man against his enemies, and for particular causes bare hatred against Demetrius, from whom he had receiued many iniuries, and on whom hee had wrought sundry reuenges: for which cause if they thought it good to draw him vnto their side against Demetrius; the time was very fit to entertaine and confirme a mutuall peace betweene them: which aduice of his being approoued by his fauorites; he sent a letter vnto Ionathan to this effect. King Alexander to Ionathan his brother, Health: We haue long sithence vn- M

More ouer in way of present, I send you a purple robe, and a crowne of gold, exhorting you, that since you are thus honoured by vs, you will in like sort yeeld vs an answerable respect and friendship. Ionathan hauing receiued this letter inuested himselfe in the habit of the high Priest, and the day

He aſſembled alſo a great number of ſouldiers, and cauſed a great quantity of armors and weapons to be forged. The yeare of the world, 3813. before Chriſts Nativitie. 151.

When Demetrius heard theſe newes, hee was much troubled, and accuſed himſelfe of ſloth and too much negligence in looking to his affaires, for that hee had not preuented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Ionathan, but had ſuffered him to take the benefit of this occaſion. He ſent letters likewiſe to Ionathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Ionathan, and to all the nation of the Iewes: Health. Since you haue obſerued the friendſhip that you beare vnto vs, & haue not entangled your ſelues with our enemies, notwithſtanding their diuers ſollicitations, we praiſe your fidelity, and pray you to perſeuere in the ſame B eſtate, aſſuring you that you ſhall receiue the like fauours from vs, in all integritie. For I will forgiue you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you haue vſually paid, either to the kings my predeceſſors, or to me; and from this time forward, I acquite you from thoſe tributes you are to pay hereafter. And moreouer, I releaſe you of the price of ſalt, and of the gold which you were woont to giue vnto vs for our crowne. We likewiſe acquite you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, and the halfe of the fruit of your trees, which heretofore you haue beene accuſtomed to pay me, to keepe and hold them peaceably from this time forward. I acquite you alſo at this preſent for euer, of al that which the inhabitants of Iudæa, and the three prouinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the City of Ieruſalem be held ſacred, and to haue the right of the freedome, exempt from all tributes C and tenths, both in it ſelfe, and alſo all the countrey belonging thereunto. And I commit the fortreſſe in the ſame to the hands of Ionathan the high Prieſt, permitting him to plant ſuch a garriſon therein, as in his opinion ſhall bee held both honeſt and lawfull; and ſuch as will faithfully maintaine it to his vſe. I will alſo that all the Iewes, who are impriſoned in my countrey, be ſet at libertie. Moreouer, it is my pleaſure, that no horſes of the Iewes bee taken vp to runne poſt for vs: I grant alſo on the Sabboths, and other feſtiuall daies; yea, three daies alſo before euery one of thoſe feaſts, liberty and freedome be vſed. And my will is, that the Iewes, who inhabite within my dominions, be likewiſe freed of all moleſtations. The like priuiledge grant I them that will beare armes with me, to the number of thirty thouſand: who in what place ſoeuer they ſhall be, ſhall haue no worſer entertainment then mine owne army: and part of them will I place in my D garriſons; the reſt ſhall be of my guard; and I will make them captaines in my court, and will permit them to liue according to the ordinances of their countrey, which they ſhall obſerue: & I will alſo that the three gouernments annexed to Iudæa be made ſubiect vnto the ſame lawes. My pleaſure is in like manner, that the high Prieſt ſhall take order, that no Iew adore in any other temple then in Ieruſalem, and of my owne charge I giue euery yeere a hundreth and fiftie thouſand ſicles of ſiluer to be employed in making ſacrifices: and that which ſhall be ouer and aboue thoſe ſacrifices, my pleaſure is that it ſhall be yours. Moreouer, I acquite the Prieſts and miniſters of the temple, of the tenne thouſand drachmes of ſiluer (which the Kings leuied on the temple) becauſe they appertaine vnto the Prieſts who ſerue in the temple; as I haue beene rightly enformed. I grant alſo to all thoſe who ſhall repaire vnto the temple of Ieruſalem, for refuge, and E within the precincts thereof (whether it be for money due vnto the king, or for any other cauſe) that they be acquit thereof, and receiue not any domage in their goods. I permit alſo, that the temple be repaired and builded at my charge. My will is alſo, that the walles of the City be reedified, and that certaine towers be builded about the ſame, at my coſts. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build fortreſſes and ſtrong holdes in, through all the countrey of Iudæa, and to place garriſons in them, my will is that all this bee done and fortified, at the charges leuied out of mine owne coffers. Theſe are the promiſes and offers that Demetrius made vnto the Iewes.

Demetrius ſtudieth by promiſes to aſſure himſelf of Ionathans friendſhip.

The battell betweene Alexander and Demetrius, and of Demetrius death

But king Alexander hauing gathered great forces, as well of ſtrange & hired ſoldiers, as of thoſe who in Syria had reuolted from Demetrius, led foorth his whole army againſt the enemy; and after the enſignes were diſplaied and the onſet giuen, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders ſouldiers that fought againſt it to flie; and his men purſuing them hard at heeles ſpoiF led their campe. But the right wing in which the King himſelfe was, being forced to retire, was diſcomfited: and as for the reſt they betooke them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly ſlew ſome of his enemies; and in purſuing other ſome, who could not endure his fierce aſſault, was in the end, by ſetting ſpurres to his horſe, mainely carried into a deepe and muddie bogge, whereinto by miſaduenture his horſe fell, and being vnable to get out he was ſlaine in that place. For being diſcouered by his enemies, they turned backe vpon him; and hauing incloſed him, they they altogether shot their arrowes against him: who being on foote and fighting valiantly, was at length slaine, after he had receiued diuers wounds, and was no more able to sustaine himselfe. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleuenth yeere of his raigne, as we haue discoursed in an other place. G

ONIAS winneth the fauour of PTOLOMEY PHILOMETOR, and obtaineth leaue of him to build a temple in Egypt, which was called the temple of ONIAS.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4. Onias the son of Onias the high priest seeketh to build a temple in Egypt.

BVT Onias the sonne of the high Priest called also Onias (who flying out of his countrey liued in Alexandria, with Ptolemey Philometor, as wee haue heeretofore declared) seeing all Iudæa destroyed by the Macedonians, and their kings; and intending in his heart to purchase an immortall memory, he determined to beseech the king Ptolomey and the queene Cleopatra by letters, that it might bee lawfull for him to build a temple in Ægypt, resembling in all points that which was at Ierusalem, and that hee might haue liberty to plant Leuites and Priests in the same, of his owne kinred: And hereunto was hee especially mooued; by a certaine prophecy of Esay, who more then sixe hundreth yeeres before, had foretold that a temple should be assuredly builded in Ægypt, in honour of the almightie God by a Iew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect: During the time that I was employed in your warres, and by Gods fauourable assistance haue done you many seruices, I haue visited Cælosyria and Phœnicia, and haue beene in the City of Leontopolis (which is in the territories of Heliopolis.) I haue also visited diuers other places, wherein the Iewes haue temples, against all right and honestie: which is the cause that they agree not among themselues: as also the like hath hapned among the Ægyptians, thorow the multitude of temples, and the great diuersitie of religions. And hauing found out a very conuenient place neere a Castle called Bubastis in the Plaine, where there is store of all sorts of stuffe for building and cattell fit for sacrifice: I beseech you that it may be lawfull for me to purifie the temple that is leuelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no sacred power; and that in the place thereof it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a temple in honor of the highest God, according to the pattern and the same dimensions of that temple, which is in Ierusalem, for the preseruation and prosperity both of you, your Queene, and children; and to the intent that those Iewes that dwell in Ægypt may assemble and serue God therin; for that by how much the more there is vnity and concord among themselues, by so much the more may they be disposed to your seruice. For to this effect is the prophecy of Esay, which saith thus: There shall be (saith he) a temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many other things also hath he foretold as touching this place. H I K

The yeere of the world, 3814 before Christs Nativity. 150.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrot vnto K. Ptolomey. And by his answer which he made hereunto, a man may easily coniecture what piety was both in him, and Cleopatra his sister, and wife. For they haue returned the sin and transgression of the law, which through this means fell vpon Onias head, by this answer that ensueth. King Ptolomey and Queene Cleopatra to Onias the high Priest, Health. Wee haue perused your letters, by which you require vs to giue you licence to clense the temple, that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the seigniory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubastis in the Plaine. We maruel very much that a temple builded in a place so vncleane and full of execrable beasts should be agreeable vnto God: but since that you informe vs, that the Prophet Esay did long time sithence prophecy the same, we giue you licence, if it may be done according to the law, and with this condition, that we commit not any sinne against God. L

A temple builded in Egypt by Ptolomies consent.

Vpon this answer, Onias (taking possession of the place) builded therein a temple, and erected an altar vnto God according to the module of the temple of Ierusalem; but farre lesse, and lesse rich. Yet thinke I it no wayes requisite to declare the dimensions thereof, neither the vessels in the same, because I describe them particularly in my seauenth booke of the warres, and captiuitie of the Iewes: neither wanted there some Leuites and Priests, who being answerable to Onias in deuotion and zeale, frequented the diuine seruice in that place, and renued the ceremonies. But let this suffice for the present as touching the temple. M

Sedition betwixt the Iewes and Samaritans as touching their temple.

But it came to passe, that the Iewes of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the seruice and worship of the temple vpon the mount Garizim, vnder Alexander the great, fell at oddes, and debated their differents before Ptolomey. For the Iewes said that the temple in Ierusalem

A ſalem builded, according to Moſes lawes and ordinances, was the lawfull Temple; but the Samaritanes maintained that that which was builded on mount Garizim, was the true Temple. They therefore beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſit in iudgement, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to heare their allegations in this behalfe, and to condemne the partie vnto death, who ſhould be found faultie in his proceſſe. Now the aduocates which pleaded for the Samaritanes, were Sabbæus and Theodoſius: and Andronicus the ſonne of Meſſalam defended the cauſe of thoſe of Ieruſalem, and the other Iewes. And both of them ſwore both by God and the King, that they would bring their prooues according to the law, beſeeching Ptolomey to adiudge him to death, whom he ſhould finde to haue falſified his oath. The King therefore ſate downe with his friends, both to heare the cauſe, and determine vpon their differents. But the Iewes of Alexan-
B dria were ſore mooued and diſpleaſed againſt them, that had drawne the preheminence of the Temple in Ieruſalem into queſtion, and were highly diſcontent that a Temple ſo ancient and famous, and ſo eſteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, ſhould in ſuch ſort bee diſgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbæus and Theodoſius ſuffered Andronicus to declaime firſt: who began to approoue the lawfulneſſe, holineſſe, and religion of the Temple in Ieruſalem out of the law; and by the ſucceſſiue gouernment of the high Prieſts, who from father to ſonne, and from hand to hand, had receiued this honour; therein alleadging that all the Kings of Aſia had honoured the Maieſtie of that place with preſents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor courſe of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim hath beene in any eſtimation. By theſe and ſuch like words, Andronicus perſwaded the King, that the Temple
C of Ieruſalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moſes, inuiting him to adiudge Sabbæus and Theodoſius to death. This may ſuffice as touching the differents of the Iewes of Alexandria, and ſuch things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

ALEXANDER after DEMETRIVS death honoured IONATHAN greatly.

D AFTER that Demetrius was ſlaine in fight (according as wee haue heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter anſwerable to his dignitie, to contract affinitie with him; firſt ſince he had obtained his fathers Empire by the fauour of God: and next for that hee had ouercome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to theſe his demands, and entertaining them with great pleaſure, wrote backe that he was very glad that hee had recouered his fathers kingdome; promiſing him to giue him his daughter in marriage; giuing him to vnderſtand, that hee would meete him at Ptolemais, and bring his daughter vnto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After hee had written theſe letters, Ptolomey made his ſpeedie repaire to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he deliuered him his daughter, with ſuch a dowrie of gold and ſiluer, as well beſeemed his kingly magnificence. Vnto the ſolemnizing of this marriage, Alex-
E ander by letters inuited the high Prieſt Ionathan, commanding him to repaire vnto him to Ptolemais. Where, after hee was arriued, and had both preſented his ſeruice with other magnificent preſents to both the Kings; hee was highly honoured by both, inſomuch as Alexander conſtrained him to put off his ordinarie garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to ſit vpon a royall throne; commanding his Captaines to march before him thorowe the Citie; and to command by publike edict, that no man ſhould dare to ſpeake any thing againſt him; neither offer him any cauſe of diſcontent in what ſort ſoeuer. All which the captaines performed; ſo that they, who purpoſely and maliciouſly repaired thither to accuſe him, ſeeing the honour that was done vnto him by this publication, fled away haſtily, for feare leaſt ſome miſhap ſhould befall them. This king Alexander loued Ionathan ſo intirely, that he afforded him the chiefeſt place a-

DEMETRIVS the sonne of DEMETRIVS ouercommeth ALEXANDER, obtaineth the Kingdome, and contracteth friendship with IONATHAN.

The yeere of the world, 3818. before Christs Natiuitie, 146.

IN the hundreth, sixtie and fift yeere (of the raigne of the Greekes) Demetrius the sonne of Demetrius (accompanied with diuees hired souldiers, whom Lasthenes Candidot furnished him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which newes as soone as Alexander heard, he was grieuously vexed and troubled: for which cause he instantly posted from Phœnicia to Antioch, with intent to assure the affaires of his kingdome in that place before the arriuall of Demetrius. He left behind him for his gouernour in Cœlosyria Apollonius Danus: who comming vnto Iamnia with a great army, sent a messenger vnto the high Priest Ionathan, signifying vnto him that it was not conuenient that hee onely should liue in assurance at his owne ease and in authority, without submitting himselfe vnto a King; and that it was a great indignitie for him in all mens eies, for that he had not inforced himselfe to stoupe vnder the obedience of a King. For which cause (said he) deceiue not thy selfe, neither hope thou by sculking in the mountaines, or depending on thy forces to continue thy greatnes; but if thou trustest to thy power, come downe into the field, and encounter with me and my army in the Plaine, to the end that the issue of the victorie may shew which of vs is most valiant. Be not thou so ignorant that the noblest of euery Citie beare armes vnder one, who haue alwaies ouercome thy predecessors. For which cause I challenge thee to meete me in that place where we may vse our swords and no stones; and where the vanquished shall haue no aduantage by his flight. Ionathan whetted by this bitter message, chose out ten thousand of his best souldiers, and departed from Ierusalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came vnto Ioppe, and encamped without the Citie (because the Citizens had shut the gates against him) for they had a garrison planted in that place by Apollonius. But as soone as he addressed himselfe to batter the Citie, the inhabitants were afraide, for feare least he should surprise the same by force, and for that cause they opened him the gates. Apollonius vnderstanding that Ioppe was taken by Ionathan, he tooke three thousand horsemen, and eight thousand footemen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his army with a sober march, foote by foote; and arriuing at Ioppe, hee retired backe to draw Ionathan into the field, assuring himselfe vpon his horsemen, and grounding his hope of victorie vpon them. But Ionathan issuing out boldly, pursued Apollonius as farre as Azot: who finding himselfe in the champaine field, turned backe vpon him and charged him. Ionathan was in no sort abashed to see the thousand horsemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambush neere vnto a certaine streame, to the ende they might charge the Iewes behind, but disposed his army in such sort, that his souldiers on euery side turned their faces vpon the enemy; commanding his men to defend themselues on both sides, fighting with those that assailed them either in the vantguard or the rerewarde. This battell continued vntill euening, and Ionathan had giuen his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to set vpon the enemies battell: as for himselfe, he drew himselfe and his souldiers into a forme of a battalion resembling a Tortuse, to the end that being couered with their bucklers, ioyned the one with the other, they might beare off the horsemens arrowes: to which all of them shewed themselues obedient. The enemies horsemen shooting all their arrowes against them, did them no harme; for they pierced not as farre as the flesh, but lighting vpon the bucklers (enclosed and fastned the one within the other) they were easily beaten backe and borne off, and fell downe beeing shot all in vaine. But when as the enemies were wearied with shooting from betimes in the morning vntill euening, and that Simon perceiued they could charge no further, hee set vpon them with his souldiers so couragiously, that he put them all to flight. The horsemen of Apollonius perceiuing that the footemen were disarraid, grew heartlesse likewise, and wearied also for that they had fought vntill the euening: and hauing lost the hope that they had in they footemen, they tooke their flight in great disorder, and confusion: so that they brake their rankes of themselues, and were scattered thorow all the Plaine. Ionathan also pursued them as farre as Azot, and taking the Citie by assault, hee slew diuers of them, constraining the rest that were in despaire to flie into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the Citie by assault, he burned it with the villages round about, and spared not the Temple of Dagon, but burned it and all those that were therin. The number as well of those that were slain in the battell, as of those that were consumed by fire in the Temple, was eight thousand men. Hauing therefore in this sort discomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched towards Ascalon: and as hee was encamped without the Citie, the Ascalonites came out vnto him, and both presented and honoured

A red him. He willingly entertaining their good affection, departed from thence, and iournied towards Ieruſalem charged with great ſpoiles, which after his victory againſt his enemy, he draue before him after he had ſpoiled the countrey. The yeere of the world, 3818. before Chriſts Nativity. 146.

As ſoone as Alexander heard that Apollonius the Generall of his armie was diſcomfited, and forced to flie, he made a ſhew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was againſt his will that Ionathan had beene moleſted by warre, who was both his friend and ally. Whereupon hee ſent an Embaſſadour vnto him, to ſignifie vnto him how much he reioyced at his victory, offering him preſents and honours, with a chaine of gold, ſuch as the Kings were accuſtomed to giue to thoſe of their kinred: he likewiſe gaue him Accaron and the countrey thereunto belonging, to him and his heires for euer. Alexander ſendeth preſents to Ionathan.

B About the ſame time King Ptolomey Philometor ſet out an army by ſea, and another by land, to repaire into Syria, and to ſuccour his ſonne in law Alexander: and in his way all the Cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as farre as the Citie of Azot: in which place all of them exclaimed before him, and challenged Iuſtice at his hand, for that the temple of Dagon was burned and deſtroyed; accuſing Ionathan for the firing thereof, and the ſlaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing theſe accuſations, anſwered them not a word: But when Ionathan came for to meete him at Ioppe, he courted him with royall preſents, and all the honour that was poſſible, and after he had kept him company as farre as the flood called Eleutherus he diſmiſſed him, and ſent him backe to Ieruſalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolemais, he hardly eſcaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexanders owne complotting, and Ammonius his friends mediation: Which C treacherie being diſcouered, Ptolomey wrote vnto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might be puniſhed for his treaſons and conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, which in their natures required a ſeuere and cruell puniſhment. But ſeeing that Alexander deliuered him not vp into his hands, he coniectured and concluded, that he himſelfe was the author thereof, and conceiued a hainous diſpleaſure againſt him. In like manner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the meanes of the ſaid Ammonius, who had loaden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the end Ammonius was puniſhed for theſe his outragious miſdemeanors, and diſgracefully ſlaine like a woman, whileſt in a womans attire, hee ſought to hide himſelfe, as we haue expreſſed it in another place. Hedio & Ruffinus. cap. 7. Ptolomey Philometor repaireth into Syria with an army to aſſiſt his ſon in law Alexander. Ionathan meeteth with Ptolomey, and is honourably entertained by him. Treaſon intended againſt Ptolomey, and diſcouered: for which cauſe he taketh away his daughter from Alexander, and giueth her to Demetrius for his wife.

D At that time Ptolomey began to accuſe himſelfe for beſtowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refuſing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: ſo that he brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawen his daughter from him, hee preſently ſent Embaſſadours vnto Demetrius to confirme a league of peace and affinity with him; promiſing him to beſtow his daughter vpon him in marriage, and to eſtabliſh him in his fathers kingdome. Demetrius very ioyfull to heare of this Embaſſage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There onely remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to ſurmount, which was how he might perſwade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, againſt whom they were ſo grieuouſly incenſed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty ouercame he by this meanes that enſueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, becauſe of Ammonius E (as we haue expreſſed heretofore) and by that means were the more eaſily drawne to driue him out of the City. Hee perceiuing himſelfe to bee thruſt out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came vnto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and ſouldiers therein, proclaimed king, and was conſtrained to take two Diademes, the one as King of Aſia, the other as King of Ægypt. He was a man of a gentle and iuſt nature, no waies ambitious; but ſuch a one as prudently did forecaſt what was to enſue: ſtriuing by all meanes poſſible to auoide the hatred and iealouſie of the Romans. For which cauſe (aſſembling the Antiochians together, hee wrought ſo much with them, that at laſt hee perſwaded them to accept of Demetrius, aſſuring them that if he ſhould receiue that benefite at their hands, he would no more keepe in memory thoſe things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father: proteſting for his own part that he F would inſtruct him both how to order the courſe of his life honeſtly, & to manage his publike affairs rightly; and promiſing them that if he attẽpted to work them any inconuenient, he himſelfe would be the formoſt to chaſtice him; alledging for his own part, that he would content himſelfe to be king of Ægypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receiue Demetrius. Ptolomey perſwadeth the Antiochians to accept Demetrius for their King, and refuſeth the Diademe of Aſia.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great army, and was come into Syria, and had burned and ſpoyled the countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanied with his ſonne Demetrius (for hee had already married his daughter vnto him) iſſued out with their armies, and obtained a ioynt and mutuall victory, by ouercomming Alexander, who was constrained to flie into Arabia. It came to passe in that conflict, that Ptolomeies horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled and stumbled in such sort, as hee threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceiued, they ran altogether vpon him, and gaue him diuers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to haue been slaine, vnlesse his guard had rescued him: notwithstanding hee was so sicke for foure daies space, that hee could neither heare nor speake. But Zabel the potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head vnto Ptolomey; who being somewhat come vnto himselfe after his wounds on the fift day, and hauing some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightfull in his eare, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemy. But some few daies after, he dyed himselfe, being full of ioy in that he saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamed Balles, raigned for the space of fiue yeeres, as we haue elsewhere declared.

Alexander being ouercome flieth into Arabia, and is slaine in that place. Ptolemeis death.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor, hauing obtained the kingdome, began thorow his malice to dismember Ptolomeies army; forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomeies daughter. But the men of warre hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselues from his wickednesse; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the high Priest Ionathan hauing assembled an army of all the countrey of Iudæa, began to besiege the castle of Ierusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Iewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Ionathan had raised to surprise the place, in the strength whereof they reposed too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came vnto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased therat, and taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make warre vpon Ionathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, he wrote to Ionathan and commanded him to come vnto him: notwithstanding Ionathan gaue not ouer the siege, but tooke the Elders and the Priests with him, with golde and siluer, robes, and a great quantity of presents to beare vnto Demetrius, and when he had deliuered them into his hands he appeased his wrath; and after he had receiued many honors at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his priesthood, in as ample manner, as hee enioyed it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Iewes accused him, yet did not Demetrius giue them any credit. Moreouer, Ionathan requiring, that for the whole countrey of Iewry, and for the three gouernments of Samaria, Ioppe, and Galilee, hee might pay no more then three hundreth talents for tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his letters patents in these tearms: King Demetrius to Ionathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Iewes: Peace and Ioy. We haue sent you the copy of the letter, that we haue written to Lasthenes our father, to the end you may know the contents thereof, which is this. King Demetrius to Lasthenes his father: Ioy and Peace. Because the people of the Iewes are our confederates, and obserue our ordinances, my intent is to requite their good affection, and to assigne them the three gouernments of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which haue beene taken from Samaria and annexed to Iudæa. Secondly, we remit all that which our predecessors Kings receiued of them that sacrificed in Ierusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered » for the fruits of the earth and the trees; the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was le- » uied for the crowne: so that henceforward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands, either for » the time present or to come. See you therefore giue order that the Copie of these our present » letters be sent and deliuered to Ionathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the » sacred temple. See here what hee wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiuing that his countrey was in peace, and that he liued without feare of any warre, he dismissed his army, and cashierd his souldiers; hiring only certaine strangers (who were mustred out of Candy and other Isles) whereby it came to passe that his owne souldiers conceiued an enuie and hatred against him, in that he gaue them no wages; whereas his predecessors maintained them as well in peace as in warre, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards them; and that if need required to employ them, they might shew themselues more ready and couragious to fight for them.

TRYPHON APAMENVS ouercommeth DEMETRIVS, and giueth the kingdome to ANTIOCHVS the sonne of ALEXANDER, and plighteth friendship with IONATHAN.

A Certaine man called Diodotus, and by surname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation and Generall of Alexanders army) hearing what mutiny there was amongst Demetrius souldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing vp of Antiochus Alexanders sonne, and wrought as much as in him lay that he would commit Antiochus to his trust, to the intent he might make him King, and establish him in the soueraigne gouernment which appertained to his B father. And although vpon this first motion of his, he could hardly be drawne to beleeue it; yet not long after by the continuall instance of Tryphon he was perswaded to condescend, and suffered himselfe to bee drawne by his perswasions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Ionathan the high Priest, desiring that they within the cittadel of Ierusalem and those wicked and Apostate Iewes, and in generall all those that were in the garrisons thorowout all the countrey, might bee displaced and dismissed; he sent Embassadors with rich presents vnto Demetrius, beseeching him to cashire those that were in garrison in the fortresses of Iudæa: who not onely promised him that demand, but also matters of farre greater moment, after that warre which hee had then in hand, were determined. For the present troubles at that time, gaue him no leisure to performe the same: he therefore praid him for the right of their friendship to send him some of C his forces, giuing him to vnderstand, that his army was reuolted. Whereupon Ionathan chose out three thousand fighting men, and sent them vnto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both because of the iniuries they had endured vnder him, as also for the hatred they had conceiued against his father, who had in like manner done them much wrong; so that they onely expected and watched their opportunity, to expulse him. Vnderstanding therefore that the succours that Ionathan sent vnto Demetrius were at hand; and foreseeing that in short time he would gather a great army, if they hasted not themselues to preuent him betime; they betooke them to their weapons, and beset the Kings Palace after the manner of a siege, and guarded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who seeing himselfe roundly beset by the armed multi- tude of the Antiochians, tooke those hired souldiers (with those whom Ionathan had sent him) D and charged them: but hee was forced to retire, and ouercomn by them, who were assembled in that place to the number of many thousands. For which cause the Iewes perceiuing that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted vpon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence darted and shot against them, without any endomagement to themselues (by reason of the distance and height of the place where they were) notwithstanding they gauled the people grieuously, in so much as they droue them from the houses neere adioining, which they incontinently set on fire, whereby the flame thereof was spred thorow the whole City; so that the houses that were close builded the one by the other, and for the most part framed of wood, were burnt downe to the ground. The Antiochians perceiuing that they could not remedy the fire, E nor extinguish the same, betook them to flight, and the Iews chasing them from house to house, pursued them after an incredible manner. When the king perceiued that the Citizens of Antioch ranne here and there to saue their wiues, and children, and for that occasion had giuen ouer the battell, he set vpon them in a certen narrow streight, whereas diuers of them were slaine, and all at last enforced to cast downe their weapons, and to yeeld themselues to Demetrius mercy, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that sedition. After this he rewards the Iewes with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authours of his victory. Whereupon hee sent them backe to Ionathan; with no small acknowledgement and testimony of their prowesse & virtue. But afterwards he discouered his euill nature towards him, and falsified his promises, menacing him to make warre vpon him except hee pa de him those tributes, which the people of the F Iewes ought, and were woont to pay vnto the Kings his ancestors before time. And these deseigns of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindered him: for he was enforced to turne those forces that he had prepared against Ionathan, to make warre vpon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the yonger Antiochus (who at that time was vnder yeers) hee set the diademe vpon his head. All the army likewise that had abandoned Demetrius, for shorting them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open warre against their master, and vnder Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him and ouercame him, seizing both his Elephants, and the

But the yonger Antiochus sent Embassadors and letters to Ionathan, calling him his ally and friend, confirming the Priesthood vnto him, and allotted him the foure gouernments annexed to Iudæa; and besides these, hee gaue him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to weare the same: he gaue him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon Generall of his army, from the marches of Tyre as farre as Ægypt. Ionathan highly reioyced at these fauours of Antiochus, and sent Embassadours both vnto him and Tryphon, protesting that hee was their friend and ally, and that hee would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefits which he had receiued (notwithstanding that in his necessity hee had beene succoured by him) returned him euill for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

Ionathan for the fauours and benefits he receiued at Tryphons and Antiochus hands, offereth and performeth his best indeauours against Demetrius.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leaue to leuy a great army out of Syria and Phœnicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himselfe incontinently into the Cities, who receiued him very magnificently; yet did they not affoord him any men of war. Comming from thence vnto Ascalon, the Citizens in honourable array came out to meete him with presents; whom togither with the cities of Cœlosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, and to follow Antiochus; to the end, that ioyning themselues with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefes which they had oftentimes endured by his meanes: and which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to prosecute their reuenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazeans to be of a farre contrary disposition, then that which he expected; for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius; yet would they not ioyne their forces, or submit their Citie to his gouernment. For which cause Ionathan besieged their Citie, and spoiled their countrey: for with the one halfe of his army hee begirt Gaza; and with the other halfe he ouer-ranne the countrey, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazeans seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiuing that no succours came vnto them from Demetrius; but that their owne ouerthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off; and that which was worse, most vncertaine: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers vnto Ionathan, protesting that they would bee both his friends and confederates. For, men doe vnwillingly take knowledge of their profite, before they haue bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was most expedient for them to performe before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt after, at such time as they haue beene chasticed. Vpon this submission of theirs, Ionathan receiued them into fauour, and tooke pledges of them, and sent them to Ierusalem; and from thence marched hee along the countrey as farre as Damasco. And whereas a huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as farre as the Citie Cedasa neere vnto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to diuert Ionathan from Syria, by succouring and relieuing those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Ionathan went out speedily to meete with them, recommending the estate of Iudæa to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to bee gathered thorowout all the countrey, encamped before Bethsura, a strong fort in Iudæa; and besieged it (for Demetrius beeing before time seized thereof, kept garrison therein, as before this we haue declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarkes and fitted his engines to assault the Citie, and employed all his study to surprise the same, they that were besieged waxed affraid, least if hee should take the towne by force, they should lose their liues. For which cause, they sent an herauld vnto Simon, requesting him that he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura with the safety of their liues and goods, and go vnto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the Citie, and hee planted a garrison therein of his owne men, in place of the Macedonians. In the meane while Ionathan, who was in Galilee, caused his army to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where hee was encamped, and marched towards the plaine of Azot, without any suspicion that his enemies had bin planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Ionathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed neere the mountaine, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battell in the Plaine. As soone as Ionathan perceiued their preparation to the battell, hee arraunged his army as conueniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Iewes vpon their backes, they fearing to be inclosed, and consequently easily slaine, began to flie; so that all of them abando-

Now when Ionathan had obtained this famous victory, wherein there dyed about ſome two thouſand of the enemy, hee returned to Ieruſalem, and ſeeing that by Gods prouidence all things fell out according as he himſelfe deſired) hee ſent Embaſſadours vnto Rome, purpoſely to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt them, and the people of the Iewes: com-

B manding his Embaſſadours vpon their returne from Rome, to tranſport themſelues to Sparta, and renue their common friendſhip and acquaintance alſo in that place. As ſoone as they were come to Rome, and had preſented themſelues before the Senate, they declared how they were ſent from the high Prieſt Ionathan, who required the renouation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amity of the Iewes, and gaue them their letters of recommendation to beare vnto all the Kings of Aſia and Europe, and to the gouernours of all the Cities, commanding them to grant them free paſſage to returne into their countrey. And in their returne they paſſed by the Lacedemonians, and preſented thoſe letters which Ionathan had written vnto them, the copy wherof contained matters to this effect. Ionathan Ionathan renewed his friendſhip and confederacie with the Romans and Lacedemonians.

Theſe Embaſſadours of his were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publike ordinance as touching their aſſociation, and amity with the Iewes; which they deliuered vnto them. The yeere of the world, 3821. before Chriſts Nativitie, 143.

In this time were there three ſects among the Iewes, who had different and contrary opinions as touching humane affaires: the firſt was that of the Phariſees; the ſecond of the Sadducees; and the third of the Eſſenians. The Phariſees affirme that ſome things and not all things, are directed by deſtiny; and that ſome other things were tyed to mens election, whether they would performe them or not. The Eſſenians ſaid, that deſtiny gouerned all things; and that nothing hapned amongſt men that was not diſpoſed thereby. The Sadducees auow that there is no deſtiny; and that humane affaires, in that deſtiny is not, cannot be gouerned and diſpoſed thereby: their onely opinion is, that all things depend vpon our owne diſpoſition; ſo as in reſpect of our them neere vnto the Plaine of Amath: for he resolued to preuent their intended roade into Iudæa. Encamping therefore some fifty furlongs off of the enemy, hee sent out spies to discouer of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view knowne all that possibly they could, returning tooke certaine prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the intent of the enemies was discouered vnto Ionathan; which was, that they would set vpon them on the suddaine. But Ionathan with a prouident care speedily fortified his campe, and prepared all things necessary for defence, and placed a watch or Sentinell without his host, keeping his souldiers vp in armes all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and ready, forasmuch as they must needes fight by night, to the end that they might not be surprised by the subtilties and policies of their enemies. But when the Captaines of Demetrius vnderstood that their intended purpose was discouered vnto Ionathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsaile to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practise of subtill meanes to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselues not to be of sufficient strength to bid Ionathan battell in the plaine field; they therefore resolued to flie, and leaue great fires through all their campe, to the end their enemies might thinke they were asleepe: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Ionathan drew neere their campe to bid them battell, and saw it abandoned, and coniectured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but hee could not ouertake them, because they had already past the floud Eleutherus, and were retired into their strong holds and places of security. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making warre on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their countrey, tooke great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco, and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon his brother) marching thorow out all Iudæa and Palestine as farre as Ascalon; planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition: and finally came to Ioppe, which he tooke by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because hee was aduertised that they of Ioppe intended to surrender the Citie to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Ionathan had in this sort disposed all things, they came to Ierusalem, and assembled the people togither in the temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walles of the Citie, and to strengthen the inclosure of the temple that was ruinated, aduising them to fortifie the same with strong towers: and besides this, he caused another wall to be builded in the middest of the Citie, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that meanes they might cut off and stop vp the passages to victuall the fort. He aduised them likewise, to build farre stronger fortresses thorow out the countrey, then those that were already finished. Now when as the people had allowed of this his good aduice, Ionathan gaue order as touching all those things that concerned the building within the Citie, and set his brother Simon about the fortresses in the countrey. But Demetrius passing the riuer, came into Mesopotamia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the Citie of Babylon; that being seized thereof, he might the better prouide for all the occurrences of his kingdome. For the Greekes and Macedonians, who inhabited that countrey, had sollicited him by often Embassadours to come vnto them, promising him to subscribe to his authoritie, and to warre with him against Arsaces King of the Parthians. He puffed vp with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resoluing with himselfe, that after he had ouercome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage warre with Tryphon, and easily driue him out of the kingdome of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the countrey with great affection, he leuied a great armie, and assailed Arsaces; but hee lost the day, and himselfe was taken prisoner, as we haue elsewhere declared.

DEMETRIVS is taken prisoner. TRYPHON breaketh the couenant of peace betwixt him and IONATHAN, and surpriseth and killeth him trecherously, and afterwards maketh warre against his brother SIMON.

WHEN Tryphon vnderstood that Demetrius affaires had so vnfortunate an issue, he forsooke Antiochus & his seruice; and complotted with himselfe how he might kill him & make himselfe king. But the feare that he had of Ionathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolued first of all to deliuer himselfe of Ionathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young king away. Hauing therefore concluded with him

himſelfe to kill Ionathan by ſome ſtratagem of treaſon, he came from Antioch to Bethſan (which the Greekes call Scythopolis) whither Ionathan came to meete him with forty thouſand choſen men, ſuppoſing that Tryphon reſorted thither to make warre vpon him. But he knowing that Ionathan came thither with ſo much ſtrength, wrought him by preſents and counterfeit curteſies; commanding his Captaines to obey Ionathan, thinking by that meanes to perſwade him that he intirely and truely loued him, and to extinguiſh his ſuſpicion, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at ſuch time as he had leaſt ſuſpicion of him. He counſelled him to diſmiſſe his army likewiſe, becauſe hauing cut off all occaſion of warre, hee had no reaſon to retaine them, for that there was no ſuſpicion of alteration. After this he inuited Ionathan to come to Ptolemais, and to bring with him ſome few of his ſouldiers, ſignifying vnto him that hee would deliuer the Citie into his hands, and reſigne all the fortreſſes that were in the countrey to his poſſeſſion; vrging further, that he came into that countrey to no other end, but to performe it. Ionathan ſuſpecting no ſiniſter dealing, and beleeuing that Tryphon ſpake of good and entire affection, diſcharged his forces, and tooke onely three thouſand men with him, whereof two hee left in Galilee, and with one thouſand repaired to Ptolemais vnto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans ſhutting the gates as ſoone as hee was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) tooke Ionathan priſoner, and ſlue all thoſe that attended vpon him. Hee preſently ſent alſo part of his army vnto the two thouſand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the ſword: but they hauing notice of that which had befallen their Chieftaine, taking vp their arms, ſpeedily departed out of Galilee. And although the ſouldiers of Tryphon exceeded them farre in number, yet were they not ſo hardy as to trie whether part were the ſtronger; becauſe they knew that the Iewes were ready to expoſe themſelues to all dangers, to defend their liues: and ſo they returned backe to him that ſent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The people maketh SIMON Generall of their army, and declareth him the high Prieſt.

THEY of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding of the ſurpriſall of Ionathan, and the loſſe of his ſouldiers, grieuouſly lamented for this accident, that ſo great a man as hee was, was taken from them, in that they feared (and that not without cauſe) that being deſtitute after his deceaſe both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them would ſeeke their trouble and moleſtation: who hauing held themſelues quiet in admiration of him, would at that time lift themſelues vp againſt them; and not onely perſecute them with warre, but bring them into extreame danger of their liues. Neither did their expectation deceiue them. For the neighbouring nations, vnderſtanding of Ionathans death, began preſently to make warre vpon the Iewes on all ſides, as againſt thoſe who had no longer any chieftaine vnder whoſe conduct they might wage warre and ſhew themſelues valiant. And Tryphon likewiſe hauing gathered forces, was determined to aſcend into Iudæa, to warre againſt the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiuing that the Citizens of Ieruſalem were diſmaied with the feare, which they apprehended of thoſe rumours and new tumults of warre, and being deſirous to animate them againſt all incurſions and attempts intended by Tryphon; aſſembled the people in the temple, and began to exhort them after this manner. You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, haue voluntarily offered our ſelues vnto death for your libertie. Since therefore, I haue abundance of ſuch like examples, and that it is the ordinary courſe of our family to die for our law and religion, there is no feare ſo great as can plucke out this reſolution out of my heart, as it may plant ſuch a deſire of life in me, as to be drawne to forget all honour. Wherefore ſince you haue ſuch a chiefetaine and commander, as ſetteth light by all danger, whereby he may endure or act any thing for your ſafetie; it behooueth you to follow me couragiouſly to what place ſoeuer I ſhall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, whereby I ſhould ſpare my life; neither am I leſſe then they, whereby I ſhould through negligence and cowardiſe ſhun and forſake that which they haue eſteemed to be honorable, as is to die for the law and the ſeruice of our God. I will make manifeſt therefore by all the teſtimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawfull brother; for I truſt in God, that he will giue me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliuer not onely all of you, but your wiues and your children from the iniurie which they intended againſt you; and by the grace of God I will preſerue the holy temple, that it may not be ruinated by their prophane hands. For, I already perceiue, that the prophane nations ſet vs at nought, nought, and contemne you as if you had no Chiefetaine: and I know already that they are marching forward to fight with you. By these words Simon heartned the people, who were distracted with feare, so that they reuiued their spirits and conceiued better hope. Whereupon all of them cryed out with a loude voice, that Simon was their Generall, and that he was to succeed his two valiant brethren Iudas and Ionathan in the gouernment; and that as touching themselues, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. Hee therefore assembled in one instant all the men at armes in that countrey, and hasted himselfe to repaire the Citie walles, defencing them with high and strong towers, and sent a certaine friend of his called Ionathan the sonne of Absalon, with an armie to Ioppe; commanding him to expulse the inhabitants of that Citie from thence, for that hee feared least they should submit themselues to Tryphon: As for himselfe he remained in Ierusalem to secure the same.

Tryphon departing from Ptolemais with a great armie, came into Iudæa; leading his prisoner Ionathan with him. Whereupon Simon with his armie went out against him as farre as Addida (a Citie situate vpon a mountaine, at the foote whereof beginneth the champaine countrey of Iudæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made gouernour of the Iewes, sent messengers vnto him, intending to circumuent him by treason and policie; giuing him to vnderstand that if hee were desirous of his brothers enlargement, he should send him one hundreth talents of siluer, and two of Ionathans children for hostages, to assure him, that being set at liberty, he should not withdraw Iudæa from the obedience of the King.) For, till that present he was held and kept prisoner, by reason of the money which he ought the King.) Simon was no waies ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he should both lose his money, if hee should deliuer the same; and that his brother should not be enlarged, no though his children were deliuered for hostages: on the other side he feared, least the people should conceiue sinisterly of him, as if he had been the cause of his brothers death, both by not deliuering the money, neither yet the children: Hauing therfore assembled the army, he declared vnto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole scope of his actions were nought else but traiterous stratagemes and subtilties: yet notwithstanding he told them, that he had rather send both the mony and the children to Tryphon, then by refusing his conditions and demands, to be accused to haue neglected the life of his brother. Simon therefore sent both the money and children of Ionathan: but Tryphon hauing receiued both, kept not his promise; but detained Ionathan: and leading his armie thorow the country, intended to passe by Idumæa to repaire to Ierusalem. He came therefore to Dora a Citie in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping alwaies right ouer against him. They that were in the Castle of Ierusalem, hearing newes hereof, sent Tryphon word that hee should hasten and come vnto them, and send them munition: whereupon he addressed his horsemen, pretending that very night to ride vnto Ierusalem; but the snow about that time fell in such abundance, that it couered the way in such sort and was so thicke, as the horses could not trauell; which hindred his repaire to Ierusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Cœlosyria; and speedily inuading the country of Galaad, he put Ionathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon sent vnto Basca and transported his brothers bones, and interred them in his countrey Modin in his fathers sepulcher, and all the people mourned and lamented for him many daies. Simon also builded a great monument of white and polished marble for his father and his brethren, and raised it to a great height, and garnished it round about with galleries and pillers all of one piece, which was an admirable worke to behold. Besides that, he erected seuen Pyramides for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, so great and so faire, as they mooued admiration in those that beheld them; and are as yet to be seene at this present day. So great was Simons care, that Ionathan and the rest of his family should be honoured with so magnificent a sepulcher: which Ionathan died, after he had exercised the place of the high Priest, and possessed the gouernment for foures yeeres. Thus much as touching his death.

As soone as Simon had taken possession of the high Priesthood, by the election of the people; the very first yeere of his gouernment, he acquitted the people of the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This libertie and exemption from tribute hapned amongst the Iewes, one hundreth and seuenty yeeres since the time that Seleucus surnamed Nicanor obtained the kingdome of Syria. And in so great honour was Simon amongst the people, that in their priuate contracts and publike letters, the date began from the first yeere of Simon the benefactor and gouernour of the Iewish nation. A Cities of Gaza, Ioppe, and Iamnia: he raſed alſo the cittadel of Ieruſalem, and leuelled it with the ground, to the intent the enemies might be neuer ſeized thereof any more, nor retreat themſelues thither to endomage the Citie, as before time they had done. Which when hee had brought to paſſe, he thought it not amiſſe, but very profitable, to leuell the hill where on the Caſtle ſtood, to the intent the temple might be the eminenteſt place. All this perſwaded he the people to doe in a common aſſembly, laying before their eyes how many euils they had ſuffered, by the meanes of the garriſons, and how much they were like to ſuffer hereafter, if a ſtranger ſhould once more be maſter of the kingdome, and build a cittadell in that place. By theſe exhortations he perſwaded the people to finiſh theſe workes, and all of them began to trauell without intermiſſion both day and night, ſo that in the ſpace of three yeeres they planted the mountaine, and B wrought it downe; and from that time forward there was nothing but the temple that commanded the Citie. SIMON beſiegeth TRYPHON within Dora, and contracteth alliance with ANTIOCHVS, ſurnamed the DEVOVT.

NOT long after the captiuitie of Demetrius, Tryphon ſlew Alexander the ſonne of Antiochus ſurnamed God, notwithſtanding hee had the care and charge of his education for foure yeeres, during which time he raigned; and ſpreading abroad a certaine noiſe and C rumour, that the yong King in exerciſing himſelfe fortuned to die, he ſent his friends and familiars vnto the men of warre, promiſing them that if they would elect and chooſe him King, hee would giue them a huge ſum of money; giuing them to vnderſtand, that Demetrius was a priſoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother ſhould obtaine the kingdome, he would puniſh them diuers waies, and reuenge their reuolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forſaking him. The army hoping, that if they beſtowed the kingdome on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaimed him King. But after he had attained the fulneſſe of his deſires, hee ſhewed how malicious and wicked his nature was. For at ſuch time as hee was a priuate man, he flattered the people and made ſhew of moderation; and by ſuch allurements he drew them to do what him liſted: but after he had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, he diſcouD red his hypocriſie, and ſhewed plainly that he was not vnaptly called Tryphon, that is to ſay, a trifler or mocker. By which means he drew the hearts of the better ſort from him: and as for his army, they grew ſo much in hatred of him, that they ſubmitted themſelues to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time ſhut vp both her ſelfe and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus, ſurnamed the Deuout, and brother to Demetrius, was driuen from place to place, and had not any Citie that would entertaine him for feare of Tryphon; Cleopatra ſent vnto him, inuiting him both to be her husband, and to take the poſſeſſion of the kingdome. And hereunto did ſhee the rather draw him, partly for that ſhee was thereunto perſwaded by her friends, and partly for the feare ſhe had, leaſt ſome one of Seleucia ſhould betray the City to Tryphon. As ſoone as Antiochus was arriued in Seleucia, and that from day to day his forces increaſed, he marched forth E into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and ouercame him in battell, and droue him out of the higher Syria, and purſued him as farre as Phœnicia: where after hee had retired himſelfe into Dora, a ſtrong and impregnable Caſtle, he beſieged him therein, and ſent preſent Embaſſadors to Simon, the high Prieſt of the Iewes, to confirme a friendſhip and confederacie with him. Simon very curteouſly accepted his demands, and preſently ſent Antiochus both mony and victuals, ſufficient to furniſh his army at the ſiege of Dora, ſo that in ſhort ſpace hee was accepted amongſt the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place beſieged, taken and ſlaine, after he had raigned three yeeres.

HE gouerned Iudæa for the space of eight yeeres, and was at length slaine at a banquet by the treacherie of Ptolomey his sonne in law; who being seised of Simons wife and his two children, and detaining them in prison, sent out certaine of his traine besides, to kill Iohn the third sonne surnamed Hircanus. But the yong man hauing some inkling of their drift, retired himselfe speedily into the Citie, and auoided the danger that they complotted against him; assuring himselfe of the good will of the people, in consideration of the benefits they had receiued at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare vnto Ptolomey; who intending to enter the Citie gates was sharply repulsed by the Citizens, for that they had already entertained Hircanus. knowing the power of naturall affection keepeth his mother and brethren prisoners, whippeth them on the wals, and threatneth to throw them downe.

WHEREVPON Ptolomey retyred vnto a certaine Castle situate beyond Iericho called Dagon: but Hircanus was made high Priest in his fathers stead: who after he had recommended himselfe to God by the firstling sacrifices that he offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make war vpon him. Now when he was fully addressed to besiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the aduantage in all other things; but only by the affection that he bare vnto his mother and his brethren, he was ouercome. For Ptolomey hauing taken them, and whipt them vpon the walles in all mens presence, threatned Hircanus that vnlesse he leuied his siege, he would cast them downe headlong from the top of the Castle: now wheras one way Hircanus had a great desire to enforce and surprise the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, thorow the desire that hee had to redeeme those, whom he loued, from the enemies tyranny. True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake hee should not giue ouer valiantly to assault the place; but that he should be the more encouraged to surprise the fortresse, and to lay hold vpon his enemy, and bee reuenged on the wrong that was offered vnto his deerest friends: alleadging that shee thought it better to die in the middest of a thousand torments, then that the enemy should escape vnpunished, who had beene so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hircanus heard his mother speake thus, hee was more furiously incensed to giue the assault: but as soone as he saw his mother so beaten and so sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and that feruent desire which hee before had to batter and beate downe the City, was presently alayd and cooled; and so the pitifull compassion on his mother, surmounted and ouercame his irefull affection of reuenge. Whilest thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the yeere of repose celebrated among the Iewes was come: For they obserued the seauenth yeere, as the seauenth day is obserued in the weeke; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was deliuered of this siege, who afterwards slue both Hircanus mother and brethren: which done he fled vnto Zeno surnamed Cotyla, who at that time tyrannized in the city of the Philadelphians. ANTIOCHVS the Deuout maketh warre against HYRCANVS, and vpon the receit of three hundreth talents contracteth alliance with him.

ANTIOCHVS calling to minde the manifold losses he had receiued by Simons meanes, inuaded Iury in the fourth yeere of his raigne, and in the first of Hyrcanus gouernment, which was in the hundreth sixtie and two Olympiade. And after he had spoiled all the country, he locked vp Hyrcanus within the Citie of Ierusalem, which he had besieged with seuen campes; yet with no aduantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the walles, as in respect B of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his campe; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of raine, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of Aprill. On the North side also where there is a great Plaine, Antiochus caused one hundred towers to be erected euery one three stages hie, on which he planted certaine companies of armed souldiers; who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the meanes of a double and deepe trench, tooke from them all their commodities. They on their side made often sallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the enemie on the sodaine, they made a great slaughter: but if they were discouered, they retired souldier-like. But Hyrcanus considering the great number of people that were in the Citie, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any seruice, hee diuided those that were vnfit for warre and sent them out of the Citie, retaining onely those with him, who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them C not to haue free liberty to depart; so that wandering here and there betweene the walles and the campe, they were consumed with famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affaires, they that were within had compassion of their countrimen, and drew them within the walles, and entertained them within the Citie. At this time Hyrcanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seuen daies, by reason of the solemnity of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare vnto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Ierusalem of Bulls with guilded hornes, and vessels full of diuers odors, with other vessels of gold and siluer. Those that had the charge of the gates receiued the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the D Temple. Antiochus himselfe also gaue the souldiers certaine meates to grace their festiuall, shewing himselfe herein to be of a farre better disposition then Antiochus Epiphanes, who after he had taken the Citie, caused swines flesh to bee sacrificed vpon the Altar, and besprinkled the Temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the law of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled and conceiued a deadly hatred against him: but Antiochus of whom we speake at this present, was by all men called Deuout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the seruice of God.

Hyrcanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Embassadours vnto him, requiring him that hee would permit them to vse the ancient policy of their forefathers. Whereupon the King sequestring all those farre off from his company, who E counsailed him to destroy the Iewish nation, who liued apart and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckning of their words. And vnderstanding that all the conuersation of the Iewes was conformable vnto pietie, he answered the Embassadours, that if the besieged would yeelde vp their armes and pay the tributes of Ioppe, and the other Cities that were out of Iudæa, and would receiue a garrison, such as hee should appoint; hee would discharge them of this warre. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receiue a garrison, least they should be enforced to entertaine such with whom they could not conuerse; but in steede of the garrison they gaue pledges, and paid fiue hundreth talents of siluer, of which the King receiued three hundreth in hand, with the pledges; amongst which was Hyrcanus brother: and after he had beaten downe the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence; hee raised F the siege and departed. But Hyrcanus opening Dauids monument (who surpassed all other kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same: whereby he tooke occasion first of all among the Iewes to entertaine a forraine army. There was also a friendship and confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the Citie with all his armie, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same: And that which is more, Antiochus hauing enterprised an exploit against the Parthians, Hyrcanus marched also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witnes hereof, writing after this manner ner, in his Historie: Antiochus erected a trophee neere the floud Lycus, after he had ouercom Indates Generall of the army of the Parthians, and aboad there two daies at Hircanus the Iewes request, by reason of a solemne feast at that time, in which it was not lawfull for the Iewes to trauel, wherein he is no waies mistaken. For the feast of Pentecost was at that present the next day after the Sabboth, and it is not lawfull for vs neither in our Sabboths nor feasts to iourney any waies. Antiochus fighting against Arsaces King of the Parthians lost the greater part of his army, and was himselfe slaine. His brother Demetrius succeeded him in the kingdome of Syria, whom Arsaces had put in prison at such time as Antiochus came into the kingdome of the Parthians, as wee haue declared heretofore in an other place.

CHAP. XVII.

HIRCANVS leadeth his army into Syria.

HIRCANVS hearing newes of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to finde them disfurnished both of garrisons and meanes of defence, as in effect it came to passe. He therefore tooke the Citie of Medaba at the end of sixe moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards hee seized Samega, and the Cities thereabout: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the module of the Temple of Ierusalem (which Alexander the Great permitted Sanaballath to build in fauour of his sonne in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Iaddus, as we haue heretofore declared) which Temple was laid desolate two hundreth yeeres after it was builded. Hircanus also tooke certaine fortresses and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, vnder this condition, that they should consent to bee circumcised, and to liue according to the lawes and religion of the Iewes. They thorow the desire they had to liue in the place where they were borne, submitted themselues to be circumcised, and to liue according to the customes and ordinances of the Iewes; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Iewes.

The Idumæans conquered by Hircanus admit circumcision, and the lawes of the Iewes.

Whilest thus Hircanus was high Priest, hee thought good to renewe the amitie betwixt the Iewes and the Romanes; and to this effect he sent an embassage with letters vnto the Senate. As soone as the Senate had receiued his letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing: Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the fielde of Mars the eight day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which „ Simon the sonne of Dositheus, Apollonius the sonne of Alexander, Diodorus the sonne of Iason, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Embassadours by the people of the Iewes, „ haue proposed; who haue dealt with vs as touching the confederation and amity that this nation had with the Romans, and haue likewise conferred as touching the affaires of estate, namely, „ that Ioppe and the ports thereof, Gazara and the fountaines thereunto belonging, and those other Cities of the countrey, which Antiochus tooke from them, contrary to the decree of the „ Senate, should be restored vnto them: and that it may not be lawfull for the Kings souldiers, to „ passe thorow their countrey, neither any of those prouinces, that are vnder their gouernment: and „ that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this warre, contrarie to the arrest „ and decree of the Senate, should be declared void, to the end that the embassadors sent in the Se-

It hath beene held „ conuenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation „ with men of so good respect, sent vnto them by a nation so good and faithfull towards them. And „ as touching the letters, the answer was; that they should be written, at such time as the affaires „ of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would haue „ care that no iniury should bee offered them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded also to de- „ liuer the embassadours money out of the common purse to beare their charges home into their „ countrey: and thus did Fanius dismisse the Embassadours of the Iewes after he had giuen them „ siluer out of the common treasury, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should „ conduct them, and giue them assured conuoy to returne into their countrey. And this was the „ estate of the affaires during Hircanus Priesthood.

But

A But King Demetrius being ſharpely whetted to make war againſt Hircanus, could haue neither time nor occaſion to exploit the ſame, by reaſon that both the Syrians and his men of war were ſcarcely well affected towards him, becauſe of his wickednes of life. CHAP. XVIII.

How ANTIOCHVS the Cyzicenian came to the reliefe of the Samaritanes: and how being conquered, he fled away.

The yeere of the world, 3854. before Chriſts Natiuity. 110.

FOR which cauſe he drew forth his army againſt Samaria (which was a ſtrong City) and is at this day called Sebaſte, becauſe it was reedified by Herod, as wee will make manifeſt in time and place conuenient. Hee therefore began to beſiege and batter the ſame with all diligence; animated thereunto, becauſe of the extreame hate he bare the Samaritanes, in that Hircanus beſiegeth Samaria.

E onely to pleaſe the Kings of Syria they had offered many grieuous outrages to the Mariſſens, who were extracted from, and allied with the Iewes. Hee therefore made a trench round about the City, with a double wall of eighty ſtounds, and committed the generall command of this ſiege to his ſonnes Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſo diligently and valiantly behaued themſelues, that the Samaritanes being ouerpreſſed with extreame famine, were conſtrained to eate ſuch things as were vnuſuall and vnaccuſtomed amongſt men: and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenian to their reſcous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulſed by Ariſtobulus ſouldiers, and being purſued by the two brethren as farre as Scythopolis, he hardly eſcaped; and they returning to their ſiege, freſhly aſſaulted and beſieged the Samaritans within their owne wals: So that once more they were conſtrained to ſend Embaſſadors to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie; who ſent vnto Ptolomey Lathyrus for about ſome ſixe thouſand men of warre, who furniſh-

F ed him with them contrary to his mothers minde, who therefore had almoſt thruſt him out of his dominion. As ſoone as he had receiued them, he made a roade into Hircanus countrey, and ſpoiled and forraged the ſame as farre as Ægypt. For he durſt not bid him battell hand to hand, becauſe he had not competent forces; but thought that in ſpoiling the countrey he might cauſe them to leuy the ſiege, & forſake Samaria: but after he had loſt a great number of his men by diuers ambuſcadoes of his enemies, he went vnto Tripoli, committing the generall charge of that warre to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his his captaines. This Callimander more rashly then G wisely attempting to set vpon the enemy was himselfe slaine, and his souldiers discomfited. And Epicrates giuen ouer to couetousnes did openly yeeld vp Scythopolis and other Cities into the hands of the Iewes: so that it was impossible for either of them to leuy the siege. Finally, after that Hircanus had continued his siege before the City for the space of one whole yeere, hee became master of the same: and not contenting himselfe with the surprisall hereof, he vtterly destroied it, enforcing the riuers thorow the midst thereof; yea he ruined the same in such sort, that the mud and soile both of the water and earth tooke away all the appearance of the Citie; so that it seemed as if it had neuer beene. Of this Hircanus there is a certaine incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his high priesthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the very same day wherein his sons fought against Antiochus the Cyzicenian, whilest being himselfe alone, he offered incense in the temple, that he heard a voice, saying, that his H two sons had at that present ouercome Antiochus: all which he incontinently signified vnto the people at the gate of the temple; and according as he had said, so it came to passe. See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

Epicrates corrupted with money, selleth Scythopolis and other places to the Iewes.

Hircanus taketh Samaria.

Hircanus is foretold by a voice in the temple, of his sons victory.

About this very instant likewise, the affaires of the Iewes prospered not onely in Ierusalem and Iudæa, but also amongst the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus. For Queene Cleopatra rebelling against her sonne Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias the sonnes of that Onias, who had builded the temple in Heliopolis (according to the patterne of that in Ierusalem) her chieftaines. And hauing committed her army vnto their hands, shee acted nothing without their aduice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witnesseth, speaking I after this manner. Diuers of those who came with vs, and of those who had beene sent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, sodainly reuolted to Ptolomey: Onely the Iewes that were of Onias faction, remained constant in their duty, because the Queene made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their countrimen. Thus farre Strabo. This great felicity and prosperity of Hircanus mooued the Iewes to conceiue a hatred against him, and especially the Pharisees opposed themselues against him. These Pharisees were one of the sects of the Iewes (whereof we haue heretofore intreated) which sect was so great in credit with the common people, that when they deposed any thing, were it against the king or the high Priest, they were presently beleeued. Hircanus had beene one of their disciples, and was in like sort very much beloued of them. Hee therefore inuited them to a feast, and entertained them with all humanitie: and seeing that they K were set vpon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his minde, how that he desired nothing more then to be iust, and to square all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themselues taught. He therefore required them, that if they perceiued that he mistooke himselfe in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redresse the same. Whereupon all of them gaue testimony of his perfect vertue. Wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and such a one as delighted in mutiny, said vnto him: Since you desire to heare the truth, if so be you affect the estimation of a good man, giue ouer the place of priesthood, and content your selfe with the gouernment of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cause wherefore he should forsake the Priesthood? Because (saith he) that we haue heard say by our ancestors, that your mo- L ther was a captiue during the raign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithstanding was a false report.) Hircanus hearing this, was sore mooued against him; and also all other of the Pharisees, who were assistant in that place. Amongst the rest there was a certaine man called Ionathan, of the order of the Sadduces (who maintaine an opposite opinion against the Pharisees) who was an inward and deere friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the iniurious speeches that Eleazar had spoken by him, who told him that (as he thought) Eleazar had spoken these words by the publike consent of the Pharisees; and that he might discouer the same most manifestly, if he enquired of them what punishment Eleazar had deserued for speaking after this sort. Hircanus therefore questioned with the Pharisees as concerning his punishment, telling them that hee should very well perceiue, that this iniury had not beene pronounced by the common consent of M them all, if they condemned the offender to suffer a punishment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, that he ought to be punished by imprisonment and scourging, for (said they) an iniurie done in word required no capitoll punishment: and to speake vprightly, they in their thinking censured seuerely enough of this fault, for that the Pharisees are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any question of punishment. But Hircanus was sore offended with this their answer, and imagined that this Eleazar had spoken after this manner by the

This diſpleaſure and conceiued diſlike of his, did Ionathan aggraUate to the vttermoſt; and handled the matter in ſuch ſort, that he drew Hyrcanus to forſake the Phariſees, and to ſubſcribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, aboliſhing their ordinances, and cauſing them to be ſharpely puniſhed that obſerued the ſame. Theſe practiſes of Hircanus incenſed the people againſt him and his ſons. But hereof we will ſpeake in another place. At this preſent I will declare how the Phariſees haue made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the lawes of Moſes: for which cauſe the Sect of the Sadduces reiecteth them, affirming that they ought to keepe the written ordinances, and not to obſerue thoſe that are grounded vpon the tradition of the fathers: And great diſpute and diſſenſions haue beene raiſed among them vpon this occaſion, becauſe the richer ſort onely, and not the baſer ſort of people, cleaued to the Sadduces: but the Phariſees had the com-
B munalty on their ſides. But of theſe two ſorts, and of the Eſſeans, I haue more exactly intreated in my ſecond booke of the warres of the Iewes. But Hircanus finally appeaſed this mutiny, and liued afterwards in much peace and happineſſe, and after hee had moſt diſcreetly gouerned his Princedome for the ſpace of one and thirty yeeres he died; leauing fiue ſonnes behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts: the gift of gouernment; the gift of Prieſthood; and the gift of prophecy. For God ſpake vnto him diuers times by Oracles, and Reuelations, and gaue him the knowledge of things to come; which he in ſuch ſort foretold, that he declared that his two eldeſt ſonnes ſhould not poſſeſſe the principalitie any long time: whoſe ende it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſet downe in what manner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may be the better knowne.

CHAP. XIX.

ARISTOBVLVS obtaineth the gouernment, and firſt of all placeth the Kingly Diademe on his head.

AFTER the death of their Father, Ariſtobulus the eldeſt of his ſonnes determined to exchange the principality into an abſolute eſtate of a kingdome: and the better to attaine thereunto, hee firſt of all ſet the Diademe vpon his head, foure hundreth eighty and one yeeres and three moneths, ſince the people of the Iewes were deliuered from the ſeruitude of D Babylon, and led againe into their countrey. And for that Ariſtobulus amongſt all his other brethren, loued Antigonus beſt of all, who was the neereſt vnto him in age; he accepted him as a companion in the gouernment of the kingdome: but as touching the reſt, he ſhut them vp in priſon. He locked vp his mother likewiſe, who had contended with him as concerning the gouernment (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her diſpoſition) and ſo farre extended his cruelty, that he famiſhed her to death in priſon. After he had thus handled his mother, hee ſlue his brother Antigonus alſo; whom hee pretended to loue aboue all the reſt, and whom (as hee made ſhew) hee had made partner of his kingdome. From whom he eſtranged himſelfe, by reaſon of ſome ſlanders and falſe accuſations raiſed vp againſt him; which at the firſt he gaue no credit to, both for that the friendſhip which hee bare vnto him, made him ſlightly reſpect the ſame, as alſo
E for that he imagined that he was enuiouſly ſlandered. It came to paſſe, that Antigonus, returning vpon a certaine time from the armie with great magnificence, about the time of the feaſt of Tabernacles, chanced to repaire thither at that very time, wherein Ariſtobulus hapned to fall ſicke. Antigonus intending to celebrate the ſolemnitie aſcended the Temple in great brauery, attended by ſome of his army, to make his ſpeciall prayers for his brothers health. Whereupon certaine malicious wretches, deſirous to breake the concord that was betweene them, made vſe of this occaſion, and of Antigonus magnificent pompe and good fortune; and came vnto the King, amplifying vnto him in malicious words, what pompe and maieſtie hee had ſhewed in that ſolemnitie, telling him that in theſe his actions, hee demeaned himſelfe in no ſort like a priuate man; but that all his actions were leuelled at a royaltie: finally, that his intent was to enter the F kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that hee made his account that ſince hee might bee King alone, it was a great ſimplicitie for him to haue a companion. But Ariſtobulus although hee would very hardly bee induced to beleeue theſe reports; yet notwithſtanding beeing deſirous both to extinguiſh the ſuſpicion, and to prouide for his owne ſecuritie, hee diſpoſed certaine of his guard in a darke and priuie place vnder ground, and lodged himſelfe in a certaine tower called Antonia, commanding that no man ſhould offer violence, except to thoſe who entred armed: Giuing a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entered armed, he ſhould be ſlaine.

Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repaire vnto him without weapons. Which G when the Queene and they that complotted the murther of Antigonus vnderstood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that hee made warlike preparation and furniture for warre) that in that estate and pompe, and in those royall and warlike accoustrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witnesse of his braue furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foote toward Aristobulus, to shew himselfe in that brauerie: and when hee came right ouer against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very darke, the Kings guard slue him.

By this accident a man may easily coniecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of enuy and slander, and that there is not any thing that may sooner breake off the good will and amitie amongst brethren, then these two passions. And aboue all, there is an occasion H offered vs of great wonder in respect of one that was called Iudas, of the sect of the Essеans; who in all those things that he prophecied, varied in no sort from the truth. He seeing Antigonus come vp into the Temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the methode of prophecy) that hee was wearie of his life, because Antigonus securitie argued the vanity of his prophecy, by which hee had foretold, that that very day hee should bee slaine at Stratons tower; whereas the place where hee should be murthered was sixe hundreth stounds off, and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to haue made a false prediction. Whilest he debated his doubts after this manner, and was wholly ouercome with choller, newes was brought that Antigonus was slaine in a certaine place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name I with that other that standeth neere the sea, which was afterward called Cæsarea; which ambiguitie troubled the Diuiner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himselfe in that he had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grieuous sickenesse, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruell murther: so that with grieuous agony and torment hee vomited bloud, as if all his entrals had beene torne in sunder. This bloud so vomited by him, it fortuned (in mine opinion) by the diuine prouidence of God, that a certaine seruant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foote hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had beene soiled with the bloud of slaughtered Antigonus. By which meanes they that beheld the same, raised a great crie, exclaiming that the Page had shed the bloud in a conuenient place. Aristobulus hearing this out-cry demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man addressed himselfe to satisfie him, he was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and neuer a man for feare of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon hee altogether dismayed and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth abundant teares, and loaden with grieuous sighes, began to cry out in this manner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sodaine punishment of my brothers murther pursueth mee: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detaine my soule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and brother? Why dost thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my bloud, poured out so many times to those, whom I haue so traiterously slaine? While he pronounced these words, he died, after he had raigned one yeere. L He was called Philelles, that is to say, a louer of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his countrey many wayes, and subdued the Itureans, and ioyned the greater part of the countrey, to Iudæa; and had constrained them likewise, who should remaine in that countrey, to be circumcised, and to liue according to the lawes of the Iewes, he died thus miserably. Hee was by nature curteous and very shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this manner, by the authoritie of Timagenes; This was a curteous man, and profitable to his countrimen the Iewes in many things: for he enlarged their countrey, and conquered a part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he tied vnto him by the bond of circumcision.

The exploits of ALEXANDER King of the Iewes.

The yeere of the world, 3863. before Christs Nativity, 101.

WHEN Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greekes called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we haue heretofore declared, he had shut vp prisoners) and made Iannæus (who was called Alexander) king; who both in age and modestie surpassed all the other brethren; but such mishap had he, that from his birth day vpward, his father had conceiued so great a hate against him, that he neuer admitted him to his presence so long as he liued. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this. When as Hircanus loued Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sonnes, with most intire affection, God appeared vnto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Wherupon God presented vnto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceiued that he should be heire of all his goods; and so much preuailed displeasure with him, that as soone as he was borne, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished and brought vp in that place. But God hath apparantly prooued that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe king: and as for the other, who resolued himselfe to liue in idlenes and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

Hedio & Kuffinus, chap. 19. Salome surnamed Alexandra Aristobulus his wife maketh Iannæus Alexander king.

Alexander executeth the one brother that affected the crowne, and honoreth the other.

After that hee had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, hee led foorth his army against Ptolemais: and hauing obtained the vpper hand in the battell, he couped vp the men within their City, and afterward besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the Cities of the sea coast, these two onely, namely Ptolemais and Gaza remained as yet vnconquered, and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seized of the tower of Straton and Dora where he gouerned. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizicenus were thus at debate and warre the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were trauailed with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army hee had vnder him, and gaue them some succours, by reason that (since these two kings were whetted with intestine troubles and warres) he cast how to aduance himselfe to the crowne and soueraignty. For these two kings seemed to neglect their owne dangers, resembling herein those wrastlers, who though being wearied with fight; yet are ashamed to submit vnto their aduersary, but giue themselues a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had were in the kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Isle of Cyprus at that time (whether he retired himselfe after he had been driuen out of his kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadours as vnto their allie, requiring him to come and deliuer them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadours perswaded him, that if he would passe into Syria, he should haue both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreouer, they assured him that the Sidonians and diuers others would second him: and by this meanes so encouraged him with promises, that he hasted himselfe to set saile.

Zoilus tyrant of Straton and Dora.

But in the meane space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authority with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazard themselues in some vncertaine danger, wherewith the Iewes threatned them, then to deliuer themselues into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest seruitude. And moreouer, not onely to sustaine a present warre, but that which is more, an imminent warre from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should leuy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her selfe also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more returne againe to Cyprus; whereas they were to expect no lesse but extreame danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, vnderstood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemais; and perceiuing that vpon his encamping, they of the City admitted not his embassadors, neither in any sort gaue eare vnto them, he was wondrously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come vnto him, requiring him to yeeld them assistance, for that their country was destroied by the Iewes, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais, for feare of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his owne countrey, he began to vse this stratageme. For couertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly hee made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to giue him foure hundreth talents of siluer, prouided that he wonld deliuer him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him vnto the Iewes. Ptolomey hauing made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he vnderstood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went and besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertaine him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces, he departed with the rest, to enter vpon and spoile the countrey of Iudæa. Alexander perceiuing Ptolomies intent, assembled about fiftie thousand fighting men of his owne countrey, (or as some historians haue written, eightie thousand) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who sodainly setting vpon Azoch a citie of Galile on a Sabbath day, tooke it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantity of other bootie.

CHAP. XXI.

How PTOLOMEY LATHYRVS fought against ALEXANDER, and obtained the victory.

HE afterwards set vpon Sephor a city neere vnto Azoch, from whence he departed with the losse of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him neere vnto Iordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right ouer against the enemy. He had in his vantgard eight thousand men, whom he called Combattants by the hundreths: who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomies foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiuing themselues to bee inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazard battell. But Philostephanus the campe-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to passe the floud, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the riuer hn their backes, hee should bee the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselues from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought, with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiuing that Alexanders army had the better, he tooke a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselues. The wing of the Iewes vantguard that saw themselues freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so farre were those that marched next them, from yeelding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomies side behaued themselues farre otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarraied them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their armes with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slaine in the battell (Timagenes saith, fiftie thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and othersome fled vnto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, hee ouerranne and spoyled the whole countrey, and in the euening he quartered himselfe in certaine villages of Iudæa, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into peeces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod to eate the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, and retired to their owne habitations, should know that their enemies would eate mens flesh; that by this meanes they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselues after this manner, as I haue declared. And Ptolomey tooke Ptolemais also by force, as I haue made knowne elsewhere.

But Cleopatra perceiuing how her sonne prospered, and how hee had spoiled Iewry without any preiudice, and subiected the city of Gaza to his command: shee concluded with her selfe, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that manner, considering it was vpon the borders of Egypt, whose soueraignty he affected. For which cause, she sodainly marched out against him, with an army both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Iewes; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Isle of Coos, with her nephewes, and her testament, to be reserued and kept there in safety. And after she had commanded

A manded her ſonne Alexander to ſet ſaile toward Phœnicia, with a great nauy, becauſe the inhabitants of that countrey were reuolted from her obeiſance: ſhe her ſelfe departed and came to Ptolemais, and beſieged it, when ſhee perceiued that they refuſed to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haſte to depart out of Syria, and to enter Ægypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he ſhould find the countrey diſfurniſhed of men of warre. But his purpoſe failed him. At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatras armie, died in Cœloſyria, being in purſuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra hauing tydings of her ſonnes enterpriſe, and that the ſucceſſe and fortune he expected in Ægypt had failed him, ſhee ſent part of her armie to driue him out of the countrey; ſo that he was enforced to returne backe againe out of Ægypt, and to go and ſpend his winter at Gaza. Meane while Cleopatra beſieged and tooke the Citie of Ptolemais, whither Alexander reſorted vnto her, with great preſents, and an anſwerable reſpect vnto his fortune, who
B had beene ſo vntowardly handled by Ptolomey, hauing now no other recourſe left him but to her fauour and aſſiſtance. Vpon his arriuall, certaine of her familiars counſelled her to lay hands on him, and to ſeize the countrey: and not to permit that ſo great a number of Iewes, and they ſo valiant men, ſhould become ſubiects vnto one man. But Ananias gaue her counſell to the contrarie, alleadging that ſhe ſhould commit an act of great iniuſtice, if ſhe ſhould depoſe him, who was her allie, from the gouernment; who was beſide that, very neerely allied vnto her. For (ſaid he) I would you ſhould know, that by committing this wrong, you ſhal raiſe in all the reſt of the Iewes a hainous hatred againſt you. Cleopatra conforming her ſelfe according to Ananias counſell, reſolued with her ſelfe to offer Alexander no iniurie; but in ſteed thereof, ſhe entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a Citie of Cœloſyria. Now when Alexander perceiued, that he
C was diſcharged of the feare whichhe had conceiued in reſpect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Cœloſyria, and after ſixe moneths ſiege, tooke Gadara: he tooke ſhortly after Amath alſo (which is a great fortreſſe belonging to the inhabitants about Iordan) where Theodore the ſonne of Zenon had hoorded vp the richeſt and goodlieſt part of his ſubſtance: who ſurpriſing the Iewes at vnawares, ſlew about ten thouſand of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

Againſt him Apollodotus Captaine of the Gazeans made a ſally by night, and entred the campe of the Iewes, hauing onely with him two thouſand ſtrange ſouldiers, and one thouſand of his owne followers. And as long as the night laſted, the Gazeans had the vpper hand, becauſe that they made their enemies belieue that Ptolomey was come to their reſcue, and to aſſault the Iewes afreſh: but as ſoone as the day appeared, and this opinion was found falſe, as ſoone as the Iewes were aſſured of the truth, they turned backe vpon them, and charging the Gazeans, they ſlew about ſome one thouſand fighting men of them.

For Lyſimachus his brother conceiued a iealouſie againſt him, by reaſon of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him; and hauing ſlaine him, & gathered thoſe fighting men that he might, he yeelded vp the Citie vnto Alexander, who at the firſt made a peaceable entrie, but afterwards diſperſed his ſouldiers, and gaue them licence to execute all hoſtilitie againſt the Citizens: ſo that they acted their crueltie in euery place, and ſlew many of the Gazeans: Neither died theſe citizens vnreuenged, but ſo manfully behaued they themſelues, that they butchered no leſſe

Againſt theſe two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant reſiſt, but died very ſhortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to ſuccour the Queene of the Galadenians, who made warre againſt the Parthians, he died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip poſſeſſed Syria, as hereafter ſhall be declared. As for Alexander, a domeſticall ſedition was raiſed againſt him; for the people aroſe and mutined at ſuch time, as he aſſiſted at the Altar to ſolemnize the feaſt of Tabernacles, and during the time that he intended the ſacrifice, they caſt Citrons at him: for (as wee haue declared elſe-where) the Iewes haue this cuſtome, that on the feaſt of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palme, and of Citrons. They vpbraided him alſo with many iniurious ſpeeches, reproching him, that hee had bin priſoner in warre; and that he was alſo vnworthy of the honour of the Prieſthood. Whereupon, he being mooued by theſe diſgraces, ſlaughtered about ſixe thouſand men: and hauing made an incloſure of wood about the temple and the altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Prieſts) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained alſo certaine ſtrange ſouldiers Piſidians and Cilicians. For in that hee was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no vſe of them. I

And beſides this his laſt miſhap, the people hated him, againſt whom he made warre for the ſpace of ſixe yeeres, and ſlew at the leaſt fiftie thouſand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit theſe hainous debates between them, the more grieuous diſpleaſure conceiued they againſt him, becauſe of the inconuenients they had ſuffered: ſo that when he demanded of them what they would haue him to doe: they all of them with one voice cried out, that he ſhould kill himſelfe. DEMETRIVS EVCÆRVS ouercommeth ALEXANDER in battell.

HE comming onward with his army, and taking with him thoſe who had incited him to the enterpriſe, came and encamped neere vnto the Citie of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together ſome twentie thouſand Iewes (whom hee knew to be well affected towards him) with ſixe thouſand and two hundreth mercenary ſouldiers and ſtrangers, marched forward againſt Demetrius, who led with him three thouſand horſemen, and fortie thouſand footmen. Both on the one and the other ſide there fell out many ſubtill ſtratagems: the one of them ſtriuing on the one ſide to inueigle and withdraw the forraine ſouldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himſelfe to reconcile thoſe Iewes that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other preuailed ought at all by theſe deuices: ſo that finally they were driuen to decide their quarrell by the ſword: in which encountry Demetrius had the vpper hand. For al the ſtrangers that were on Alexanders ſide were euery one hew'd in peeces, after they had made ſufficient proofe both of their faith & valor. There died alſo many of Demetrius M

But after that Alexander had fled vnto the mountaines, diuers Iewes (to the number of ſixe thouſand) in commiſeration of his deſperate eſtate, and thorow the feare they had of Demetrius, reſorted vnto him; which when the Conquerer heard, he retired himſelfe. After this, the Iewes made war againſt Alexander, & in diuers loſſes which they receiued, there dyed a great number of them in diuers combates: Finally, after he had cloſed vp the moſt ſtrongeſt amongſt them in the City of Bethom, he beſieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them vnder his ſubiection, he carried them to Ieruſalem, where he perpetrated an vnſpeakeable and cruell murther. For whil'ſt he banquetted with his concubines, in the ſight of them all, he commanded eight hundreth of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eies whil'ſt they yet liued, he cauſed their wiues and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to reuenge himſelfe of thoſe wrongs which he had receiued: but he exceeded the bounds of humanity here-
B in, notwithſtanding they had rebelled againſt him, and reduced him into a moſt pitious eſtate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdome. For being not content to aſſaile and make war vpon him with their forces, they drew ſtrangers alſo in his countrey againſt him: and finally, they ouerpreſſed him in ſuch ſort, that hee was conſtrained to yeeld vp into the king of Arabias hands, the countries and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for feare leaſt they ſhould ioyne with the Iewes, and make warre againſt him; beſides other innumerable iniuries and outrages committed by them againſt him. This notwithſtanding it cannot be excuſed, but that he ouerſhot himſelfe herein; ſo that by reaſon of this ſo enormous cruelty, hee was called Thracidas, that is to ſay, as cruell as a Thracian: and this title continued amongſt the Iewes. The ſouldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thouſand, fled
C by night into ſtrong and ſure holds; and as long as Alexander liued, they were in exile. But at the laſt, after he was deliuered of all theſe troubles, hee liued in quiet, and gouerned his kingdome peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Iudæa to Berœa, beſieged his brother Philip with ten thouſand footmen, and one thouſand horſe. But Straton Lord of Berœa, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces gouernor of the Parthians, vnto his helpe; who repairing vnto him with great forces, beſieged Demetrius in his owne trenches, in which they ſo incloſed him by continuall ſhooting of darts, and want of water, that they conſtrained him, and thoſe that were with him, to ſubmit themſelues to their mercy. When D as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were ſeized of Demetrius, they ſent him priſoner to Mithridates, who at that time was king of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp, were ſuffered to depart with the ſafety of their liues and baggage, and to returne to Antioch. But Mithridates king of Parthia honoured Demetrius by all meanes poſſible, vntill ſuch time as he was ſurprized with a ſickneſs, whereof he died. Incontinently after the battell, Philip came into Antioch, and hauing obtained the kingdome ruled ouer Syria.

The exploits of ANTIOCHVS DYONISIVS againſt Iudæa.

E AFTER this, Antiochus called Dionyſius (who was Philips brother) came into Damaſco to obtaine the ſoueraignetie therein, and therein in ſhort ſpace accompliſhing his affaires, got poſſeſſion of the crowne. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readineſſe to inuade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damaſco with great ſpeede, and made him ſurrender vp the Citie, both by the meanes of Mileſius whom Antiochus had left gouernour in the Caſtle; as alſo by the conſent of the Citizens themſelues. But Philip ſhewed himſelfe vngrateful toward Mileſius, performing nothing of that which he had promiſed him, at ſuch time as he deliuered him the Citie; becauſe his intent was, that the world ſhould thinke that the feare of his power, and not Mileſius fauour, was the cauſe of the ſurpriſall of Damaſco. Which act of his drew him into ſuſpicion with Mileſius, and was the cauſe that he loſt the City againe. For F departing from thence to exerciſe himſelfe at tilt, Mileſius lockt the gates againſt him, and kept the City for Antiochus. Who hauing intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very inſtant led his army into Iudæa, in which there were eight thouſand footmen, and eight hundreth horſemen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deepe trench from Caparſabe (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the ſea of Ioppe (which was the onely ſtreight wherby he might be aſſailed) and made a wall furniſhed with wooden towers, with their courts of guard, diſtant the one from the other an hundreth and fiftie furlongs, to keepe keepe backe Antiochus. But he fired all these his fortifications, and made his armie passe into Arabia thorow this streight. The King of Arabia retired vpon the first assault; but afterwards he presently came into the field with ten thousand horsemen: whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onset lost his life (yet with victorie) whil'st he sought to succour a company of his men that were hardly laid to. After Antiochus death, his armie retired to the borough of Cana, where diuers of them died for hunger. G

After him Aretas raigned in Cœlosyria, who was called vnto that kingdome by those that held Damasco and hated Ptolomey the sonne of Mennæus. Aretas led his armie into Iewry, and got a victorie against Alexander neere to Adida: which done, hee retired out of Iudæa, vpon a composition made betweene them. Moreouer, once more Alexander marched towards the Citie of Dion, and tooke the same. And afterwards hee led his army against Essa, where Zeno had hoorded vp his chiefest riches: and before he assailed the fortresse, hee inuironed the place with three huge walles, which he builded round about it, and hauing taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, and Seleucia: which when he had ouercome, he made himselfe master of a valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortresse of Gamala. And obiecting many crimes against Demetrius the Lord of those places, he dispossessed him of his gouernment. Finally, after he had made warre for the space of three whole yeeres, he returned into his countrey; where the Iewes entertained him willingly by reason of the happy exploits which he had atchieued. About the same time the Iewes were already possessed of the cities of Syria, Idumæa, and Phœnicia; of the tower of Straton, Apollonia, Ioppe, Iamnia, Azoth, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura, all which were neere vnto the Sea: and in the firme land on the on side of Idumæa, as Adora, Marissa, and all Samaria; the mounts Carmel and Itabyr; and herewith Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, Gabala; and of Moab, Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Orona, Telithon, and Zara; Antona of Cilicia and Pella. After this, King Alexander fell sicke, by the meanes of his serfeit and drunkennesse; and for the space of three yeers he was trauelled with a quartane ague. This notwithstanding, he was alwaies in the campe, vntil such time as being wearied with trauailes, he died in the marches of the countrey of the Gerasens, at such time as hee besieged Ragaba (which is a Castle situate on the other side of Iordan. The Queene perceiuing that he was at deaths doore, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recouerie; she began to weepe and lament, and to beate her breasts, because both she and her children were likely now to be left desolate, and in these words she bemoaned her selfe vnto him. To whom wilt thou leaue both me and thy children in the estate, wherein we be? or why should we suruiue or liue one after another, considering that thou assuredly knowest, that the heart of thy people are estranged from vs? Hereupon the king comforted her, and gaue her this counsel, that if she would assure the kingdome both vnto her and her children, she should behaue her selfe according to his direction: which was, first to conceale his death, and not to suffer his men of warre to haue notice thereof, vntill such time as she had taken this Castle. Which done, he aduised her to repaire to Ierusalem in pompe, and triumph; and that being there, shee should bestow some authority vpon the Pharisees, who should recouer her praises, and obtaine her fauour amongst the people. For (said he) these kind of men are in great estimation and credit with the people, and can doe much hurt vnto those they hate, and further them in like sort very mightily towards whom they are wel affected: For the people easily beleeueth them, when they vrge ought against any man, notwithstanding it be of enuie; and that he himselfe also had incurd the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them. Alexanders death.

Chap. XXIIII.

After Alexanders death, his wife Alexandra gouerneth the kingdome.

After that Alexandra had taken the Caſtle of Ragaba, ſhee conferred with the Phariſees, according to her husbands counſell, and committed vnto their diſcretion, not onely that which concerned her husbands obſequies, but alſo the gouernment of the B kingdome: whereby ſhee not onely appeaſed the diſpleaſure which before time they had conceiued againſt Alexander, but alſo obtained their good will and amitie. They therefore came and declaimed amongſt the people, making an oration of the acts and geſts of Alexander, complaining euery where that they had loſt a good King, and by the inforced praiſes that they vſed, they incited the people to great griefe and lamentation: ſo that they buried him with more magnificence, then any King that raigned before him. This Alexander left two ſonnes behind him, the one called Hircanus; the other Ariſtobulus; and by his teſtament committed the gouernment of the kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affaires, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Ariſtobulus, who was the yonger, was both actiue and fit for gouernment. The people were well affected towards Alexandra, becauſe ſhe had C manifeſtly expreſſed how greatly ſhe miſliked her husbands miſgouernment.

Hircanus and Ariſtobulus Alexanders ſonnes.

Shee appointed Hircanus high Prieſt (both in regard of his age, as alſo for that by nature hee was compoſed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the diſpoſition of the Phariſees, commanding the people to obey and ſerue them. Shee alſo renued and confirmed that which Hircanus had diſannulled, and the Phariſees (according to the cuſtomes of their forefathers) had introduced; ſo that ſhe bare the name, and the Phariſees the authoritie royall. For they reſtored ſuch as were baniſhed, to their eſtates, and deliuered priſoners; and in all things they demeaned themſelues like great Lords, Alexandra alſo for her part vndertooke the care of the commonweale, and kept a great number of ſouldiers in pay, and increaſed her power in ſuch ſort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and deliuered the hoſtages and pledges of peace. All the D countrey was at quiet, onely the Phariſees troubled the Queene, perſwading her to put thoſe to death, who had counſelled King Alexander to put thoſe eight hundreth to death (of whom wee haue ſpoken before) and they themſelues afterwards ſlew one that was called Diogenes, and after him diuers others, one by one: vntill ſuch time as thoſe in authoritie came vnto the royall palace, accompanied with Ariſtobulus (who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, and who if the occaſion were offered, made ſhew that he would not permit his mother to gouerne after that manner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had beene, to expreſſe their dutie and loyaltie which they ought to their deceaſed maſter; and how for that cauſe they had beene greatly honoured by him; requiring her that ſhee would not vtterly fruſtrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their ſeruice, that now they that had E eſcaped from the danger of their forraine enemies, were in their houſes murthered like beaſts by their priuate maligners, without any reliefe or ſuccours from any one. They furthermore vrged, that if their aduerſaries would content themſelues with thoſe that had ſlaine, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reaſon of the ſincere affection they bare vnto their Lords: but if they muſt needly as yet ſuffer the like, they required that they might haue licence to depart. For that they would not procure their ſafetie, otherwiſe then by her conſent: and would rather ſuffer a voluntary death neere vnto her royal palace, if they might not be ſpared: for that it would be a ſhame both for themſelues, and for the Queene, if by her toleration, thoſe, who had beene her deceaſſed husbands friends, ſhould be thus vexed by them which were his aduerſaries.

The Phariſies admitted to the adminiſtration of the commonweale, are greedy of reuenge.

Ariſtobulus and his followers accuſe the Phariſees of tyrannie.

That Aretas King of Arabia and other Princes, would be glad of this newes, to heare that ſhe ſhould eſtrange thoſe perſons farre from her, whoſe names haue beene dreadfull enen amongſt F thoſe neighbouring Kings who haue but heard the ſame. And if ſhe had reſolued to make more account of the Phariſees fauour, then of their ſeruice, they beſought her that ſhe would at leaſtwiſe diſtribute them in ſeuerall Caſtles, for that rather then any miſhap ſhould purſue their ſoueraigne Alexanders houſe, they were content to lead their liues in that contemptible and abiect condition. Whil'ſt thus they ſpake, and exclaimed on the ſoule of Alexander, praying him to haue compaſſion as well of thoſe that were already dead, as of thoſe who were in danger of their liues

But they themselues were the cause of their owne calamity, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a headstrong and ambitious woman to raigne ouer them, as if the king had no heires reserued to succeed him in the kingdome. The Queene vncertaine how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reseruing onely Hircania, Alexandrion, and Machæron, wherein the Princes mooueables and wealth was kept.

Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennæus, who was an il neighbour vnto that Citie: but he returned thence without atchieuing any memorable action. About the same time newes was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia inuaded Syria, with fiue hundreth thousand men of war, intending shortly to set vpon Iewry. This rumour affrighted the Queene, and all the H communaltie (and not without cause.) Whereupon shee sent Embassadors with many princely presents vnto Tigranes, who besieged the Citie of Ptolemais. (For Queene Selena, otherwise called Cleopatra, raigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadours met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to conceiue a good opinion of their Queene, and of all the whole nation of the Iewes: who receiued them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so farre to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and forraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this newes, returned backe I into his countrey.

The yeere of the world, 3894. before Christs Nativitie, 70.

After this, Queene Alexandra fell sicke of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus tooke occasion to entermeddle with the affaires of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie seruant, he repaired vnto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers gouernment, and now was the more affraid that if shee should happen to die, all her posteritie should be made subiect to the power of the Pharisees. For hee well perceiued how vnapt his elder brother was to gouerne the kingdome, vnto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefest Potentates K commanded, who entertained him with great ioy.

The next day, the Queene hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to worke some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently bin surprised by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queene and the whole nation were dismaied, fearing least hee should presently vsurpe the soueraignty; but aboue all they feared, least he should reuenge himselfe on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle, that adioyned the temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some fifteene daies he tooke L twentie and two forts, whether he made his retreats, and assembled an armie of souldiers, and leuied them amongst the Lords that inhabite Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwaies resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintaine and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the conformation of his Monarchie.

Aristobulus seizeth the castles, and great concourse of people resort to him.

Hereupon the ancient Iewes and Hircanus repaired vnto the Queene, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsell and good aduice touching the present affaires, because that Aristobulus her sonne was already well nigh Lord of the whole countrey, since hee had so many forts vnder his command: Furthermore, that it was inconuenient and vndecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding shee were grieuously sicke, but that the impendent M danger extorted the same. The Queene willed them to doe that which they thought should bee most profitable for the Common-weale; telling them that they had many meanes, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong; and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasurie: certifying them, that because shee knew that she had not long to liue, she had no more reason to take care of those affaires. Anon after shee had spoken thus, shee died; after shee had raigned nine yeeres, and liued in all seauentie and three yeeres. This woman was adorned with

CHAP. I.

How after the contention betweene the two brethren touching the Kingdome, it was agreed that ARISTOBVLVS ſhould be King, and HIRCANVS liue as a priuate man.

The yeere of the world. 3899. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 65.

WE haue already intreated in our former Booke both of the actes: and death of Queene Alexandra: it now remaineth at this preſent to proſecute and continue the ſequell of our Hiſtorie, to the end that we neither omit any thing thorow ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulneſſe. For they that make profeſſion I to write Hiſtories, and to recite ſuch things as are obſerued by antiquitie, ought not only ſtudiouſly to conforme their ſtyle, but alſo to beautifie the ſame with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the reader may conuerſe in their writings with the more delectation. But aboue all things they muſt haue an eſpeciall care ſo exactly to ſet downe the truth, that they, who know not how theſe things came to paſſe, may be the more duly and fitly informed.

The office and dutie of an Hiſtoriographer.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken vpon him the high Prieſthood, in the third yeere of the hundreth ſeuentie and ſeuenth Olympiade, and in the yeere that Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenſian) were conſuls at Rome: Ariſtobulus ſodainly vndertooke the warre againſt Hircanus, and fought with him neere vnto Iericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers ſubmitted themſelues of their owne accord to Ariſtobulus. Thorow which accident K
Hircanus was inforced to fly to the fortreſſe of the higher City, wherein Alexandra Ariſtobulus mother had impriſoned both his wife and children (as before this is ſpecified.) The reſt of the faction for feare of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themſelues within the enclo-ſure of the Temple, where they were beſieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their different was accorded in this manner, that Hircanus ſhould paſſe the remnant of his life without intermedling with affaires of eſtate, but ſhould onely intend his ſecurity and peace; and Ariſtobulus ſhould command the kingdome. This league was ratified betweene them in the temple, and confirmed with oathes, coniunction of hands and embraces, in the ſight of all the people: which being finiſhed, Ariſtobulus retired himſelfe into the palace; and Hircanus to Ariſtobulus lodging, to lead a priuate and quiet life.

CHAP. II.

Of the race of ANTIPATER, and how he is aduanced to high eſtate, and how HIRCANVS flieth to ARETAS King of Arabia.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11 Antipater the Idumæan Hircanus friend.

BVT a certaine friend of Hircanus (by nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being well monied, and by nature both factious and induſtrious, and thorow ambition but badly affected towards Ariſtobulus, the rather for that he affected Hircanus faction, began to ſtir much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damaſcene writeth of this man, that he was deſcen- M ded from the nobleſt amongſt thoſe Iewes who returned from out of Babylon into Iurie: but this he did of ſet purpoſe to gratifie Herod Antipaters ſonne, who by a caſualtie became afterwards King of the Iewes (as we will expreſſe hereafter in time and place conuenient.) This Antipater was at the firſt called Antipas; according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made Antipater of Iudæa, as Nicholas Damaſcenus implies, firſt called Antipas.

A made Gouernour of all Idumæa by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Aſcalonites, corrupting them, and inſinuating himſelfe into their fauours by diuers great preſents beſtowed vpon them. This yong Antipater conſidering with himſelfe what Ariſtobulus power was, and fearing leaſt ſome miſchiefe might befall him through the hatred the yong king had conceiued againſt him, he communicated with certaine of the greateſt reckoning amongſt the Iewes, and ſecretly and cunningly incenſed them againſt Ariſtobulus, telling them that they had done amiſſe, both to ſee and ſuffer Ariſtobulus to detaine the kingdome vniuſtly in his hands, and to diſpoſſeſſe his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. Hee likewiſe accoſted and founded Hircanus ordinarily with theſe words; telling him that he liued in danger of his life, and would doubtleſſe bee ouertaken
B except hee ſought his owne ſecurity, and fled his imminent perill: alleadging, that Ariſtobulus friends would neuer ceaſe to conſult how they might ſhorten his life, to the end that hee might liue in more ſecuritie. To theſe inſtigations of his, Hircanus gaue ſmall credit (for that of his owne nature he was curteous, and could not eaſily be induced or ſeduced by detractions) but this negligence and careleſneſſe in him, was the cauſe that hee was accounted a ſilly and abiect man. On the contrary ſide, Ariſtobulus was of a different and more heroicke nature, being more actiue in performance, and carefull preuention.

The yeare of the world, 3899. before Chriſts Natiuitie. 65.

Antipater inceenſeth the princes of the Iewes againſt Ariſtobulus.

Now although Antipater ſaw that Hircanus made ſmall account of his inſtigations; yet ceaſed he not daily to inuent and propoſe new ſurmiſes and accuſations, vrging Ariſtobulus hatred and practiſe to murther him: and ſo much preuailed hee by his importunitie, that at laſt hee perſwa-
C ded him to flie to Aretas king of Arabia, promiſing him that in ſo doing, he would giue him both aide and aſſiſtance. Hircanus hauing debated vpon theſe concluſions, at laſt thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined vpon Iewry.) Whereupon he firſt of all ſent Antipater to Aretas, to take aſſurance of him that hee ſhould not betray him into his enemies hands, if ſo be he ſhould ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and require his aſſiſtance. When as therefore Antipater had receiued this aſſurance from the king, he returned to Ieruſalem vnto Hircanus: and not long after that tooke him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great iourneies arriued at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall court. And for that hee was inwardly familiar with the King hee beſought him to reeſtabliſh him in the kingdome of Iewry, and wrought ſo much by his importunitie and the preſents which he gaue him, that hee perſwa-
D ded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promiſed, that if hee confirmed him againe in his royall dignitie, hee would vpon the recouery of his realme reſtore vnto him thoſe twelue Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are theſe that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Liuias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Nariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, Oryba.

ARISTOBVLVS beeing vanquiſhed, is purſued as farre as Ieruſalem.

E ARETAS induced by theſe promiſes, was content to ſend foorth an army againſt Ariſtobulus, and himſelfe in perſon conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thouſand men both on foote and horſe, and had the vpper hand of his enemy in ſuch ſort, as diuers after the attainment of this victory, of their owne accord ſubmitted themſelues to Hircanus: and Ariſtobulus perceiuing himſelfe to bee deſtitute of all his friends and followers fled vnto Ieruſalem. After him the king of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and beſieged him in the temple: In this ſiege the common people aſſiſted Hircanus, neither were there any but the prieſts only that ſtucke to Ariſtobulus ſide. Whereupon Aretas marſhalled the forces he had, and buſily ſet the army both of Iewes and Arabians about the ſiege. Whileſt theſe things were vnder theſe tearmes, the feaſt of vnleauened bread, which we call the paſſeouer, was at hand, and the princes of the Iewes forſaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a cer-
F taine man called Onias (ſuch a one who for his vertue was beloued of God, and in times paſt had by his deuout praiers and ſupplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God) hid himſelfe, perceiuing that this ſedition would be of ſome continuance. This man therefore being ſurpriſed and brought into the campe of the Iewes, they required him that as by his praiers he had obtained water; ſo at that time likewiſe he would by his imprecations incenſe God againſt Ariſtobulus, ann his accomplices. But whereas he contradicted and excuſed himſelfe, he was at laſt constrained by the people to performe their requeſt; ſo that ſtanding vp in the midſt of them he G ſpake after this manner. O God, King of the whole world, ſince they who are at this preſent here with me are thy people, and thoſe that are beſieged are thy Prieſts; I humbly beſeech thee, that when they ſhall require thee to be incenſed againſt their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewiſe they ſhall prouoke thee againſt the other, thou wilt not reſpect them. Hereup-on, a certaine ſort of reprobate ſouldiers amongſt the Iewes, hearing theſe words of his, ſtoned him to death: But God incontinently puniſhed this cruelty in them; and the murther of Onias ſo curſedly perpetrated, was reuenged by this meanes which enſueth. At ſuch time as Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts were beſieged, the feaſt of Eaſter or the Paſſeouer fell out, during which time it was an vſuall cuſtome amongſt the Iewes to honour God with many ſacrifices: Now for that they who were with Ariſtobulus, had not any beaſts to offer vp in ſacrifice, they required the other Iewes which were without, that they might haue ſome deliuered vnto them for their mony. H Wherunto it was anſwered, that if they would giue one thouſand drachmes for euery head, they ſhould haue ſome deliuered vnto them. To this demand of theirs, Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts that were with him, willingly condeſcended, and let downe the prefixed price and deliuered the ſame from the wall: but the others, after they had receiued the money, deliuered them not thoſe beaſts which they required them to ſell them for ſacrifice; but ſo farre were they giuen ouer to impie-ty, that they falſified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God alſo, in denying that which they had promiſed toward the furniſhing of their ſacrifice. For which cauſe, the Prieſts being defrauded in this manner contrary to the oath and proteſtations of their aduerſaries) be-ſought God to ſhew vengeance on their country-men, that had committed this hainous and per- I iurious impietie: neither did God deferre their puniſhment any long time, but incontinently after he ſent a great and violent winde, that ſpoiled all the fruits of the countrey; ſo that a meaſure of wheate was ſold for eleuen drachmes.

HIRCANVS and ARISTOBVLVS ſend Embaſſadours to SCAVRVS, to couenant their peace with him.

MEANE while Pompey ſent Scaurus into Syria (himſelfe being in perſon detained in Armenia in purſuite of the warre betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came K vnto Damaſco, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the Citie; for which cauſe hee marched onward towards Iewry: Where beeing arriued, certaine Embaſſadors came vnto him in the behalfe of Ariſtobulus, and others alſo in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacie in the behalfe of them both, and offering in eithers reſpect a tribute of foure hundreth talents. But Scaurus preferred Ariſtobulus promiſes, both for that hee was a man of mightier ſubſtance and greater minde, and withall more moderate in his demand; whereas Hir-canus was poore and couetous, and notwithſtanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promiſe of leſſe aſſurance: For it was a harder matter to ſubdue a Citie that was ſo defenced and ſtrong, then to repulſe a troupe of runnagate Nabatheans, and they ſcarcely well animated to proſecute that warre. For theſe cauſes therefore hee (receiuing his money) leuied L the ſiege, commanding Aretas to returne; which if hee refuſed, hee declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damaſco, and Ariſtobulus led forth his army againſt Are-tas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron he obtained the victorie, and ſlew about ſome ſeuen thouſand of his enemies, amongſt the number of which was *Cephalius An-

A say,recreation: And this vine haue we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Iupiter Capitoline, hauing the inscription of Alexander king of the Iewes;and it was esteemed and valued at fiue hundreth talents. It is said that Aristobulus prince of the Iewes sent the same. Straight after this,there came other fresh Embassadours vnto him(Antipater from Hircanus: and Nicodemus,from Aristobulus)who accused those that had taken mony,namely Gabinius,for that he first of all had receiued three hundred talents beside other presents:and secondly Scaurus,who had receiued foure hundreth; alleadging that by that meanes they had incensed them against him.He therfore gaue direction,that they should repaire vntohim about the spring,each of them to iustifie and maintaine their seuerall rights: as for himselfe he drew his forces from their wintring places,and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certen fortresse which Antiochus the Cyzicenian had fortified in Apamea.He visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus(who was a peruerse and wicked man,and no waies differed from Dyonisius Tripolitane) who was punished with the losse of his head, and was vnited also with him in friendship and affinitie; yet acquited of the death he deserued, by the meanes of a thousand talents ransome,which Ptolomey distributed amongst his souldiers for their pay. Hee rased likewise the Castle of Lysias (wherein a Iew called Sylas tyrannized)and passing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalzis,and hauing likewise ascended the mountaine(which is betweene them) he came to Cœlosyria; and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gaue audience to the Iewes, and their princes Hircanus and Aristobulus,who were at oddes the one against the other,as touching their particular interests,as all the whole nation against them both; alleadging that they would not be gouerned by kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren(who were descended of the race of Priests, sought to draw their nation vnder a different forme of gouernment, to the intent to reduce them vnder seruitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder borne, he had bin depriued of his inheritance by Aristobulus,and had only but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force.He complained likewise of those incursions,that both by land and sea Aristobulus followers had endomaged their frontiers with.For the people had not reuolted,if he had not beene a violent and turbulent man.To this accusation of his,a thousand of the principallest of the Iewes(drawne on by Antipaters perswasion)subscribed, who auerred and iustified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the kingdome, by reason of his incapacitie and naturall defects; alleadging for himselfe, that the gouernment was enforced on him by a necessitie,for feare it should be transported to others: in effect,he protested that he challenged no other title;then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his witnesses certen arrogant yong men,who were hated for their pompe,purple robes,their curiosity in painting and curling their haire, and bard horse, and other braueries which they presented,not like men that intended to expect iudgement, but as if their pretence had beene to make shew of their pompe. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemned Aristobulus violence, but for that time he dismissed them(after some fauourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their country,and determine their differents,after he had seen the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the meane while to liue in peace.He vsed Aristobulus likewise very kindly,fearing least hee should incense the people, and shut vp his passage: which notwithstanding came to passe.For Aristobulus came into the City of Delion, and from thence went into Iudæa,without respect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

F POMPEY hearing this,was sore displeased herewith;and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria,besides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobulus:when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behind him,he came to Coreas(which is the entrance into Iudæa) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found hee a goodly Castle situate vpon the top of a mountaine called Alexandrion,whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Embassadours to inuite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsaile of many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre againſt the Romanes, came downe vnto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to returne againe into his Caſtle. And this did he two or three times, alwaies flattering Pompey thorow the hope he had of the kingdome, and making a ſhew that he would be obedient vnto him in whatſoeuer he would command. Meane while he retired himſelfe, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for feare leaſt Pompey ſhould transferre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he ſhould deliuer vp the fortreſſes that he held, and had written with his owne hand to the captaines of the garriſons (who otherwiſe would not haue obeyed him) Ariſtobulus ſubmitted, and in diſcontent repaired to Ieruſalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. At that time Ariſtobulus (being ſorry for his misbehauiour) came vnto him, offering him money: and promiſing him to receiue him into Ieruſalem, he beſought him, that (diſmiſſing publike enmities and quarrels) hee would peaceably doe what him liſted hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condeſcended to his requeſt, and ſent Gabinius with his ſouldiers, both to receiue the money, as alſo to enter the city; but his purpoſe failed him in both: for Gabinius returned, becauſe he was excluded out of the city; neither receiued he any mony, for that Ariſtobulus ſouldiers would not permit that any promiſe ſhould be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth; ſo that after he had committed Ariſtobulus to priſon, he went in perſon againſt the citie, which was ſtrongly fortified on euery ſide, except toward the quarter that extendeth northward, which was eaſie to bee beaten downe: for this ſide is inuironed with a large and deepe valley, compaſſing the Temple, which is incloſed with a marueilous ſtrong wall of ſtone.

CHAP. VIII.

POMPEY taketh the Temple, and lower part of the Citie perforce.

BVT within the city there grew a diuiſion and faction, by reaſon of the difference and diſſident opinions of thoſe that kept the ſame; for ſome thought good to yeelde vp the citie into Pompeis hands; otherſome (that were of Ariſtobulus faction counſelled that the gates ſhould bee kept ſhut, and preparation for warre ſhould bee made, for that the Romans detained Ariſtobulus priſoner. Theſe latter preuailing more then the reſt ſeized the temple: and breaking downe the bridge which was betwixt it and the city, addreſſed themſelues to ſtand on their defence. But the others not onely deliuered the city into Pompeis hands, but the royall palace alſo: who ſent Piſo his lieutenant thither with his forces to take poſſeſſion thereof, and to plant his garriſons therein, and to fortifie the houſes neere adioyning the temple, and whatſoeuer conuenient habitation without the walles. Firſt therefore Piſo offered the beſieged certaine conditions of peace: which for that they refuſed, he fortified and ſhut them in on euery ſide, being in all theſe his endeauours aſſiſted by Hircanus. On the outſide of the city, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the temple (which was the eaſieſt & meeteſt ſide to be aſſaulted) on this ſide alſo there were certen high towers, and a huge trench, beſides a deepe valley that begirt the temple. For towards the city all waies and paſſages were ſo broken vp, that no man could either goe vp or downe, and the bridge was taken away on that ſide where Pompey was incampt. Each day did the Romanes trauell earneſtly to raiſe a mount, and cutting downe all the timber round about them, & hauing fitly applyed the ſame, the trench being fild vp (although very hardly, by reaſon of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addreſſed, which when they inforced and darted ſtones againſt the temple: & had not the ordinance of the countrey commanded to keepe the Sabbath (which was the ſeuenth day of the weeke) holy, and to labour in no ſort on that day; the Romans had neuer bin able to haue raiſed their bulwarke, if they within the temple had oppoſed themſelues againſt them. For the law permit-

Pompey maketh preparation to beſiege the temple.

A permitteth to defend themſelues againſt their enemies, at ſuch time as they are aſſailed and vrged to fight, but not aſſaile them when they intend any other worke. Which when the Romans vnderſtood, they neither gaue aſſault, not proffered skirmiſh on thoſe daies, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, and planted their engines; ſo that the next day they were ready to put them in vſe againſt the Iewes. And hereby it is eaſie to coniecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how ſtudious and induſtrious they be in obſeruing the diuine lawes. For notwithſtanding any preſent or imminent feare, yet deſiſted they neuer to offer their ſolemne ſacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Prieſts offered vpon the altar; and notwithſtanding any difficulty or danger of the ſiege that might happen, they omitted not the courſe of their oblations. For at ſuch time as the temple was taken (in the third

B moneth, and on a faſting day, in the hundreth ſeuentie nine Olympiade, in the yeere wherin Caius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Conſuls) the enemy entred the Temple by force, and ſlue thoſe that withſtood them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the prieſts ceaſed not to exerciſe their accuſtomed ſacrifice: and neither the hazard of their liues, nor the great number of thoſe that were dead, could force them to flie; but that they held it more conuenient for them to indure all things that might happen in attending vpon the Altar, then to tranſgreſſe or vary one iot from their ordinances. And that this may ſeeme to be no fable, or praiſe of their diſſembled deuotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all thoſe that write the Hiſtories concerning Pompey and his acts, doe witneſſe no leſſe: amongſt the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Liuius the Romane Hiſtoriographer the moſt famous among the reſt. The greateſt of thoſe towers was battered by

C theſe engins, and fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cauſe that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The firſt that aſcended the wall, was Cornelius Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla, with his ſouldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with thoſe that followed him, on the other ſide: and thorow the midſt of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a ſtrong ſquadron. The whole circuit was filled with murthers; and ſome of the Iewes died by the Romanes ſwords; other ſome ſlew one another; the reſt caſt themſelues downe headlong from the ſteepie places: many likewiſe ſet fire on their houſes, and conſumed themſelues therein, for feare they ſhould behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelue thouſand Iewes, and very few Romanes. Abſolom alſo, who was Ariſtobulus father in law, and vncle, was taken priſoner. The religion of the Temple

D likewiſe was not a little prophaned. For wheras before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the temple: Pompey and diuers others that accompanied him, entred the ſame, and ſaw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high prieſts onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a ſacred candleſticke, with diuers other veſſels and odoriferous drugs in great quantity; and whereas beſides that, there was about two thouſand talents of ſiluer in the ſacred treaſurie in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reuerence hee had of GOD, and heerein hee behaued himſelfe anſwerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded thoſe that had the charge of the Temple to purge the ſame, and to offer ſacrifices vnto GOD, according to the law; committing the high Prieſthood to Hircanus

E hands, both for that he had ſtood him in great ſteed in many things, as for that hee had hindered the Iewes, that were of the countrey, from ioyning themſelues with Ariſtobulus. After this, he beheaded the authors of this warre, and honoured Fauſtus and the reſt with condigne gifts, who with great courage had firſt attempted and aſcended the wall. As for Ieruſalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Iewes thoſe Cities they had conquered in Cœloſyria, and aſſigning them a proper and peculiar gouernment. After this, he incloſed the nation within certaine limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, hee repaired Gadara, that not long before was deſtroied: all which he performed in fauour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late ſeruant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azot, Iamnia, and Arethuſa, hee reſtored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were ſituate in the heart of the land: Beſides, Gaza, Ioppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton (cities ſituate vpon the ſea coaſt, and ruinated before times with diuers warres) he ſet

F at libertie, and annexed them vnto the prouince. As for the tower of Straton, it was magnificently builded by Herod, and decked with gates and faire Temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cæſarea. Thus Hircanus and Ariſtobulus through their diſſenſions and ciuill broyles, were the cauſe of that ſeruitude and miſery that fell vpon the Iewes. For we haue loſt our liberty, and haue beene ſubdued by the Romans. Beſides that, we haue beene enforced to ſurrender vp thoſe Cities vnto the Syrians, which we before time by force of armes had conquered

SCAVRVS led forth his army against Petra a Citie in Arabia, and for that the Citie might very hardly be besieged, hee spoiled all the countrey round about. When as therefore his army was pressed with famine, Antipater by the commandement of Hircanus, furnished him with corne, and all other necessaries out of Iewry. Who beeing sent Embassadour to Aretas from Scaurus, in that hee had sometime soiourned with him, perswaded him to contribute a certaine summe of siluer to warrantize his countrey from pillage; and hee himselfe also became pledge for three hundreth talents. ALEXANDER ouercome by GABINIVS, retireth himselfe into a Castle, wherein hee is shut vp and besieged.

NOT long after this, Alexander Aristobulus sonne, made diuers inroads into Iewry: for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which he atchieued) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, beeing otherwise exercised in building the walles of Ierusalem that were beaten downe by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were K

This Alexander trauailing thorow the whole countrey, assembled diuers Iewes; so that in short time, hauing gotten together tenne thousand footemen, and fifteene hundreth horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion neere vnto the Citie of Coreas. Hee fortified Machæron also in the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, hauing sent before him Marcus Antonius accompanied with other Chiefetaines of warre, who armed the Romans of their traine, and the Iewes that were vnder their obedience, whose Captaines were Pitholaus and Malichus. They tooke also those allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage came they to make head against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his troupes. Hereupon Alexander drew more neere with his army towards Ierusalem, where waging battell with the Romans, hee lost about three L thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and inuited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the rebellion they had begunne. And where as many of his enemies had encamped themselues before the Fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adiudged to haue behaued himselfe very valiantly, in that he slew diuers of his enemies. Gabinius left a part of his armie in that place, to the ende that during the siege thereof, hee might goe and visit the countrey of Iudæa: he commanded therefore all those Cities, which in his iourney he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired: so that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with diuers others, were new builded: so that thorow the obedience that was giuen to Gabinius command, it came to passe that the Cities were M

Whilst therefore he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Embassadors vnto him, demanding pardon at his hand for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of Hircania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion; which Gabinius leuelled with the ground. And whereas Alexanders mother came vnto him (who fauoured the Romane faction, and whose husband

ARISTOBVLVS eſcapeth out of priſon and flieth from Rome, and is apprehended againe by GABINIVS in Iudæa, and led backe priſoner to Rome.

BVT Ariſtobulus flying from Rome, returned into Iewrie, and determined to reedifie the Caſtle of Alexandrion, which not long ſince was ruinated. Againſt him Gabinius ſent out certaine men of warre with their captaines, namely Siſenna, Antonius and Seruilius, both to keepe him from the poſſeſſion of the place, as to apprehend and ſurpriſe him likewiſe. For many Iewes reſorted vnto him, being drawne thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had: who deſired likewiſe to worke innouations. Pitholaus alſo (who was eſtabliſhed Lieutenant Generall in Ieruſalem) of his owne accord came vnto him, with a thouſand men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the moſt part were not ſufficiently furniſhed with armes; for Ariſtobulus making his reckoning to ſeize Machæron, diſmiſſed thoſe followers of his that were diſarmed, and were vnapt for any execution, and retaining onely eight thouſand wel armed men, he tooke the field and marched thither. But the Romans purſuing and ouertaking him, fought deſperately with him, and ouercame both him and his, notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſt. Beeing therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, & about fiue thouſand of them were ſlaine; and the reſt diſperſed, wandring here and there, ſought for their owne priuate ſecurities: but Ariſtobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thouſand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affaires had very ſlender ſucceſſe; yet loſt he not his hope: but after he had endured the ſiege ſome two daies, and receiued many wounds, he was taken priſoner, and with his ſon Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away captiue by Gabinius. Such was the aduenture of Ariſtobulus, that he was ſent priſoner backe againe to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had beene King and high Prieſt three yeeres, and ſixe moneths. A man in that dignity both magnificent and magnanimous: yet did the Senate ſend backe his children (according to the tenor of Gabinius letters) who had promiſed their deliuery to their mother, at ſuch time as ſhee ſurrendred the Caſtles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Iewry. But Gabinius, intending to make warre againſt the Parthians, and hauing already paſt Euphrates, changed his reſolution, and determined to returne into Egypt, and reeſtabliſhed Ptolomey, as it is declared in an other place. In this expedition alſo he was furniſhed by Antipaters meanes, with victuals, money and munition; and by his aduice, thoſe Iewes that inhabite Peluſium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were drawne into his ſociety. When as therefore Gabinius returned backe out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult and rebellion. For Alexander, Ariſtobulus ſonne, taking once more poſſeſſion of the kingdome, cauſed diuers Iewes from day to day to reuolt; and forraging the countrey with a huge army, he ſlew all thoſe Romanes whom he met withall, and beſieged all thoſe that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinius ſeeing the affaires of Syria in that eſtate, ſent Antipater before him vnto them to appeaſe theſe commotions, and to heale them of their frenzie, and if it were poſſible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was a man of good diſcretion. In effect, he repairing vnto them, moderated diuers of them, and brought them vnder obedience: but it was impoſſible for him to reconcile Alexander, for he hauing thirty thouſand ſouldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was ouercome, with the loſſe of ſome ten thouſand of his men, neere vnto the mount Itabyr.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13 al. 14.

CRASSVS intending to make warre against the Parthians, came into Iewry, and tooke away with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the summe of two thousand talents: He spoiled the temple also of all the golde that was in the same, to the summe of 8000. talents. Furthermore, he bare away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of three hundreth pounds, which pound amongst the Iewes containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that deliuered him this ingot, was a Priest, and the keeper of the sacred treasure, called Eleazar, who gaue him the same vpon no malicious intent (for he was a vertuous and iust man) but whereas he had the custodie of the tapestries of the temple, committed to his hands (which both were admirable to behold, by reason of their beautie and esteeme, and withall were in like sort tied and fastned to this beame) and perceiuing that Crassus sought all the meanes that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing least he should haue seized on all the ornaments of the temple, gaue him this beame for a ransome to redeeme all the rest: binding him vpon the deliuerie thereof by an oath, that hee should not take any thing away that was in the temple, but should content himselfe with that onely piece of great esteeme and value, which he gaue him. This beame was inclosed in another hollow beame of wood; so that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Crassus therefore tooke this beame, as if he determined to leaue all other things in the temple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and carried away whatsoeuer was therein. Neither is it to bee wondred at, that there was so great riches found in our temple, sith all those Iewes that were dispersed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all those that feared God (both in Asia and in Europe) for a long time offered their presents in that place. The greatnesse and multitude whereof wanteth no testimonie: neither is it fained in way of ostentation, but diuers other Historians make mention thereof: and amongst the rest, Strabo of Cappadocia speaketh after this manner. And Mithridates sent men into the Isle of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that Queene Cleopatra had laid vp there, and eight hundreth talents of the Iewes. But we haue no publique money, but that which is dedicated vnto God. It is therefore a thing most manifest, that the Iewes that inhabite Asia, transported this money into Coos, for the feare that they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they, who inhabited Iudæa, and had a Citie so strong, and a temple so well defenced, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Iewes remaining in Alexandria should doe it, for that they feared not to fall into danger thorow this warre of Mithridates. The same Strabo also saith in another place, that at such time as Sylla passed thorow Greece to make warre against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent men to Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and saith thus: There were foure sorts of people in the Citie of the Cyrenians: One of them were Citizens; the second were Labourers; the third were Soiourners; and the fourth were Iewes, who at this present are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, neither was there any nation that inhabite the same, wherein these haue not set foote and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being vnder the subiection of the same Princes) and diuers other regions, conformed themselues to their customes, and nourished assemblies of Iewes, and aduanced them, and more and more vsed the Iewish ordinances. It appeareth therefore that there was a colony of Iewes in Ægypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the Citie is assigned to this nation. They haue likewise their peculiar magistrate, who gouerneth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if hee gouerned in his owne common-weale. By this meanes, this nation hath fortified and established it selfe in Ægypt, for that the Iewes had their originall amongst the Ægyptians, and for that Iudæa is neere vnto Ægypt, from whence the Iewes are descended: And as touching Cyrene, they haue entred it, in that it confineth that countrey, which is vnder the obedience of the Ægyptians (in like maner as Iudæa doth) or rather for that in times past it appertained to the same kingdome. Thus farre Strabo.

CAESARS voyage into Egypt, wherein hee was aſsiſted by the faithfull ſeruice of the Iewes.

AFTER Pompeis death, and that victory which Cæſar had obtained againſt him, Antipater (gouernour of Iudæa by the commandement of Hircanus) was very profitable vnto Cæſar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certaine ſupplies, and could E not bring them on, by reaſon of an arme of Nilus paſſing thorow Peluſium ; but was conſtrained to ſtay at Aſcalon : Antipater came vnto him, and brought with him three thouſand ſouldiers, and ſo dealt with the Princes of Arabia to aſſociate them with Cæſar, that by his meanes, all they of Syria gaue him their aſſiſtance, and neuer altered their affection that they bare vnto Cæſar. Theſe were Iamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his ſonne ; and Tholomæus the ſonne of Sohemus, dwelling on the mount of Libanus, and welny all the Cities. Mithridates being departed from Syria, campe to Peluſium, where beeing repulſed and excluded by the Citizens, hee beſieged the Citie. Antipater in this warre behaued himſelfe valiantly, and after hee had beaten downe a pane of the wall, he firſt of all ſet forward to enter the Citie. Whileſt Peluſium was in this eſtate, the Iewes that inhabited Ægypt in the countrey of Onias, would neither grant paſſage to Antipater, nor Mithridates that marched towards Cæſar. The noble actions of ANTIPATER, and the amity that he had with CAESAR.

The yeare of the world, 3917. before Christs Nativitie. 47.

WHEN hee was come to a place called Delta, hee fought with his enemies in a place, which is called the campe of the Iewes : in which battell Mithridates led the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handy blowes, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfited, had not Antipater (running with his souldiers along the banke of the riuer) obtained the vpper hand of his enemies, by putting the Ægyptians that were conquerours to flight, and restoring Mithridates. And so long pursued he them that he got their campe, and called backe Mithridates, who chased the Ægyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that hee had recouered from the fugitiue enemy. In this fight there fell eight hundreth on the enemies side, and fiftie on Antipaters. Afterwards, Mithridates wrote herof vnto Cæsar, and certified him that Antipater was cause of the victorie, and their preseruation : so that Cæsar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his warre he made vse of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts : Whereby it came to passe that Antipater was grieuously wounded in diuers fights.

Mithridates commendeth Antipaters seruice to Cæsar.

Now after that the warre was finished, Cæsar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hircanus to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Diuers men report that Hircanus himselfe was an agent in this warre, and that he came into Ægypt: whereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, speaking after this manner by the authority of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entred Ægypt, with Hircanus the high Priest of the Iewes. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authority of Hypsicrates, that Mithridates issued alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared three thousand souldiers, because he was gouernour of Iudæa, and encouraged the rest of the gouernours ; and Hircanus the high Priest also had a part in this warre. Thus farre Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne, to Cæsar, lamenting vnto him the inconuenient that had befallen his father, and how hee was slaine by poison in his seruice, and how his brother had his head strooken off by Scipio; beseeching him to haue compassion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the kingdome. He accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannicall and violent gouernment ouer their nation, and iniuries offered to himselfe. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himselfe in those points wherein he was accused; declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himselfe how much hee had trauailed, and how many exploits he had executed, in the late warre, whereof Cæsar himselfe was a witnesse. Moreouer, he auowed that Aristobulus had beene iustly led twice into captiuity to Rome, for that he had bin alwaies an enemy, and no waies well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, hee auerred that he was iustly punished by him, for his Larcinies, and not iniuriously and outragiously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hircanus high Priest, and gaue Antipater any gouernment whatsoeuer best him liked: who according to his choice, was appointed perfect in Iudæa.

The Senates decree as touching their league with the Iewes.

A vs a violl and buckler of gold of fiftie thouſand crownes price; requiring our letters might bee giuen them, addreſſed to the free Cities and the kings our confederates, to grant them paſſage thorow their countries and ports with all ſecurity, and without any offence. And we haue thought good to make friendſhip and alliance with them and to grant them all that which they require, in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was high prieſt and prince, and in the ninth yeere of his princedome, in the month of Iuly. The yeere of the world, 3919. before Chriſts Nativity, 45.

Hircanus was in like ſort honored by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendſhips that they receiued at his hands. They ſent him alſo a decree which they ratified in his behalfe, the tenor whereof enſueth: The yeere wherien Dyoniſius the ſonne of Aſclepiades was gouernour, and prieſt, in the moneth of Iuly, and on the 20. day this arreſt or deeree of the Athenians was deliuered to the gouernours by the Pretor Agathocles. Eucles the ſonne of Menander the Alimuſian hath written in the eleuenth of March in the aſſembly generall; and placed it in the Theater, and the ſuffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the high prieſt, with the chiefe aſſiſtants of the people. Dyoniſius the ſonne of Dyoniſius publiſhed the ſame: Since that Hircanus the ſonne of Alexander, the high prieſt and prince of the Iewes, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in eſpeciall towards euery Citizen of Athens, and hath ſhewed them many friendſhips, receiuing with all humanitie thoſe Athenians that come vnto him, whether they reſort thither as Embaſſadours, or for any other particular occaſion whatſoeuer, and ſendeth them backe after they haue prouided them of ſafe conduct, whereof we haue heretofore had teſtimonie by the report of Theodoſius, the ſon of Theodorus Simeus; who hath made recitall vnto the people of his worthineſſe, and of the will he hath to doe vs all the good that is poſſible. We haue thought good to honour him by ſending him a crowne of gold in teſtimony of his curteſies, according to our cuſtome and law; and by erecting a brazen ſtatue vnto him in the temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our will is alſo that this be proclaimed by a herauld in the Theater, during the Bacchanals, and at ſuch time as the new Tragedies are plaide. Likewiſe in the ſolemnities Panathean and Eleuſynian, and at the publike exerciſes: wee will alſo that the gouernours prouide, that all that which we haue aduiſed for the honour, fauour, affection and good will toward this man, as he hath well deſerued, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appeare how our nation reward, and entertaine ſuch men as are vertuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart vnto him, may prouoke others to be the better affected toward vs. It is likewiſe decreed, that amongſt all the Athenians there be certen Embaſſadours choſen, who ſhall beare this Decree vnto him, and exhort him to doe whatſoeuer is profitable for our common good, ſeeing himſelfe ſo much honoured by vs. Let this ſuffice to expreſſe the honours beſtowed on Hircanus by the people of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

Hircanus honoured by the Athenians.

After that Cæſar had giuen order for the affaires of Syria, hee returned backe by ſea. And as ſoone as Antipater had brought Cæſar out of Syria, he returned into Iudæa, and ſodainly builded vp the walles which were before time defaced by Pompey; and in riding circuit about the countrey, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces; but by counſailes alſo which hee gaue euery one to liue in peace; certifying them that if they ſubmitted themſelues to Hircanus their prince they ſhould liue happily, and enioy their poſſeſſions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to aduance themſelues by any new commotion (ſuppoſing by that meanes to profit themſelues ſome way) they ſhould feele that in ſteed of a gouernor, they had a maſter; and in ſteed of a king, they ſhould finde Hircanus a tyrant; and in ſteed of the Romans and Cæſar to be their gouernors, they ſhould feele and find them to be their moſt hatefull enemies, for that they would not ſuffer, that any thing ſhould be altered that they had eſtabliſhed. By theſe and ſuch like admonitions, he kept and continued all the countrey in peace.

CHAP. XVII.

ANTIPATER committeth the gouernment of Galilee to his ſonne HEROD, and that of Ieruſalem to PHASÆLVS his other ſonne: and how SEXTVS CÆSAR aduanceth HEROD to great honours and dignities.

ANTIPATER perceiuing that Hircanus was ſlow and idle, he declared and appointed Phaſaelus his eldeſt ſonne gouernour ouer Ieruſalem, and the countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for hee was not at that time aboue fifteene yeeres olde) hee committed Galilee vnto his charge: who although hee were young in yeeres, yet did not his tender age any waies preiudice him becauſe hee was of a noble ſpirit, and found
